In my view, there are points of law involved in this case. They are as follows:

1. Whether a mere prior visit by contender to the Land Office is sufficient proof to rebut legal and registered ownership of an immovable property, to wit Plot E 15 C Mbamba Bay Road Songea Township, registered in the name of the Applicant.

2. Whether the fact of marriage per se rebuts the legal ownership of a granted Right of Occupancy. F

3. Whether in law a minor can hold or apply for a Right of Occupancy.

4. Whether the finding by the Appellate Judge as to ownership of the house on Plot 15 C Mbamba Bay Road in Songea Township is maintainable in law G when it seems the judge was addressing his mind to the evidence of DW9 Mrs. Hamza, the fact of shs.50,000/= which was in respect to another house No. 11 Block C Songea, property bought by the Applicant in the name of the respondent's son. H

Those are the points of law involved in this matter, and some may be of mixed law and facts.

At Nshamba Primary Court, Muleba District in Kagera Region the respondents brought on action claiming a piece of clan land from the appellant. It was the appellant's case that E said piece of land belonged to him as it was bequeathed to him by will by his deceased brother one Karaba s/o Matondane. Moreover, he testified that he had redeemed that piece land on payment of shs.100/= from where it was pledged by the deceased. The case of the respondents was that the clan council had in 1982 allocated F the disputed piece of land of the deceased Karaba s/o Matondane to the respondent as the deceased had died intestate.

The Primary Court found in favour of the respondent holding that the will relied on by the appellant at the trial was null and void as the same was not attested by two clan G members and two non-clan members in terms of paragraph 19 of the Rules on Wills the deceased being an illiterate and further holding that the clan council properly allocated the disputed piece of land of the deceased Karaba s/o Matondane who had died intestate.

On first appeal by the appellant to the District Court of Muleba, the District Court H concurred with the Primary Court that the will was null and void for offending para 19 of the rules on wills but held that the allocation of the land of the deceased by the clan council to the respondents was illegal as the appellant who was brother of the deceased was not called to attend the meeting of the clan council, he way condemned unheard I contrary to the principles of natural justice. The District Court ordered that another clan council meeting incorporating the appellant be convened to decide the distribution of the estate of the A deceased Karaba s/o Mtondane.

Both the Primary Court and District Court did not consider the effect of the redemption of the piece of land by the appellant.

The appellant was aggrieved by the order of the District Court and appealed therefrom B to the High Court of Tanzania. In the course of hearing the appeal it was submitted by Mr. Rweyemamu, counsel for the respondents, that when one redeems clan land the land reverts to the clan and that it does not become the property of the redeemer. C

Held: (i) The will under which the appellant claimed ought to have been witnessed by two clan members and two non-clan members as required by the Rules on Wills since the deceased was illiterate. The will was therefore null and void;

(ii) redeemed clan land does not become the property of the clan. It is the law D that the redeemer of clan land which had been pledged becomes the owner of that land;

(iii) the appellant acquired a title to the piece of land after the expiry of 12 years during which he was in uninterrupted possession thereof;

(iv) it was contrary to the principles of justice to deprive the appellant of the E piece of land which he had long possessed without giving him a hearing.

[zJDz]Judgment

Mwalusanya, J.: The four respondents (Didas s/o Rwakakile and his three brothers) successfully sued the appellant Thomas s/o Matondane, their uncle, in a claim of piece of G land at Nshamba Primary Court, Muleba District in Kagera Region. The trial court held that the clan council had in 1982 properly allocated the disputed piece of land of the deceased Karaba s/o Matondane to the four respondents as the said Karaba s/o Matondane died intestate without leaving behind any will. The trial court also held that H the will that was produced by the appellant at the trial was null and void as it offended para 19 of the Rules on wills GN. No. 436/1983 in that it was not attested by the clan members and two non-clan members, the deceased being an illiterate who did not know how to read and write.

The appellant made his first appeal to Muleba District Court. The District Court agreed I with the trial court that the will produced by the appellant at the trial was null and void for offending para 19 of the Rules on Wills. A However, the District Court held that the distribution of the land of the deceased Karaba s/o Matondane by the clan council was illegal as the appellant was not called to attend that meeting of the clan council. The District Magistrate held that as the appellant B was the brother of the deceased, he should have been called to attend that meeting of the clan council. he said that it was against the principles of natural justice to have condemned the appellant unheard. So the learned District Magistrate held that the clan council should convene a fresh meeting incorporating the appellant and thereby decide C the distribution of the estate of the deceased Karaba s/o Matondane.

Aggrieved by that decision, the appellant has now appealed to this court. He contends that the District Court should have held that the land in dispute belonged to him as it was D bequeathed to him by will by his deceased brother Karaba s/o matondane. Moreover he said that he had redeemed that piece of land on payment of shs.70/= from where it was pledged by the deceased. The appellant agrees with the decision of the District Court that the decision of the trial court was using as he was not present when the clan E council deprived him his right of inheritance to that piece of land.

I will start the decision of this case by discussing the validity of the will that appellant produced at the trial. I agree with both courts below that the will in question is null and void as it offended para 19 of the Rules on wills GN. No. 436/1963. The will under F which the appellant claimed ownership was not witnessed by two clan members and two non-clan members as required by the Rules on wills which are applicable to Muleba District. The will that was produced at the trial was attested by three clan members but there was a non-clan member who signed it. It is not in dispute that the deceased G Karaba s/o Matondane was illiterate, as he did not know to read and write. Therefore the will was obviously null and void, and for the preposition of this law see the decision of this court in the case of Ferdinand s/o Lumboyo v Ngeiyamu s/p Kajuna [1982] T.L.R. N. 142 by Rubama, J. H

I now go to the question as to whether the appellant became the owner of the land in dispute after he had redeemed it in 1966. There was uncontroverted evidence at the trial that the deceased Karaba s/o Matondane has pledged that piece of land to a stranger for a loan of shs.100/= or shs.70/=. According to the appellant on 1/12/1966 he I redeemed that piece of land from the pledger by paying the shs.100/=. He did so after the deceased Karaba had declared his failure to pay the loan and decided to emigrate for good to Kome Island where he died A in 1982. The appellant was using that piece of land since 1966 when he redeemed it until 1982 when the clan council decided to take the land in dispute from him and gave it to the four respondents. The clan council in their allegedly duly refunded by the four B respondents to the appellant at the clan council meeting. The appellant says that he never attended that clan council meeting which met in his absence.

Both courts below did not discuss the effect of the redemption of that piece of land by the appellant. Apparently both courts thought that because the appellant was refunded C the shs.100/= by the four respondents at the clan council meeting, then that was the end of the matter. Council for the four respondents Mr. Rweyemamu submitted that when one redeems clan land it reverts to the clan and that it does not become the property of the redeemer. He added by stating that since in the case at hand the appellant was D refunded the shs.100/= then he has no reason to complain.

In my considered view, the view taken by counsel for the four respondents Mr. Rweyemamu is wrong. It is the law that the redeemer of clan land that had been pledged becomes the owner of that land. That proposition of law is contained in paragraph 547 E of Cory and Hartnoll which reads as follows:

If the plantation has been pledged on the condition that it will become the property of the creditor failing the repayment of the debt within an agreed time, a relative has the right to F redeem it, even after the time limit has expired, as in invalid sale; in which case it follows that the plantation becomes the property of the man who redeems it.

The underlining above is mine for emphasis. And that is actually what was decided by G this court in the case of Martin s/o Bikonyoro v Celestin s/o Kaokola [1968] H.C.D. N. 87 by Cross J. and also in the case of Gabriel s/o Nzizula v Rooza d/o Muyungi: [1968] H.C.D. N. 126 by Mustafa, J. These two cases were emphatic that a relative who redeems clan land that had been pledged, becomes the owner of the redeemed H land; and para 547 of Cory and Hartnoll were cited as authority for that preposition of law. That being the case, it is obvious that the land in dispute in this case, became the property of the appellant when he redeemed it on 1/12/1966. That disposes of this case. I

MWALUSANYA J

I am also of the view that the appellant acquired the title to the land in dispute by long A possession. It is common knowledge that the appellant in this case became in possession of the land in dispute in 1966 when he retained it. He had uninterrupted possession of that land from 1966 till 1986 (some 20 years later) when the four respondents filed this B suit. According to the Customary Law (Limitation of Proceedings) Rules GN. No. 311/1964 item No. 6 in the Schedule, any proceeding to recover possession of land should be filed within 12 years from the day the right accrues. Since it is contended that the appellant was in adverse possession of that piece of land since 1966, then the four C respondents or the clan council should have sued the appellant within 12 years from 1966. But that was not done and so the appellant acquired a title to that piece of land after the expiry of the 12 years.

It is now unnecessary to discuss the significance and effect of the clan council meeting of D 17/10/1982. The appellant has argued that the said meeting was void as it did not incorporate him, being a close member of the clan. In passing I would like to observe that the decision of the District Court appears to be correct that appellant did not attend E the clan council meeting in question. The trial court left this question open, without deciding as to whether the appellant attended the clan council meeting or not. I agree with the District Court that as the appellant did not sign the minutes of the meeting while all those who attended signed the minutes, then the appellant did not attend the meeting. It was contrary to the principles of natural justice to deprive the appellant of the piece of F land he was occupying since 1966 without giving him a hearing.

Be that as it may, this appeal is allowed with costs. The judgments of the two courts below are set aside and I hereby declare the appellant to be the lawful owner of the piece of land in dispute.

G Order accordingly.

There was evidence that the respondent collected his own elders for the bargain. It was eventually agreed that the bride price payable be 12 head of cattle, two goats and cash shs.2,650/=. The respondent agreed to pay six head of cattle and cash shs.2,650/= on the spot as his first instalment. However he changed his mind later. The appellant successfully sued the respondent at Shirati Primary Court in Tarime District in a claim for payment of the agreed bride price. The Primary Court E found as a fact that the respondent's son had married the appellant's daughter and so the respondent was obliged to pay bride price as agreed.

On appeal, by the respondent, the District Court of Tarime held that there was no F marriage between the respondent's son and the appellant's daughter and so the question of payment of bride price did not arise. In addition, even if there was a marriage, no order for payment of bride price could issue as the parties had never agreed on the amount of bride price payable. [zJDz]Judgment Mwalusanya, J.: The appellant John s/o Kirakwe successfully sued the respondent Idd s/o Siko at Shirati Primary Court in Tarime District in a claim of payment of brideprice C amounting to 12 head of cattle, two goats and cash shs.2,650/=. The trial court found as a fact that the respondent's son had married the appellant's daughter, and so the respondent was obliged to pay the brideprice that was earlier agreed upon by the two parties. the respondent appealed to Tarime District Court and was successful and hence D this appeal by the appellant.

The District Court of Tarime held that there was no marriage between the respondent's son and the appellant's daughter and so the question of payment of brideprice could not arise. And the learned District Magistrate further argued that even if there was marriage, E no order for payment of brideprice could issue from the Court as the parties had never agreed upon as to the amount of the payable brideprice.

In my judgment I find that the District Court was wrong on both points. Concerning as to whether the parties had agreed upon the amount of the brideprice payable, I find that the F trial court was right that the parties had on 23/8/1988 clinched a deal as to the amount of brideprice payable. Evidence was adduced at the trial that on that date, the appellant with some elders who included Mr. Francis s/o Kirakwi (PW.2), Shabani s/o Lukonge G (PW.3) and Juma s/o Kiraka (PW.4) went to the respondent's home for negotiations about the payable brideprice. It is said the respondent collected his own elders. It was eventually agreed that the payable brideprice would be 12 head of cattle, two goats and H cash shs.2,650/=. the agreement was put in writing and respondent agreed to pay six head of cattle and cash shs.2,650/= on the spot as his first instalment. However just after the deal was clinched, the respondent reneged and tore both copies of the written agreement and said that he was not ready to pay such meeting and agreement about the payable brideprice, though he agreed that his son had married the appellant's daughter. I

MWALUSANYA J

On that evidence I am satisfied that there was an agreement between the two parties that A the payable brideprice would be 12 head of cattle, two goats and cash shs. 2,650/=. The appellant adduced cogent evidence at the trial which was backed up by not less than three witnesses. The respondent cannot be allowed to repudiate an agreement that B he had made before a group of elders. The trial court was entitled to act on that evidence that the agreed brideprice payable was as agreed upon on 23/8/1988. Therefore the District Court was wrong to ignore such pertinent evidence to the matter in issue.

As regards the second issue that there was no marriage, again I find that the District C Court was wrong. First, at the trial respondent agreed that his son had married the appellant's daughter. What he said was that the payable brideprice of 12 head of cattle, 2 goats and cash shs.2,650/= was too much on the high side. He said that he was only prepared to pay four head of cattle and two goats as brideprice. Therefore the D contention by the respondent to the District Court that his son was not married to the appellant's daughter was an afterthought. The respondent cannot be allowed to blow hot and cold nor eat the cake and have it. Therefore I dismiss the contention by the respondent that his son was 15 years of age (under the minimum age of marriage) at the E time of marriage. If his son was under 18 years of age at the time of marriage, he should have raised such a point at the trial. We take that raising such a point at this stage is an afterthought intended to defeat a course of justice, and so it is dismissed with the contempt it deserves. F

It is not in dispute in this case that the marriage in this case was contracted under Kuria customary law and it was contracted by elopement. It was on 8/10/86 when the respondent's son eloped with the appellant's daughter. They are still cohabiting as husband and wife up to this day, some three years now. We are told that they have one G issue and the woman is now pregnant for the second child. It is said the husband works with Mugango Ginnery in Musoma district. That element can constitute marriage under Kuria customary law cannot be disputed. For example in the case of Bernard s/o Bayikafundi v Tamayamali s/o Mganidas [1970] H.C.D. n 11 (Said J.) this Court H held that elopement can constitute marriage under customary law. That is the position that obtains in this case. And so the respondent cannot be heard to say that there was no marriage in the circumstances.

I would further argue that there is a presumption of marriage in this case and that the respondent has failed to rebut it as stipulated I

MWALUSANYA J

under s.160(1) of Law of Marriage Ace No. 5/1971. It is common ground that the two A parties in here have lived together for over two years and that they have acquired the reputation of husband and wife and that it has been proved that they were not married in fact but started to live together after an elopemnt. That is enough to constitute marriage - B see my judgment on this point in Mbeya (PC) Civil Appeal No. 50/1985 between Shija Nyangindu v Kashinje Salawi: (unreported). The other cases with the same view are Elizabeth Salwiba v Peter s/o Obara: n. 52 (by Nyalali, J. as he then was) C and Raphael Dibogo v Flabamis s/o Wambura: [1975] L.R.T. n. 42 (by Lugakingira, J.) The judgment of Mfalila, J. (as he then was) in Francis s/o Leo v Paschali Simon Maganga: [1978] L.R.T. n. 22 that insists that for a presumption of marriage to succeed it must be proved that the parties had gone through a ceremony of marriage recognised under the law of Marriage Act, has been discredited; and it is no longer good law. The D only three important elements to constitute a presumption of marriage are:

(a) that the parties have cohabited for over two years;

(b) that the parties have acquired a reputation of being husband and wife; E

(c) that there was no formal marriage ceremony between the said couple.

In the case at hand, the appellant has been able to establish those three elements. And so F marriage has been proved between the respondent's son and the appellant's daughter.

In the event this appeal succeeds. I allow the appeal with costs. The judgment of the District Court is set aside, while that of the Primary Court is restored.

G Order accordingly.

Moshi, J.: The appellant, Francis Adolf, successfully sued the respondent, Ibrahim Mustafa, at Katoro Primary Court for a shamba worth Shs. 20,000/=. G

The respondent had, in a written agreement, pledged the shamba to secure a loan of shs.20,000/= from the appellant on 12/11/85. The agreement was witnessed by not less than four persons, as well as their ward CCM office. It had provided that the shamba H would become the property of the appellant if the loan was not paid by 30/5/86. By 30/5/86 the loan remained unpaid, and for several days thereafter, the whereabouts of the respondent was unknown. Hence the suit for the shamba filed on 24/6/86.

On the hearing day, the appellant and his witnesses were present in court, whereas the I respondent, who was duly served to appear, failed, for unknown reasons, to enter an appearance in court. The trial court then A heard the appellant and his witnesses, and pronounced judgment in his favour.

Consequent upon a complaint made by the respondent at Bukoba District Court on 22/9/87, the District Court called the trial court record for inspection. In a revisional B order dated 17/11/87, the District Court found that the suit before the trial court ought to have been for the loan, and not for the shamba, and further that the Primary Court could not have had jurisdiction to try the case in view of the provisions of section 18(1)(a)(iii) C of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1984, since the loan of shs.20,000/= exceeded its pecuniary jurisdiction. The trial court proceedings were declared null and void, and the appellant was directed to file a suit for the loan, if still unpaid, before a court of competent jurisdiction. Hence this appeal.

While admitting the appeal my brother Munyera, J. minuted: D

Admit to consider the jurisdiction of the trial court. What is a customary law transaction or a contract in general law? E

It seems to me, and I am certain Munyera, J. had this in mind, that the one issue on which this appeal must stand or fall is whether the transaction between the parties was a customary law one or one based on the general principles outlined in the Law of F Contract Ordinance. This question is vital in that in the event the transaction is found to have been a customary law one, the decision of the trial court, as against that of the District Court, would carry the day, and vice-versa.

With respect, I am satisfied that the transaction between the parties was a customary law G one. Georges, C.J. as he then was said in Mtatiro Mwita v Mwita Marianya [1968] HCD 82, that:

If persons of the same tribe enter into an agreement well known to the tribal custom under which the terms are prescribed, these persons must, in the absence of evidence to the H contrary, be understood to be contracting in accordance with these terms.

In our case, both parties are of Haya tribe. Under Haya law, a shamba may be pledged on condition that it will become the property of a creditor failing repayment of a debt on I an agreed date. The transaction had received the necessary publicity - the witnesses and involvement of the CCM office. I have found no evidence to the contrary, and I am A satisfied, and hereby find, that the parties had transacted under their customary law dictates.

It is law that where money is loaned upon a pledge of property on condition that the property becomes the property of the pledgee if the loan is not repaid within a B prescribed time, the pledgee has a right to resort to the courts for the enforcement of the agreement by suing for the property on the basis of the agreement. This is exactly what the appellant had done, in the Primary Court. There was no evidence that the sum secured was much less than the value of the shamba, in which case the trial court would C have been empowered to order the sale of the shamba, instead of its transfer to the appellant, and the surrender back to the respondent the money in excess of the secured loan. In our case, we are told that the value of the shamba was equal to that of the sum loaned. For the foregoing reasons, and with respect, I am satisfied, and hereby find, that D the District Court erred in law in reversing the decision of the trial court, and in its finding that the trial court had acted without jurisdiction.
In the event, I allow the appeal with costs, quash and set aside the District Court judgment and its orders, and hereby restore in full the Primary Court decision. E

Makame, Omar and Mnzavas, JJ.A.: The appellant, Fanuel Joseph Mbedule, was, F in Mbeya District Court Criminal Case No. 145 of 1988, charged with and convicted of stealing by public servant contrary to sections 265 and 270 of the Penal Code and sentenced to 5 years imprisonment. He was aggrieved by the finding and sentence of the trial court and appealed to the High Court.

The High Court (Mroso, J.) after evaluating the evidence came to the conclusion that the G appeal had no merit and dismissed it in its entirety.

Still dissatisfied the appellant has appealed to this court.

Mr. Bateyunga, learned counsel for the appellant, argued before us that the first appellate court erred in finding that the evidence of George Ngela (PW.5) and Mogan H Mwakapuji, (PW.6), who were accomplices was corroborated by the testimony of Amosi Mwangalila (PW.8). It was the learned counsel's submission that Amosi Mwangalila was himself an accomplice who could not corroborate the evidence of other I accomplices.

MAKAME JJA, OMAR JJA AND MNZAVAS JJA

Mr. Bateyunga also submitted that the evidence that a key which opened the laboratory A store from which a refrigerator was stolen was found in appellant's room was of no consequence as, it was argued, there was evidence that other workers in the school possessed keys which opened the store. It was finally the learned counsel's argument that it was quite possible that the key found in appellant's room had been planted there. B

Mr. Kapinga, learned State Attorney supported the conviction on the ground that the learned judge and the trial magistrate found that there was corroboration of the testimony of PW.5 and PW.6 by the evidence of Amosi, PW.8. The learned counsel also argued C that even if PW.8 was himself an accomplice the trial court believed him to be a credible witness and that as such his evidence did not need corroboration in view of the provisions of section 142 of the Evidence Act.

The facts in this case were simple and straight forward. On 15/4/88 a refrigerator was D stolen from Loleza Secondary School. The matter was reported to the police and a week later wheels of investigation led to the house of Yahya Mzanda, (PW.7), in which a fridge was found. The fridge was later identified as the very one stolen from Loleza Secondary School. In his evidence Yahya, (PW.7), testified that the fridge was sold to E him by Mogan Mwakapuji (PW.6).

Mogan admitted in his evidence to have sold the fridge to Yahya. He also testified that the fridge was initially sold to his friend George Ngela, (PW.5), by the appellant and that F he helped his friend in carrying the fridge from Loleza Secondary School premises to George Ngela's kiosk. It was after the fridge was found to be unsuitable for George's kiosk that a decision was taken to sell it to Yahya.
In his defence the appellant totally denied having sold a fridge to George Ngela leave G alone stealing one from Loleza Secondary School.
The trial court found PW.5 and PW.6 to be truthful witnesses and found it as a fact that it was the appellant who sold the fridge to PW.5 having stolen it from a laboratory store H at Loleza Secondary School. This being a second appeal this court is not concerned with the trial court's finding of fact. We are only concerned with the arguments by the defence that PW.5 and PW.6 were accomplices whose evidence needed corroboration and that the courts below erred in acting on their evidence to the detriment of the appellant. I
With respect to the learned defence counsel we are also of the view that PW.5 and PW.6 were accomplices whose evidence needed corroboration as A a matter of practice before being acted upon to the detriment of the appellant. But with even greater respect to the learned defence counsel we are also satisfied that there was sufficient corroboration evidence in support of the testimony of PW.5 and PW.6 B that it was the appellant who sold the stolen fridge to George (PW.5). This corroborative evidence is found in the testimony of Kange Ally, (PW.4), which was to the effect that the appellant had told him that he was selling a fridge and asked him to tell the owner of the kiosk, (PW.5), about it. Apparently Kange, (PW.4) was at the material C time selling soda in PW.5's kiosk. Later Kange told PW.5 what the appellant had told him. It is therefore amply clear that the only role played by Kange was that of reporting to PW.5 what the appellant had told him. That being the position Kange cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be traded as an accomplice whose evidence needed corroboration. D

As it was held in the case of R. v Medcraft (23 Cr. Appl. R. 166) "evidence in corroboration of evidence of an accomplice need not be direct evidence, it is sufficient if it is circumstantial evidence connecting the accused with the offence." This decision was quoted and followed by the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa in Rex v Gongolo s/o E Ibalwe [1937] E.A.C.A. 66.
Even if, for the sake of argument, there was no corroborative evidence of the testimony of PW.5 and PW.6 who were clearly accomplices section 142 of the Evidence Act says and we quote:

> An accomplice shall be a competent witness against an accused person; and a conviction is F not illegal merely because it proceeds upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice.

The upshot of this is that the trial court which apparently accepted the testimony of G PW.5 and PW.6 as credible would have been fully justified under section 142 of the Evidence Act to convict the appellant of the offence charged even if there was no corroborative evidence in support of their testimony.

Apart from the evidence of PW.4 there was also the testimony of the watchman, H (PW.8), and that of the Headmistress, (PW.3), which tended to implicate the appellant with the offence.
We are therefore of the opinion that the concurrent findings of the lower courts was the only reasonable finding to which they could come and we accordingly dismiss this second appeal in its entirety. I
Order accordingly

The appellant was the brother of the first respondent. The first respondent inherited a clan shamba from her father. She then sold it to the 2nd respondent with the consent of clan members. The 2nd respondent later sold the shamba to the 3rd respondent again with the consent of clan members. The appellant sought to redeem the clan land. The D two lower courts found both sales valid. On appeal Held: (i) The first respondent, being a Buhaya woman, could not have legally disposed of the land to any person, and in any manner, even with the consent of the clan - rule 20 E of the Local Customary Law (Declaration) No. 4 Order 1963 - GN.436 of 1963;

(ii) since the purported sale by the first respondent was void, no title in the land passed to the 2nd respondent who, thus, had no title to pass to the third respondent;

(iii) the third respondent, in all fairness, is entitled to be paid compensation in F respect of unexhausted improvements if any made by him during his reoccupation of the land under the authority of the courts below.

Moshi, J.: This was a claim for the redemption of clan land filed by the appellant, Angelo Bisiki, against the three respondents, Antonia d/o Bisiki, Leonsia d/o Cleophace and Elizeus s/o Tinilao, at Kashasha Primary Court. H

The material facts, very briefly, were that the appellant is the brother of the first respondent. They belong to the same clan, whereas the second and third respondents are strangers to that clan. The first respondent inherited the relevant clan shamba from her father. On 11/5/86 she sold it to the second respondent, with the consent of clan I members, for shs.140,000/=. And on 12/9/86 the second respondent, for her part, sold the same shamba to the third respondent, again with the A consent of clan members, for shs. 300,000/=.

The Primary Court found both sales valid, and permitted the appellant to redeem the land upon payment to the third respondent the purchase money of shs. 300,000/=. The B District Court of Muleba, upon an appeal thereto by the appellant, upheld the decision of the Primary Court, and gave the appellant six months to pay the purchase money to the third respondent and redeem the shamba. The appellant still felt aggrieved, and hence this second appeal.

With respect, I am satisfied that both courts below erred in law by finding both sales C valid. They had both miserably missed the legal significance of the fact that the first respondent was a Buhaya woman in occupation of clan land. On the authority of rule 2 of the Local Customary Law (Declaration) No. 4 Order 1963 - GN 436 of 1963 - D the first respondent could not have legally disposed of the land to any person, and in any manner, even with the consent of the clan. The court of Appeal discussed at length the status of Buhaya females vis a vis clan land in Deocras Lutabana v Deus Kashaga (unreported) which is Civil Appeal No. 5 of 1981. E

The same question was also the central point for determination in the recent Court of Appeal decision in Rukuba Nteme v Bi Jalia Hassan and Gervas Baruti (unreported) which is Civil Appeal No. 19 of 1986. The golden thread that runs through these decisions of the Court of Appeal is that a Buhaya female heir, having inherited clan land, F has no more than a life interest in the land, which she could neither sell nor bequeath to any person whomsoever, even with the clan consent. That is the position in law regarding the status of Buhaya females vis a vis clan land.

It follows, therefore, that the first respondent was not entitled to sell the land in question G to the second respondent. In other words, that purported sale was null and void and did not pass any title to the second respondent. Equally null and void was the purported sale between the second respondent and the third respondent as there was no title to H pass. The position in law is that the question of the redemption of the land does not arise. The land is still legally in the hands of the first respondent for use during her lifetime. Of course she will have to refund the purchase price of shs.140,000/= to the second respondent, and it shall be for the third respondent to recover the purchase money of shs.300,000/= from the second respondent. The third respondent, in all fairness, is I entitled to be paid compensation in respect of unexhausted improvements, if any, made by him during his occupation of the land under the authority of the courts below - A that is from the date of the Primary Court judgment to the date of this court's judgment. The exact amount is to be properly assessed by the trial Primary Court after it has received evidence of the improvements made to the land during that period. And it is fair and just that such compensation as determined by the Primary Court has to be paid B by the first respondent to the third respondent since she is the one who is bound to derive immediate benefit from the land which must be vacated by the third respondent without delay.

In the result, I allow the appeal, quash and set aside the decisions of both courts below, C and hereby declare that the transaction of sale by first respondent to second respondent, and by second respondent to third respondent were, and still are, invalid. The first respondent is ordered to refund the purchase price of shs.140,000/= to the second respondent who, in her turn, is ordered to refund the purchase price of D shs.300.000/= to the third respondent. The first respondent to pay to the third respondent compensation for unexhausted improvements, if any, to be determined by the trial Primary Court as stated earlier in this judgment. The appellant to have his costs in this court and the courts below. E

Order accordingly.

Evidence - Corroboration - Complainant an unreliable character -Desirability of corroborative evidence. H

-Headnote

The appellant was charged with and convicted of obtaining money by false pretences. The trial court convicted him on the basis of evidence given by the complainant, the only witness for the prosecution, which evidence was not corroborated. On appeal, the court found that the prosecution witness was an unreliable character and his evidence was I "shaky".

RUGAKINGIRA J

Held: (i) In law the evidence of one witness, if believed, is sufficient to found a A conviction;

(ii) when a witness is unreliable it becomes desirable, if not necessary, to look for corroboration;

(iii) there could be no corroboration in this case not because of the peculiar B setting but largely because the complainant himself actively removed that possibility.

Munisi, for the Republic C
Lugakingira, J.: The appellant was convicted of obtaining money by false pretence c/s 302 of the Penal Code and was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. The charge D originally included two persons, the appellant appearing as accused No. 2, but the first accused was acquitted. It had been alleged that on 19th February, 1988 at Msasani Mikoroshini in Dar es Salaam, the two obtained 60,000/= from one Julius Mroso (the complainant) by falsely representing that they could multiply the money. E
The story of the case is a typical example of what has come to be known as utapeli. This term, I understand, encompasses all forms of trickery and artifice perpetrated for gain. The complainant was a welder based at Temeke in Dar es Salaam. His business was not doing well and he was having problems with his health. The first accused was his F business neighbour as well as a friend. The latter advised the complainant to see an expert for treatment and cleansing; indeed he introduced the complainant to the appellant as such expert.
It seems that this took place at the beginning of l981. I said it seems because the evidence is far from clear or consistent. Making the best of the situation, the complainant G appears to say that on being introduced to the appellant the latter proposed that they meet in the evening at a graveyard in Msasani. They met there just after 7 pm. It was dark. The appellant then burnt incense. In a moment the complainant heard voices, supposedly voices of the dead. He was terrified and impressed. They were then at a H tomb and the appellant declared that the complainant's business and health problems had been diagnosed. He advised the complainant to return for another session after a week. The complainant went back after two weeks apparently in the company of both I accused. It is not clear whether he got another 'treatment' but we are at least told that he was now asked whether he had money for the treatment. He did not have any and A was advised to find it or furnish two guarantors.

After some time the complainant sold a vehicle for 80,000/= and the appellant got to know the deal. My difficulties with the evidence may be this bit as to what followed. B

Mohamed came at home and found me and on the same day met at the city centre and that my lucky star has been found and I was called to the place and he gave me the letter Nyota yake imekwisha onekana. I went again for fear of spirits at Msasani and that now things could C go well since I have money which must multiply. I was solicited into taking the money for luckiness - zisafishwe ili zizae.

The passage suggests that the appellant intensified his representations when he became D aware of the complainant's financial standing. The complainant claimed to have taken 60,000/- and to have been accompanied by his young brother one Teophan Msoro. At the graveyard he gave the money to the appellant who laid it on a tomb. The appellant then asked the complainant to bring incense and perfumes for cleansing the money. E When he delivered these articles the following day he was told that the process would take a week. In two days it dawned on the complainant that he had been swindled. He demanded back his money but the appellant told him it was with the spirits. Indeed the F appellant was said to have extracted another 300/= from the complainant as a fee to talk to the spirits. In the end the complainant reported the matter to the police.

The appellant did not testify, electing to absent himself after the close of the prosecution case, nor did his counsel appear. That did not deter the trial court which proceeded to convict the appellant as aforesaid. The same counsel engaged by the appellant at the trial G drew and filed the petition of appeal but did not appear at the hearing. Suffice it to say that the petition consisted of three grounds, namely, that the appellant was not given an opportunity to defend himself, that the prosecution had not established its case beyond reasonable doubt, and that the evidence was shaky and called for corroboration. H

I think the complaint in the first ground is not justified. The record of the trial court leaves not doubt that the appellant was given the opportunity to defend himself but did not take it up, electing to absent himself on the appointed day. In the circumstances the trial court was justified in proceeding to pronounce judgment without hearing the appellant. The I procedure was fully authorised by the provisions of s.227 of the Criminal Procedure Act and the circumstances justified A recourse thereto. To that extent, therefore, I am unable to say that the trial court erred. I will next consider the third ground, the second ground being dependent on this.

I must confess that in the circumstances of this case the third ground assumes peculiar B significance. Perhaps I should start by pointing out that the complainant was the only witness for the prosecution. Mr. Kyuki, learned State Attorney, rightly submitted that in law the evidence of one witness, if believed, is sufficient to found a conviction. I also C agree with him that there is no necessity for corroboration for every witness. But is follows by implication that there may arise a situation where corroboration is desirable even if not necessary. I have unfortunately come to the view that this was a case where corroboration was desirable and I will demonstrate why. D

First of all, it is true that the evidence of the complainant was "shaky" as charged in the petition of appeal. The record testifies to the complainant's difficulties to make out a story although he was testifying some three months or less after the alleged events. He contradicted himself here and there, clumsily hopped from this to that fact, as if not E seized of the facts of his own experience. Above all it came out in cross-examination that he did not even know when, if at all, he parted with the money. His very words are again revealing. F

> I do not remember exactly when he took my money. I am not mistaken it was Saturday. It was April l (am) not sure 1988 ... Days has passed, I have forgotten. It is a long time since my money was stolen. It is February 1988, it is not April. G

This cross-examination took place in June 1988, but this was a "long time" from February or April, 1988 according to the complainant. How, when was the money taken - February or April, 1988? Could it in fact have been earlier than 1988 since the complainant was not even sure of the year? It must be obvious from all this that the H complainant was such an unreliable character that he could only attract anxiety rather than confidence. It is precisely when a witness is unreliable that it becomes desirable if not necessary to look for corroboration. That situation did arise here. I do not wish to venture into the superstitious grounding of the alleged transaction: the belief in and I practice of witchcraft; yet it is also tempting to ask whether a person who believes in the ability of 'talking tombs', rather than diligent work, to multiply his fortunes has that degree of A rationality which can commend itself to the confidence of a court of law.

When we turn to look for corroboration, it is wholly absent. Mr. Kyuki again observed that the setting of the alleged transaction - a graveyard, on a dark night - excluded the B possibility of corroboration. I am not so certain. It seems to me that the setting notwithstanding corroboration could have been obtained in this case but for the acts and omissions of the complainant himself. As seen earlier the complainant is supposed to have left for the rendezvous in the company of his young brother, Teophan Msoro. One C would have expected Teophan to witness the transaction, but he was not to.

The extent to which the complainant could be tantalising even in this regard is again underscored by his own words. D

> Money was in a bundle. He did not count, the accused No. 2. But I told him that it was 60,000/=. When I told him that it was 60,000/= Teophan heard. I went with him but left him behind. When I handed the money he was not there, but when I left home with shs.60,000/- my E brother accompanied him (sic). Besides me, no one else will testify to the effect.

In short there could be no corroboration in this case not because of the peculiar setting but largely because the complainant himself actively removed the possibility of it. F Alternatively, and most probably, he lied about the whole thing. He could not take his brother all the way to the graveyard only to discard him when his actual encounter with the witch and the passing of the money. It all goes to show how dangerous it was to rely on the complainant's bare word. I have therefore insufficient evidence to establish that G the appellant obtained 60,000/= or any amount from the complainant.

That, in my view, is sufficient to dispose of the appeal but there is one more aspect of the case which must be addressed. The inconsistency of the complainant makes it difficult to determine the purpose of the money, if any money was passed. At one time we are given H to understand that he was required to find money to pay for his treatment and even to furnish guarantors if he could not do so immediately. But when money is finally found it is not paid for the treatment but is now solicited for multiplication. For one thing, this inconsistency is yet another illustration of the extent to which the complainant could be I unreliable. But there is another aspect to it. There is a vast difference in law between obtaining money as a fee for a A purported treatment and obtaining the same for the purpose of multiplying it for the giver. In the former case the recipient obtains not only possession but also ownership of the money; in the latter possession only but not ownership is obtained, it being understood B that the money would be restored and possibly in a double state. An offence of obtaining money by false pretences under s. 302 of the Penal Code is not committed in possession only but also ownership if obtained in the money: see Omari v R. [1964] E.A. 162 and the English decisions cited therein. Where possession only is obtained the accused can C only be convicted of theft. In the instant case, is there were reliable evidence to establish that money passed, the appellant could properly have been convicted of theft. But as I have said, there was no such evidence so, that the conviction even for the offence charged cannot be sustained.

For these reasons, I allow the appeal, quash the conviction and sentence and order the D appellant's release from custody.

E Appeal allowed.

[zRPz]SMALL SIMBA SPORTS CLUB v MIEMBENI SPORTS CLUB 1988 TLR 1 (CA)

Court Court of Appeal of Tanzania - Zanzibar
Judge Makame JJA, Kisanga JJA and Omar JJA

6th January, 1988 B
Flynote
Administrative Law - Jurisdiction - Members of Zanzibar Sports Council whose tenure had lapsed - Whether competent to make effective decisions.
Civil Practice and Procedure - Procedure in High Court of Zanzibar - Party proceeded by C chamber summons - Whether permissible.
-Headnote
Appellants, Small Simba Sports Club, were alleged to have illegally fielded a player in a match against the respondents, Miembeni Sports Club. The respondents filed a complaint with the Zanzibar Football Association (ZFA) which declared the respondents winners D . Aggrieved, appellants appealed to the Zanzibar Sports Council (ZSC) which reversed the decision by ZFA. Undaunted, respondents appealed to the High Court of Zanzibar which quashed the decision on the ground that when ZSC purported to make its E decision, ZSC itself was non-existent. Counsel for appellants argued, on appeal to the Court of Appeal of Tanzania, inter alia, that the matter was not properly before the High Court for adjudication as respondents should have sought to have the matter removed into the High Court by way of originating summons and obtain leave to apply for an order of certiorari. They should not have gone to the High Court by way of chamber F summons.
Held: (i) Under s. 3(1) of the High Court Act, 1985, the High Court of Zanzibar has unlimited jurisdiction and hence can entertain cases brought to it by using various G procedures at the disposal of the parties.

(ii) ZSC members, their tenure having come to an end, had no jurisdiction to determine the dispute, hence their decision was null and void. H

(iii) there can be no appeal directly from ZFA to the High Court since such appeal lies to a properly constituted ZSC.

MAKAME JJA, KISANGA JJA AND OMAR JJA
A Case referred to:
1. Hemedi Marijani v Festo Ngowi [1975] LRT n. 66.
[zJDz]Judgment
Makame, Kisanga and Omar, JJ.A.: This eventful appeal is about football. Public B interest in it was conspicuously evident and the urgency with which the appeal had to be disposed of was impressed upon us in court. It was heard during the court vacation and when two members of the court were on their annual leave.
The parties are two sports clubs in Zanzibar. For facility of brevity they will hereinafter be C referred to simply as Small Simba and Miembeni, respectively. During the 1987 League Football season in Zanzibar they were matched against each other twice, in accordance with the rules. The first match was won by Miembeni and this was on 11th April 1987. On 23rd June 1987 when the two teams clashed again the tables were turned. Small Simba won that match and Miembeni filed a complaint with Zanzibar Football D Association, hereinafter referred to as Z.F.A., the body charged with the duty of superintending the game of football in Zanzibar. Among other things, Miembeni alleged that Small Simba had illegally fielded a player called Shaaban Mussa whom they had E acquired from Simba Football Club in Dar es Salaam without complying with the necessary transfer formalities obtaining in Zanzibar. ZFA found substance in the allegation and therefore declared Miembeni the winners of that controverted match. In turn Small Simba, being dissatisfied with that decision, appealed to the Zanzibar Sports Council, F also known as Baraza la Michezo Zanzibar, or BMZ for short, created by the Zanzibar Sports Council Act, Act No. 8 of 1983. BMZ reversed the decision made by ZFA and declared Small Simba, who had won the match on the field, the winners of that game. The present appeal before us is by Small Simba, now from the decision of the High G Court of Zanzibar, wherein Ramadhani C.J., on appeal by Miembeni, quashed the decision by BMZ, making a number of findings, one of them being that at the material time when the BMZ decision was purportedly made, the said BMZ was itself non-existent. This seems to us the crux of the matter.
H Before us Small Simba were represented by Mr. Maira, learned advocate, while Miembeni were advocated for by Mr. Muccadam, learned counsel. Both learned advocates fervently and strenously argued the appeal and we are thankful to them for their useful assistance. We wish also to place on record our grateful thanks to both I Counsel for putting at our disposal the various documents they deemed useful for our consideration.
MAKAME JJA, KISANGA JJA AND OMAR JJA
Mr. Maira for the appellants advanced five grounds against the learned Chief Justice's A decision and these may be grouped into three:
1. That the matter was not properly before the High Court for adjudication as it was not preceeded by certain formalities of procedure. B
We incidentally note here, with satisfaction, that learned Counsel did not pursue the stand adopted by BMZ in the High Court that in any event the C High Court was devoid of power to hear the matter because it was provided that BMZ decisions are final. The learned Chief Justice correctly construed Regulation 17 of GN 155 of 1985 to mean that such decisions can only be final within certain limits and limitations, beyond which the High Court's D power to enquire into such decisions is not ousted.

2. That the learned Chief Justice applied inappropriate Football Regulations and was wrong to sustain the ZFA decision, and

3. That the learned Chief Justice should have directed that the matter be heard by a properly constituted BMZ. E

For the purpose of determining this appeal we think there was a good deal of chaff from which we must separate the grain. The two really relevant and important issues we have to consider and decide upon are whether the matter was properly before the High Court, in terms of procedure that is, as already indicated; and secondly, whether or not we can F sustain the learned Chief Justice's holding that "Hivyo ninakubaliana kabisa na uamuzi wa Z.F.A. na nitatofautiana na ule wa Baraza AMBALO KWA KWELI HALIKUWA LA HALALI." (Capital Letters employed for the sake of emphasis). G

Mr. Muccadam urged that the procedure adopted to reach the High Court was quite proper in the circumstances and further submitted that the learned Chief Justice's finding that there was not in existence a BMZ to which Small Simba could have appealed was quite justified. H

According to Mr. Maira the respondents should have sought to have the matter removed into the High Court by way of originating summons and obtain leave to apply for an order of certiorari: They should not have come by way of Chamber Summons and proceeded the way they did. During the learned exchanges in court, however, Mr. Maira conceded I that certiorari was not the only remedy in such

A a situation. Instead of obtaining leave to apply for that order a party could reach High Court, for example by way of review or by way of a suit. Under section 3(1) of the High Court Act, 1985, the High Court of Zanzibar has unlimited jurisdiction and we do not agree with Mr. Maira's suggestion that Miembeni could only have gone there by way of B originating summons. This was in effect a suit brought in substantial compliance with the Civil Procedure Decree.

On the second vital issue the learned Chief Justice had this to say:

C Ni dhahiri kwangu pia kuwa muda wa miaka miwili wa hawa wajumbe umekwisha. Kwa niaba ya Miembeni imeelezewa kuwa Baraza lilianza kazi tarehe 1 Julai 1984. Tarehe hiyo haikukanushwa kwa niaba ya Baraza na wala haikutolewa tarehe yeyote. Hivyo nachukulia D kuwa tarehe ni hiyo ya Julai 1, 1984.

Computing two years from July 1, 1984 we find that the life span of the BMZ ended on 30th June, 1986. The purported BMZ decision was made on 28th July 1987. We do not E wish to spend argument on the position of ex officio members in the BMZ, how many of these were on the Executive Committee which made the purported BMZ decision etc., because these matters would be relevant only if we were satisfied that there was at the material time a BMZ in existence. The evidence available establishes that the learned Chief Justice was correct in holding that BMZ was non-existent at the material time. If F there was any doubt over this, and we are satisfied there was none, it was removed by a Government Press Release made available one day after the High Court judgment was delivered. The High Court judgment was delivered on 19/8/87, the Press Release was on the morrow. According to the Press Release, a now BMZ was consituted on that day, G 19/8/87, to take over from the previous one which had lapsed the previous February 12th, that is 12/2/87. So that even by this reckoning there was now BMZ in existence when the purported BMZ decision was made on 28th July, 1987. If, as Mr. Maira says, H the old BMZ was filling a vacuum before the new appointment, we only wish to say that however well-meaning they might have been they were incapax, they simply had no authority to stand in for an institution which had ceased to exist. Mr. Maira conceeded that to extend the life span of BMZ is not one of the powers conferred on the Minister I responsible for Sports and, in any event, the Minister did not pretend to have such powers. As there was no BMZ in existence, Mr. Maira cannot rely on the authority of Hemedi A Marijani v Festo Ngowi [1975] LRT No. 66 for the proposition that Ramadhani Chief Justice should have remitted the matter back to a properly constituted BMZ. There was none in existence at the material time and the learned Chief Justice had of course no B powers to order the formation of a BMZ. It would have been futile for the High Court to make orders it had no power to follow up. In Marijani v Ngowi there was already the Rent Tribunal in existence.

The position is now therefore that because there was no BMZ in existence at the material C time there was no BMZ decision. The so-called BMZ decision upsetting the ZFA decision declaring Miembeni the winners is therefore null and void. The ZFA decision therefore stands. There can be no appeal directly from ZFA to the High Court. Appeal from a ZFA decision lies to a properly constituted BMZ. D

This appeal by Small Simba is without merit and is hereby dismissed with costs.

By way of postscript and hopefully without stepping on anybody's toes, we wish to associate ourselves with the suggestion made by the learned Chief Justice that BMZ E would do well to avail itself of legal guidance. We wish to add that we were practically bewildered by the labyrinth of almost perennial crops of Regulations and Addenda issuing from ZFA which is an institution under BMZ.

Appeal dismissed. F

The accused failed to appear in court and his wife informed the Court that he had travelled to Dar es Salaam in search of a lawyer to defend him but missed a return flight to Mtwara. Gregory Ruheza was summoned and ordered to pay the expenses of Shs. B 375/= for a witness from Bukoba and Shs. 240/= for a witness from Masasi or surety was to forfeit his bail bond.

On 19th June, 1980 the accused was not in court and the trial magistrate was informed by the surety the reasons for the absence of the accused namely the flight from Dar es Salaam to Mtwara had been cancelled. Court ordered forfeiture of surety's bond of Shs. C 50,000/=. Surety could not raise Shs. 50,000/= as a result was committed to prison. He appealed against the order.

Held: (i) The trial magistrate's ruling is not a fair reflection of the facts for it is clear that D the absence of the accused had been caused by circumstances beyond his control;

(ii) at the time of the hearing there was no advocate resident in Mtwara, the accused trip to Dar es Salaam could not be viewed as an attempt of the accused to jump bail. In the circumstances, asking the surety to forfeit Shs. 50,000/= bail bond was not E justified;

(iii) not justified also was the order that the surety pay Shs. 375/= for a witness from Bukoba and Shs. 240/= for a witness from Masasi;

F (iv) it is out of order for the court to order the surety to pay more than Shs. 50,000/=, the sum he had undertaken to pay when signing the bail bond.

[zJDz]Judgment

G Rubama, J.: Gregory Ruheza had stood surety in the sum of shs. 50,000/= for Joseph Mapema who had been accused of several offences under the Penal Code. On 16th June, 1980 Joseph Mapema, the accused, was not in court and his wife informed the court that her husband had gone to Dar es Salaam in search of a lawyer to defend him but had unfortunately missed a return flight to Dar es Salaam. The case was H adjourned to the next day the 17th June, 1980 when it was again adjourned to 19th June, 1980. Gregory Ruheza the accused's surety who had been summoned informed the court that he had been in contact with the accused, Joseph Mapema who had promised I to return to Mtwara as soon as possible. He further assured the court that he was in the process of arranging an air ticket for the accused to come to Mtwara from Dar es Salaam. With this explanantion A the trial court made the following order:

The surety is ordered to pay the expenses of Shs. 375/= for a witness from Bukoba and Shs. 240/= for a witness from Masasi, or surety to forfeit his bail bond, whichever is less. Hearing adjourned to 19/6/80. B

On the 19th June, 1980 the accused was not in court and the trial magistrate was informed by the surety the reasons for the absence of the accused namely the flight from Dar es Salaam to Mtwara had been cancelled. The response to this information by the C court is as detailed below:

This case was to be heard on 16/6/80 and witnesses have come from Bukoba and Dar es Salaam, only to find what the accused is no where to be seen. D

The surety signed a bond of shs. 50,000/= to be forfeited in case the accused fails to turn up. Consequently, therefore, the surety now forfeits this bond of Shs. 50,000/= after he has failed to produce the accused person. E

Order: Mention on 3/7/80.

The surety is to forfeit his bail bond of Shs. 50,000/= or six (6) months imprisonment in default. F

The surety appears to have failed to pay Shs. 50,000/= bond and was committed to prison. He has appealed against the court order and is fortunately on bail pending determination of this appeal. To gain speed, I decided to deal with the subject exercising G my revisional jurisdiction. It has not apparently been easy to serve the appellant to appear in court.

Having gone through the record, I see no justification for the above mentioned order made by the trial magistrate. The trial magistrate's ruling is not a fair reflection of the facts H for it is clear that the absence of the accused had been caused by circumstances beyond his control; neither the accused nor the surety could have done anything about it. At the time of the hearing of this case there was no advocate living in Mtwara; the accused's travel to Dar es Salaam in search of an advocate could therefore not be I viewed in the light of an attempt by the accused to jump bail. The accused had

A every right to go in search of an advocate of his choice. His failure to return to Mtwara in good time was forced on him by unavailability of air transport from Dar es Salaam to Mtwara. He could do nothing about that situation and court was not put in darkness regarding that aspect. The heavy dependence on air transport to this town especially during the time when the case was for hearing could not have been a disputable fact. In B the circumstances asking the surety to forfeit Shs. 50,000/= bail bond was not justified. Not justified also was the order made on the 17th June, 1980 that the surety pay Shs. 375/- for a withness from Bukoba and shs. 240/= for a witness from Masasi.

C When this order is considered together with that made on the 19th June, 1980, it is clear that the court had ordered the surety to pay more than shs. 50,000/= a sum that he the surety had undertaken to pay when signing the bail bond. This is obviously out of order.

D For the various reasons detailed above the forfeiture order of Shs. 50,000/= bail bond made in respect of surety as well as payment of expenses in respect of witnesses from Bukoba and Masasi are hereby set aside. The surety is discharged.

E Order accordingly.

Sekule, J.: The applicant Fatehali Murji is applying to this court under section 44 of the F Magistrates' Court Act, 1984 and/or section 79 and section 95 of the Civil Procedure Code for revision of the ruling of the Resident Magistrate at Kisutu in Civil Case No. 44 of 1987.

The background of the case as can be gathered from the documents filed by the parties is G that the respondent in the application one H.P. Banji was or is a legal tenant of a flat on Plot No. 4-27 United House, Uhuru/Swahili Street Dar es Salaam hereinafter to be referred to as the suit premises since 1965. He became a tenant of the Registrar of H Buildings after the coming into force of the Acquisition of Building Act, 1971 in 1971.

Sometime in November, 1984 the respondent left for Canada and left the suit premises with the applicant with the understanding that, the applicant would vacate and handover the said suit premises to him upon his return to Dar es Salaam. I

SEKULE J

A On the other hand the applicant contends that he is an employee of Messrs Chemi Products Ltd. This is a limited liability Company incorporated in Mainland Tanzania. Sometime in 1984 his employer, that is Chemi Products Ltd. made arrangements with the respondent who was then living in Canada for him as a member of staff of the said Chemi B Products Ltd. to use and occupy the suit premises. Before that correspondences had been exchanged between his employer and the Registrar of Buildings as well as with the respondent. These correspondences were attached to the affidavit of the applicant and collectively marked as Exhibit A.

C The essence of these correspondences is that the respondent allowed or gave partial use of his flat to Chemi Products Ltd. to house their staff. The arrangement was approved or authorised by the Registrar of Buildings.

The applicant further contends that he has been residing in that flat for about 21/2 years D now and that his employers are paying rent directly to the Registrar of Buildings.

Be that as it may, the respondent returned to Tanzania in or about January, 1987 and asked the applicant to vacate and handover the suit premises to him by June, 1987. The E applicant failed or refused to do so despite the respondent's demands. As a result the respondent filed a suit in the Resident Magistrates Court of Dar es Salaam at Kisutu seeking the following:

1. An order that the applicant be moved out and hand over immediate F possession of the suit premises to the respondent.
2. Damages.
3. Costs.
4. Such further reliefs as the court may deem fit.

G It was also contended by the respondent that as from June, 1987, the applicant was a trespasser in the suit premises.

Before the hearing of the suit in the Resident Magistrate Court, Mr. Majithia learned H counsel who represented the applicant in the Resident Magistrates Court as well as in the application before this court, raised a preliminary objection to the effect that the Resident Magistrate Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit by virtue of section 12(1) of the Rent Restriction Act, 1985. He contended that the case was within the purview of the I Rent Restriction Act 1985.

On the other hand Mr. Muccadam learned counsel for the
SEKULE J
respondent in the Resident Magistrates Court and before this Court, contended that as A the suit was based on trespass and there was no landlord and tenant relationship the Resident Magistrate Court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the suit. The applicant was only an invitee and the respondent having come back he had the right to re-occupy the suit premises. B
The Resident Magistrate Court, after considering learned counsels' submissions found and held that the cause of action was trespass and that there was no landlord and tenant relationship. The case was therefore not within the purview of the Rent Restriction Act, 1985. The applicant was therefore ordered to file his written statement of defence within C three weeks from the date of the court's ruling to enable the suit to proceed in the Resident Magistrate Court.
Mr. Majithia learned counsel for the applicant contends that this ruling was not correct in law and hence this application before this court. D
Like in the Resident Magistrates Court, Mr. Majithia learned counsel has submitted before the court that the Resident Magistrate Court has no jurisdiction to entertain this suit. The case is within the competence of the Regional Housing Tribunal. It was his E submission that the Rent Restriction Act, 1985 applies to all dwelling houses and the suit filed was for possession of a dwelling house. He made reference to sections 2, 12(1)(h), 25 and 46 of the Rent Restriction Act, and he cited a number of authorities, namely, Valji Keshav Oza v C.P. Jani and Sons [1957] E.A. 184, Gangabai Harji v Bhoja Keshav [1957] EA 304, Suleman Ibrahim v Awadhi Said [1963] E.A. 179 and F Kitundu Sisal Estate and others v Shingo Mshuti [1970] HCD page 229 inter alia as can be seen in his list of authorities filed in this file.
On the other hand Mr. Muccadam learned counsel for the respondent submitted that G respondent left the house to the applicant and that when he came back and wanted the suit premises back, the applicant has failed and refused to move out. He is a trespasser. He further submitted that protection is given to tenants and that where there is no tenant and land lord relation-ship the Rent Restriction Act, 1985 does not apply. The matter H was therefore within the competence of the Resident Magistrate's Court.
I have considered this matter. Without going into the merits of the case which will be examined and considered by the relevant organ in the course of the hearing of this matter; and after carefully considering the facts as disclosed in the affidavits and counter affidavit I filed by the parties and the correspondences exchanged,
SEKULE J
A (Exhibit A) before the applicant moved into the suit premises, I am of the view this dispute falls within the provisions of the Rent Restriction Act, 1985.
The applicant appears to have moved into the suit premises with the approval and B permision of the respondent and the Registrar of Buildings the land lord in as far as the suit premises are concerned. In these circumstances therefore one of the possible issues that could arise for consideration is that what was or is the applicant's status if any in the suit premises. Is he a sub-tenant in terms of sections 36 and 37 of the Rent Restriction C Act, 1985 or/and what rights if any does he have in the suit premises.

These in my view are matters within the purview of the provisions of the Rent Restriction Act, 1985 and the competence of the Regional Housing Tribunal to inquire, consider and determine. With respect, it does not appear in my opinion to be a case of trespass per se D as contendent by Mr. Muccadam, learned counsel for the respondent.

Further, since the applicant is at the material time in occupation of the suit premises, the Regional Housing Tribunal has jurisdiction to deal with this dispute in terms of section E 12(1)(h) of the Rent Restriction Act, 1985. There is no dispute that Dar es Salaam is a rent restriction area. Section 12(1) reads:

The tribunal shall, in relation to every rent restriction area within its jurisdiction, have power to do all things which it is required or empowered to do by or under the provisions of this Act and F without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing shall have power:

(h) to make orders upon such terms and conditions as it shall think fit for the recovery of G possession and for the payment of arrears of rent and means profit which orders may be applicable to any person, whether or not he is a tenant, being at any material time in occupation of any premises.

H For the reasons outlined hereinabove. I am of the view and do hold that the Resident Magistrate Court did not have jurisdiction to entertain this case. The suit is within the competence of the Regional Housing Tribunal.

I In the exercise of the powers under section 44(b) of the Magistrates Courts Act, 1984, I would and do hereby quash the ruling of the Resident Magistrates Court.

It is further ordered that the suit be transferred to the Regional Housing Tribunal for A inquiry and determination.

MROSO J

A Mroso, J.: The accused was prosecuted in the Court of Resident Magistrate, Iringa for stealing five head of cattle valued at shillings 50,000/=. That being an economic crime offence it was made triable by that court upon a certificate of the Principal State Attorney, under section 12(3) of the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act, 1984. B The accused was duly convicted and was sentenced to 12 years imprisonment by Mr. Kajeri, Senior Resident Magistrate. He does not appear to have filed any appeal. During routine examination of the returns from the Court of Resident Magistrate, Iringa the record in respect of this case was called for inspection. Upon inspection it was ordered C that a revision record be opened, to consider whether the learned Senior Resident Magistrate was competent to award the sentence of twelve years imprisonment on the accused.

D During the revision proceedings Mr. Lundu, learned state attorney, submitted that the learned senior resident magistrate was empowered by section 170 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985 to impose that sentence, because it is provided in a saving under subsection (2) of that section that the section "does not apply in respect of any sentence E passed by a senior resident magistrate of any grade or rank".

What the learned State Attorney is saying, in other words, is that a resident magistrate of or above the rank of Senior resident magistrate has the same sentencing powers as the High Court, and that is the import of the saving in section 170(2) of the Criminal F Procedure Act, 1985.

Section 166 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985 provides for the sentencing powers of the High Court. It says that the High Court may pass any sentence or make any order authorised by law, (my underlining for emphasis). Does the saving in section 170(2) of G the Criminal Procedure Act confer on Senior Resident Magistrates the sentencing powers under section 166 of that Act?

It is true that the saving under section 170(2) says that "this section shall not apply in respect of any sentence passed by a Senior Resident Magistrate...." A proviso in section H 7(2) of the Repealed Criminal Procedure Code, Cap. 20 of the laws, which is the equivalent of the saving in section 170(2) of the Criminal Procedure Act, also appeared to say that section 7 of the Criminal Procedure Code on the sentencing powers of a subordinate Court did not apply "in respect of any sentence passed by a Senior Resident I Magistrate." So, on a superficial reading of the saving already referred to the learned State Attorney would appear to be right in his submission.

MROSO J

But in fact, with respect, he is wrong. A

The saving cited above appears immediately after the substantive provisions of subsection (2) of section 170 of the Criminal Procedure Act which stipulates:

(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (1) - B

(a) a sentence of imprisonment

(i) for a scheduled offence, which exceeds the minimum terms of imprisonment prescribed in respect of it by the Minimum Sentences Act, 1972;

(ii) for any other offence, which exceeds twelve months; C

(b) a sentence of corporal punishment which exceeds twelve strokes;

(c) a sentence of a fine or for the payment of money (other than payment of D compensation under the Minimum Sentences Act, 1972) which exceeds six thousand shillings; shall not be carried into effect, executed or levied until the record of the case, or a certified copy of it, has been transmitted to the High Court and the sentence or order has been confirmed by a Judge. E

Then follows the saving.

It is quite clear, and logically so, that the saving relates to the provisions of subsection (2), and not to the whole of section 170.

In subsection (1) of section 170 it is stated and I quote for ease of reference:- F

170 (1) A subordinate Court may, in the cases in which such sentences are authorized by law, pass the following sentences - G

(a) imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years; save that where a court convicts a person for a scheduled offence, it may, if such sentence is authorized by law, pass a H sentence of imprisonment for such offence for a term not exceeding eight years;

(b) a fine not exceeding twenty thousand shillings;

(c) subject to the provisions of the Corporal Punishment Ordinance, corporal punishment. (My underlining for emphasis). I

MROSO J

A What this means is that a subordinate court (unless it has indented jurisdiction under section 173 of the Criminal Procedure Act) whether held by a District Magistrate, a resident magistrate, a senior resident magistrate or a Principal Resident Magistrate, cannot impose a sentence of more than five years imprisonment for a non-scheduled B offence, or more than eight years imprisonment for a scheduled offence. However, even though all District Magistrates and all Resident Magistrates are empowered to impose the sentences cited above, a sentence of imprisonment which exceeds 12 months, for a non-scheduled offence, and the minimum sentence, for a scheduled offence, shall need C confirmation by a Judge, unless the sentences are passed by a resident magistrate who is of or above the rank of Senior Resident Magistrate. The word "section" in both the proviso to section (7(2) of the Repealed Criminal Procedure Code and the saving in subsection (2) of Section 170 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985 was a drafting D inadvertence. The correct word which was intended by the legislature is "Subsection". The legislature could not have intended to confer on Senior Resident Magistrates and resident magistrates above such rank High Court sentencing powers so casually.

E I have not been able (from our resources here) to find much discussion on the sentencing powers of Senior Resident Magistrates. However, I am in a way supported on the views I have expressed above by a decision of Makame, Ag. J. - as he then was - in the case of Yusuf s/o Issa v R. [1970] H.C.D. n. 275. The appellant in that case, who F had been convicted by the subordinate court on two counts of robbery contrary to sections 285 and 286 of the Penal Code, was sentenced to three years imprisonment on one count and four years imprisonment on the second count, the sentences to run concurrently, plus 24 strokes of corporal punishment. He appealed to the High Court G against sentence only. On appeal Makame, Ag. J. held:

The Criminal Procedure Code (Amendment) Act 1963 notes after the new Seventh Schedule that the old sections 7, 8 and 9 of the Criminal Procedure Code are amended so that among H other things, a subordinate court may pass (a sentence of) up to five years for a scheduled offence, (this must have been before the passing of Act No. 2 of 1972) but:

"Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (1) of this section, a sentence of imprisonment I for a scheduled offence which exceeds the minimum terms of imprisonment prescribed in relation to that offence by subsection (2) of section 4 of the Minimum Sentences Act 1963 by A more than six months ..... etc. (unless it is awarded by a senior resident magistrate) shall not be carried into effect ... etc. unless the sentence or order has been confirmed by the High Court".

The trial magistrate in this case was not a senior resident magistrate .... The maximum term B the trial magistrate could impose without confirmation, therefore, was .... (My underlining).

What is being said by Makame, Ag. J. (as he then was) is that the proviso to section 7(2) C of the repealed Criminal Procedure Code on what does not apply to a senior resident magistrate is the requirement for confirmation of certain sentences passed by the subordinate court, not that the whole of section 7 of the Criminal Procedure Code did D not apply to senior resident magistrates.

Another comment on the sentencing powers of a subordinate court can be found in A Handbook on Sentencing by Brian Slattery, published by the Faculty of Law of the University of Dar es Salaam, Tanzania in 1970. At page 1 of the book Slattery said: E the power of District and Primary Courts to impose particular sentences is sharply restricted by contrast with the High Court, which alone has jurisdiction to sentence up to the full limits specified above (a list had been drawn by the author of different offences and their maximum F sentences) (Underlining is mine for emphasis).

So, it has always been the correct view that all District Magistrates and all Resident Magistrates of whatever grade or rank have no power or jurisdiction to impose G sentences which are higher than as provided in subsection (1) of Section 170 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985 and that the saving in subsection (2) of Section 170 relates only to the stipulations contained in that subsection (2).

From the above discussion it follows that the learned Senior Resident Magistrate had no H power or jurisdiction to impose on the accused the sentence of twelve years imprisonment. At the time of hearing the revision proceedings three days ago I quashed that sentence and set it aside. I substituted thereof a sentence of 8 years imprisonment, which is the highest sentence a subordinate court could impose in the offence of cattle I theft, even if it were still

Makame, Kisanga and Omar, JJ.A.: The Director of Public Prosecutions, A represented by Mr. Sengwaji Senior State Attorney, is appealing against the ruling of the Economic Crimes Court, Mbeya, presided over by Mroso, J., in which it was decided, in short, that the possession of Government Trophy, per se, is not an economic offence under the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act, 1984. Mr. Bateyunga, learned B advocate, resisted the appeal on behalf of the respondent, and sought to support the trial court's decision.

In the Economic Crimes Court the respondent was charged with unlawful possession of C Government Trophies, contrary to Paragraph 16(b) of the First Schedule and section 59 (2), both of the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act, 1984, as read together with section 67(1) of the Wildlife Conservation Act, 1974. The allegation was that the respondent was found in unlawful possession of eight pieces of elephant tusks. Before he D was asked to plead, the court, on its own volition, invited counsel on both sides to address it on a preliminary point - whether, as aforesaid, the unlawful possession of government trophy per se, is an economic offence. Mrs. Makulu, learned State Attorney, submitted to the trial court that it is an economic offence and advanced an argument E which was, with respect, not particularly logical. It seems to us that the learned State Attorney's stand was as follows: You cannot be a trophy dealer, as defined under section 2 of the Wildlife Conservation Act, 1974, without being in possession of the trophy you are dealing in, and because trophy dealing is an offence under the Economic F and Organized Crime Control Act, unlawful possession is also such offence. Now this sort of reasoning is very clearly untenable and arid of logic. Mr. Bateyunga, who also appeared for the respondent in the court below, submitted before us that the court below was right and pointed out that unlawful possession of Government Trophy is not the only G offence under the Wildlife Conservation Act which does not constitute an economic offence.

Mr. Sengwaji had an up-hill task and we think that he knew as much. After Mr. H Bateyunga had concluded his submissions Mr. Sengwaji said simply "I don't think it is necessary to respond". We are not surprised.

Mr. Sengwaji had tried to seek help from the definition of an 'economic offence' in the Act. An 'Economic Offence' is defined as any offence triable under this Act", and I section 2(2) provides

MAKAME JJA, KISANGA JJA AND OMAR JJA

A that "All offences created by or punishable under the First Schedule to this Act shall be referred to as economic offences". This does not carry us anywhere for the purpose of the issue raised by the court below. Mr. Sengwaji also invited us to look at the Preamble to the Act and the marginal note to Para 16 of the First Schedule. With B respect, the Preamble does not help the D.P.P.'s appeal at all. The marginal note says 'Offences against conservation of Wildlife Act 1974' and the Para 16 says which ones of those are economic crimes. The pivot of the argument by both Mroso, J. and his lay members, as well as Mr. Bateyunga, appears to us to be that unlawful possession is not included, and they say deliberately so, in the list of Para 16 - Offences. We shall return to C this as it seems to us quite central in the whole argument.

Mr. Sengwaji finally pleaded with us to say that the Economic Crimes Court was in error for the reason that "Dealing" under Section 67 was the most notorious offence when the D Act was passed and Parliament must have intended to curb Unlawful Possession without which there could be no Dealing which was, in most cases, difficult to prove. Well, Dealing might have been 'most notorious' indeed but that can be no good reason for deliberately fracturing the clear provisions of the law. Further, even if it is true that E there can be no Dealing without Possession, and we express no opinion on that, for we do not think this is the right occasion for us to do so, in pure logic that does not make every Unlawful Possession a Dealing.

F With respect, we think that Mroso, J. and his lay members have advanced very lucid and compelling arguments in support of their views and we are convinced that their opinion is sound. We wish to express the same thing in a different manner, thus:

G It is an economic offence triable by the Economic Crimes Court to deal in trophies or in Government trophies, under Paragraph 16 of the First Schedule to the Act. That would be an Economic offence by virtue of its being an offence under section 67 of the Wildlife Conservation act 1974. (Unlawful) Possession is not the only offence under the said section 67. It is also an offence, under the section, to buy, sell or otherwise deal in H any Government trophy. Para 16 of the First Schedule under reference says:

Any person is guilty of an offence under this paragraph who

(a) (Not Applicable)

I (b) Unlawfully deals in trophies or in Government trophies,

(c) (Not Applicable)

MAKAME JJA, KISANGA JJA AND OMAR JJA

Contrary to section 10, 11, 35 (which have to do with hunting in game reserves; A capturing, wounding, molesting protected animals etc.), Part VI (which deals with 'Dealing in Trophies), section 67 (our relevant section) and 71 (to do with weapons), of the Wildlife Conservation Act ...."

Obviously section 10, 11, 14 and 35 are irrelevant. The 'Dealing' the Act talks about B under Part VI means to engage in the buying, selling, cutting, carving, polishing, cleaning mounting, preserving or processing of trophies, as defined under section 2, plus, more specifically, transferring, exporting and importing trophies without the necessary permits, licences, and certificates. None of the above would, in our view, accommodate Unlawful C Possession without more. One may conceivably be tempted to say that 'Preserving' under section 2 of the Wildlife Conservation Act is to keep in one's possession or to retain, as such. This would be out of tune with the most of the relevant portion of the section and would offend the Ejusdem Generis rule. In the context to preserve must mean D to keep from decay or degeneration, to make it lasting. We have made this little remark so as to avoid conceivable doubt.

We promised to come back to the argument regarding Para 16. As remarked, a section 67 offence is decleared to be a Para 16 Offence therefore on the face of it it would be an E economic offence. The correct argument is that although Unlawful Possession is a section 67 offence, so that on the face of it it would amount to an economic offence, it is not an economic offence for the simple reason that Para 16 does not embrace all section 67 offences i.e. Possession or Buying, Selling or otherwise dealing in any Government F Trophy. From Section 67 Para 16 picks out only Unlawful Dealing in Trophies or Government Trophies. And as aforesaid, Dealing is defined; it is a term of art; and it does not include Unlawful Possession as such. G

We have digested and carefully considered the rival arguments and, having done so, we are of the firm view that the one leading to the conclusion that Unlawful Possession of Government Trophy, per se is not an economic offence under the Economic And Organized Crime. H

Control Act 1984 is formidable and sound. Accordingly, we dismiss the appeal by the Republic and uphold the Economic Crimes Court's decision.

We wish to commend the particular Economic Crimes Court for initiating the debate, on an occasion so meet and right, which led to the matter being properly placed before us I for consideration

A and decision. We think it is desirable that the matter is now settled for we gather that there were conflicting decisions in the High Court. With respect, however, we wish in passing to observe that the various examples of unlawful possession of Government trophies which the court below remarked do not raise serious public outcry may not be B without controversy. Such examples given include hired porters who carry Government trophies, and "drivers of big lorries which transport large quantities of Government trophies for unlawful sale within or outside the country". In fact some people might say some of the examples given amount to Dealing, but at this stage we can say no more than C that. "There is a place and season for everything".

Appeal dismissed.

Mwalusanya, J.: The respondent Daniel s/o Sekao is a lawful owner of a plot No. 25 BK 'R' along Uhuru Street in Bukoba Township. He has a right of occupancy C L.O.S.215/76 of 18/1/1985 for 99 years as evidenced in Title deed No.003008/33 of 29/1/1987. He has a building permit of 1/2/1986 issued by the appellant; and pursuant to that permit, the respondent began to develop his land in early 1986.

On 25/4/1987 the appellant, the Town Director of Bukoba Township, wrote a letter to D the respondent ordering him to stop developing the plot in question on the ground that the Town Authority intended to apply to the President to revoke the right of occupancy in question. It is said that the Town Aurthority has earmarked the plot in question as a E recreation ground or something to that effect. However the respondent successfully challenged the 'stop order' in question in the lower court. Aggrieved by the decision of the lower court, the Town Director of Bukoba Township has now appealed to this Court.

At the hearing of the appeal Mr. Rutakolezibwa Counsel for the Town Director F produced a letter in Court (Exh. A dated 9/1/1988) from the Ministry of Lands headquarters, signed by one Mr. Mango on behalf of the Director of Town Planning, purporting to revoke the right of occupancy granted to the respondent.

Even if the said Director of Town Planning had a right of revocation of a right of G occupancy, still this would not be of any assistance to the Town Director as, on 25/4/1987 when the stop order was issued, there was no revocation yet of the right of occupancy. So obviously the trial court was right to hold that the Town Director had no right to issue the stop order of development of the plot owned by the respondent. The H Town Director's order was rightly vacated.

But even then, the purported revocation of the right of occupancy by the Director of Town Planning made on 9/1/1988 is obviously null and void, as the said officer has no I power to make a revocation. That power of revocation of occupancy is vested in the

A President of the United Republic of Tanzania as provided under s.10 of the Land Ordinance Cap 113 and the President has to do so for a good cause. And the revocation order has to be published in the Government Gazette if it has to have any force of law. Counsel for the Town Director Mr. Ruta conceded that much, at the hearing of the B appeal.

Therefore so far the respondent is entitled and empowered to develop the land in question. Once the revocation is done by a lawful authority, then the development will cease, and the respondent will be paid compensation for all the unexhausted C improvements he has carried on the land. The ball is in the court of the Town Director to move the President for a revocation. But it will be invidious to accede to a prayer for a stop order of develpment of the land, when we do not know that the revocation will ever take effect. This court will not act on conjecture and speculation. In the event the appeal D is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

On 26/2/1977 the appellant (Sarjit Singh) was offered a right of occupancy over Plot A No. 978 Msasani Peninsula, Dar es Salaam by the Kinondoni District Land Office. The offer was contained in letter of offer Ref. No. D/KN/A 9782/AOM dated 26th February, 1977. On 20/3/1980 the District Land Development Officer Kinondoni, wrote the appellant a letter Ref D/KN/A 9782 JRC of 20/3/1980 by which he revoked the B appellant's right of occupancy and offered it to the respondent (Sebastian Christom) who was finally issued a certificate of occupancy for the plot. The appellant is appealing to the High Court after being dissatisfied by the judgment and decree of the Resident Magistrate's Court. C
The appellant's advocate argued that the District Land Officer has no power in law to revoke a right of occupancy duly granted. He added that the Resident Magistrate erred in law in considering the certificate of occupancy as constituting the right of occupancy D itself. That the learned magistrate ought to have held that the right of occupancy vested in the appellant immediately after he accepted the offer of right of occupancy. The respondent's advocate argued, inter alia, that title to land vests only when a certificate is issued.
Held: (i)A right of occupancy is created by the approval of the applicant's application for E the grant of the same (i.e. a right of occupancy) and the acceptance by the applicant of the granted right;

(ii) the revocation by the District Land Officer was of no effect as it was made by someone who had no power to revoke titles as provided for under section 10 the Land Ordinance (Cap. 113). F

[zJDz]Judgment
Kyando, J.: This appeal arises out of the judgment and decree of the Resident Magistrate's Court of Dar es Salaam, at Kisutu, whereby the respondent Sebastin I Christom was declared the person legally entitled to Plot No. 978, Msasani Peninsula, Dar
KYANDO J
A es Salaam, as against the appellant Sarjit Singh. At the hearing of the appeal Mr. Raithatha, learned advocate, appeared for the appellant and Dr. Tenga of the Legal Consultancy Services, Faculty of Law University of Dar es Salaam, appeared for the respondent.

The facts of the case are simple, although the legal issues which arise for determination B are not as simple. Very briefly on 26/2/77 the appellant was offered a right of occupancy over the plot mentioned hereinabove by the Kinondoni District Land Office. The offer was contained in a Letter of Offer Ref. No. D/KN/A9782/AOM dated 26th February, C 1977. It was tendered in evidence at the trial and marked as Exh. P.A. Mohinder Sigh (PW1) who said he was appellant's brother and was acting for him (the appellant) paid all the fees for the plot and apparently supplied all the information required in the Letter of Offer on behalf of the appellant. He also obtained a building permit from the City Council, Dar es Salaam, to build on the plot.

D On 20/3/1980 the District Land Development Officer, Kinondoni, wrote the appellant a letter, Ref. D/KN/A9782/JRC of 20/3/1980 (in file Exh. D4) by which he revoked the appellant's right of occupancy over the plot. Upon the revocation a right of occupancy E over the plot, the same plot was offered to the respondent, (by letter of offer tendered in evidence at the trial and marked as Exh. D1. It is dated 20/8/1980). The respondent paid the requisite fees, supplied the information as usually required, and was issued with a F certificate of occupancy (Exh. D2) in relation to the plot. He started construction on it. On noticing this, the appellant filed this suit in the court below, seeking perpetual injunction to restrain the respondent from erecting a building on the plot. He also prayed for costs of the suit and any other relief as the court might deem fit. On 16th October, G 1987, the trial court (Msanche RM) dismissed the suit and declared that the respondent was the rightful owner of the plot in dispute because the appellant's title to it was revoked by the letter of the District Land Officer Ref. No. D/KN/A/978/4/JRC dated 20/3/80. The appellant was not satisfied with that decision and now appeals to this court against it.

H In grounds 1, 2, 3 & 5 of his memorandum of appeal the appellant contends as follows:

1. The learned trial magistrate erred in law and fact in holding that the appellant's title to the suit premises was revoked by the letter of the District Land Officer I reference No. D/KN/A/978/4/JRC dated 20/3/1980. The learned trial magistrate erred in relying on the said letter and/or erred in placing any weight A thereon and/or the learned trial magistrate ought to have found and held that the District Land Officer has no power to revoke a right of occupancy duly granted.

2. The learned trial magistrate erred in law in considering the certificate of B occupancy, Exhibit D.2, as the right of occupancy itself and ought to have held that a right of occupancy vested in the appellant immediately after accepting the offer for a right of occupancy. C

3. The learned trial magistrate erred in holding that the respondent had a better title and ought to have held that the appellant being a prior grantee of the right of occupancy was entitled to the suit land and ought to have further held that D the subsequent grant of a right of occupancy of the appellant still subsisted was irregular.

4. The learned trial magistrate erred in holding that the appellant never followed up but ought to have held that after payment of the necessary fees for the E certificate of occupancy it was the duty of the land authorities to issue the certificate of occupancy.

The letter of revocation was tendered in a file by a Financne Management Assistant from F the Revenue Office, one Brown Mwambope (DW.2). It was not tendered by the authors of it, i.e. the District Land Development Office. Before me Mr. Raithatha argued that the letter was a copy and was tendered by an Officer who was not in office when it was written. I agree. The letter was quite clearly a copy, sent to the Revenue Office, by G the District Land Office for revenue purposes as DW.2 himself says in his evidence. Very unfortunately, however, no objection to its introduction into evidence was made by Mr. Raithatha, who also represented the appellant at the trial, when it was being H produced by the respondent. Whatever the case, however, I am satisfied that it was improperly admitted in evidence. The original of it should have been tendered, unless there was an explanation, which was lacking in this case, for the tendering of a copy. Also the officials in the District Land Office should have been the ones to tender it, not I someone from the Revenue Office who was only a receipient of a

KYANDO J

A copy of it. Then, on this letter, the learned magistrate says in his judgment, "Before the defendant got the offer of a right of occupancy on 20/8/1980, the plaintiff had received a letter from the same office, the Kinondoni District Land Office. The letter was D/KN/A.978/4/JRC dated 20/3/80" (underlining supplied). Going through the record B there is no evidence that the plaintiff/appellant ever received this letter. He did not say in his evidence that he received the letter. The only evidence on the letter is that given by D.W.2 but he too does not testify to the appellant/plaintiff receiving it. The above statement by the learned magistrate is therefore erroneous.

C Mr. Raithatha further argued that revocation was never pleaded in the respondent's/defendant's Written Statement of Defence. He argued also that the appellant's witnesses were never cross-examined on the question of revocation and he submitted therefore that revocation was an after thought by the respondent. Indeed D revocation was not pleaded in the respondent's Written Statement of Defence. Nor were the appellant's witnesses cross-examined on it.

I would agree, therefore, that revocation in this case was a kind of an after thought.

E As indicated above the learned trial magistrate held that the offer of the right of occupancy to the appellant "became actually revoked by the letter dated 20/3/80" in deciding the case against the appellant. He also observed:

> Mr. Mwalunguza (PW2) the then District Land Officer of Kinondoni told the Court emphatically F that what the plaintiff (appellant) was given on 26/2/77 was an offer of a Right of Occupancy and not a Title Deed. I think it is common knowledge that when one attempts to acquire title to any piece of land, not only in Dar es Salaam but also elsewhere, one first gets an offer, the G offer must then be accepted. Once it is accepted the real title is granted. The grant of Right of Occupancy is not automatic as some people tend to think, or would it necessarily follow after the offer is communicated. I can see that for three years the plaintiff never made a follow up to acquire the real title deed. Not only that: In fact he even never improved on the land. The land H Office was in Law perfectly entitled to give that offer to another person who was prepared to develop it.(Underlining supplied)

I The above holding and observations by the trial magistrate became the crucial points in this appeal before me. Mr. Raithatha took the position that a right of occupancy over a plot is granted by a Letter of Offer and A then accepted by the offeree. The latter must pay the requisite fees and supply the information required in the letter of offer to constitute acceptance on his part. Once this is done a right of occupancy is created and granted to the grantee and this is the grant to which S.6 of the Land Ordinance, Cap. 113 refers. He said there is no other way of B granting a right of occupancy under Cap. 113 and that there are no prescribed forms for such a grant. He referred this Court to the case of Patman Garments Industries Ltd. v Tanzania Manufacturers Ltd. [1981] T.L.R. 30 and submitted that in that case the appellant, Patman Garments Industries Ltd., had only been offered a right of occupancy C whereas the respondents Tanzania Manufacturers Ltd. had gone a step further and obtained a certificate of occupancy as well. Yet, he said, the court of Appeal of Tanzania held in favour of the appellant and said the President erred in revoking the appellant's right of occupancy; the court nullified that of the respondents, and restored that of the D appellant even though the respondents had a Certificate of Occupancy and the appellants had none. Mr. Raithatha, citing a passage from Prof. James, "Land Tenure and Policy in Tanzania" P.117, said a Certificate of Occupancy is not the right of occupancy itself, but E it is a document evidencing the right. He concluded his arguments by submitting that as a right of occupancy is created when an offer for it is made and there is acceptance of it, once these (Offer and acceptance) are made no other person can revoke the right of occupancy thus created except the President under S.10 of the Land Ordinance Cap. F 113. He said as the President has delegated the power to revoke rights of occupancy to the Minister for Lands and the Director of Land Development Services, only these can also revoke a right of Occupancy - on behalf of the President. He contended therefore that the purported revocation by the District Land Officer by the letter referred to above G was invalid and without any effect as the said District Land Officer had no power to revoke a right of occupancy once granted. He submitted that because the purported revocation was without effect, the appellant is still the rightful owner of the plot in dispute and that the subsequent grant of a right over the plot to the respondent is null and void. H

KYANDO J

In reply Dr. Tenga supported the position taken by the trial Court on this point and submitted that an offer of a right of occupancy does not confer title to land on the offeree. He said when an offer is made and accepted then the grant of a real title is made. He I contended that the Letter of Offer is only a contract binding on the Government

KYANDO J

A to issue a Certificate of Occupancy. By itself, he said , it vests no title in the offeree. The title, he submitted, only vests when the certificate is issued. He referred me to a passage in a paper by

Prof. G. Mgongo Fimbo entitled, "Double Allocation of Urban Plots. A legal Labyrinth, Citizens' Puzzlement and Nightmare" which the learned B professor delivered at a public lecture on 3rd September 1988 to the Law Association of Tanzania. The passage appears at P.4 of the paper and is one of the matters Prof. Fimbo summarizes as being undisputed. It says:

C The grant of a right of occupancy is manifested by the certificate of occupancy and the right of occupancy vests in the relevant person on the execution thereof.

Dr. Tenga submitted that in view of the above passage the distinction by Prof. James at D page 117 of his book referred to by Mr. Raithatha is of a rather technical nature. He argued also that reference to a "Right of Occupancy" in relation to the Offer made to Patman Garments Industries Ltd. in Patman Garments Industries Ltd v Tanzania Manufacturers Ltd. (supra) was a a loose way of naming the deal for it was not, he E argued, a "Right of Occupancy" as such.

He (Dr. Tenga) contended also that what the appellant got, upon being offered a right of occupancy, was not a title to the land but a commitment from the Government to issue a certificate of occupancy. He said when the certificate is issued it is at that stage that the F Right of Occupancy vests in the grantee. He further contended that in this case what was cancelled by the district Land Officer was not a "Right of Occupancy," which can only be revoked by the President, but a contract of offer. He argued that if such concellation was done wrongfully the remedies the appellant has are specific performance and G damages. He said, however, that these remedies are available to the appellant not as against the respondent, but against the Government which issued the offer and committed itself to issuing a certificate of occupancy.

H Finally Dr. Tenga also contended that as in this case the respondent already has been issued with the certificate of occupancy, under s.33 (1) of Cap. 334 his estate, being an estate of a registered owner, is paramount. He said if the appellant wants to challenge the memorials in the Land Register the procedure is for him to apply either to the High Court I or to the Registrar of Titles for rectification of the Land Register. His position is that the present case is not a case of double allocation. He contended that as the allocation to respondent was made after the offer to the appellant had been cancelled, the question of A double allocation does not arise. He submitted that the appellant's suit is misconceived because there is no, he contended, grant of a right of occupancy which vested in him. He prayed therefore that the appeal be dismissed.

As can be seen, both counsel have made very impressive and learned arguments. I owe B them unlimited gratitudes for the efforts they made in preparing themselves so well to present, and for making, these arguments. Also can be seen, the issue for determination does not seem to have been the subject of judicial investigation and determination before. Most authorities as they are available are on whether a revocation by the President was C valid or not; I have not come across one on when does a right of occupancy take effect or is created.

I now proceed to consider and determine this question of when a right of occupancy is D established or created. The point of departure is, I think, the Letter of Offer itself. I will examine and consider the effect of this first.

It (the letter) states, in part:

Your application for a long term Right of Occupancy (later in this letter called the 'Right') over E this plot has been approved. On receipt of the fees and information requested below I will send a certificate for you to sign containing the following conditions:

A 2. The following information is required by me:

(a) Your full name (in block letters). No request to have certificate of Occupancy written/issued in the name of a person or persons other than offered shall be entertained.

B (b) Your full residential address, giving house number, and name of street, and your P.O. Box number (if any).

(c) Whether you wish to hold as joint tenant or tenants in common and if the latter the share to be taken by each of you. (The property of C deceased joint detant in common passed to his/her heirs according to law).

(d) Whether certificate will be signed in Tanzania or abroad and, if a Company, the manner of realing.

D Paragraph 3 of the letter lists various types of fees which the offeree was required to pay and paragraph 6, the last paragraph of the letter, warns that unless the offer is accepted and all fees are paid within 30 days from date of the letter, "the offer shall lapse and after that date the land will be disposed of as I see fit without further reference to E you."

The letter opens with the words "Your application for a long term Right of Occupancy, (later in this letter called "The Right") over this plot has been approved." Here, the applicant applies for a long term right of occupancy and he is informed that the F application/is approved. The applicant did not apply for an offer: he applied for a right of occupancy and the fact that it has been approved must, in my view, mean he has been given or granted what he applied for, i.e. the right of occupancy. Then the letter states that upon receipt of fees and information requested in the letter, a certificate of G occupancy will be sent to the applicant. There is no further procedure between the stages of approval of the application and the issuing of the certificate once fees are paid and the information is supplied. So when is the grant made? Obviously at the time of the "Letter of Offer" by which the applicant is informed that the application has been approved. H Prof. James in his book referred to above, at P.122 says "When granting unsurveyed land, the Land Officer usually grants an Offer of Right of Occupancy," which is a formal document setting out all the terms and conditions of the grant. The expression "offer of a right of occupancy" is misleading because the document is not a mere offer, but it is a I final document embodying agreed terms." Here he discussed offers or grants of rights over unsurveyed land but the document he discussed, i.e. the letter containing 'An offer of a right' is the A same in relation to surveyed and unsurveyed lands. So the so called "offer of a right of occupancy," as I have said, is the grant of a right itself, so that by what we call a Letter of Offer a grant by the land office is in fact made of a right of occupancy over a piece of land. B

The other document for consideration is the letter of revocation referred to above. This letter states:

As can be seen, this letter is headed, "Kufutwa kwa Haki ya Umilikaji wa Kiwanja Na. 978 Msasani Peninsula ....." "Haki ya Umilikaji I

A Kiwanja" means a right of occupancy. So the District Land Officer was clear in his mind as to what he was revoking, not a contract but a right of occupancy as his letter states. He could not have been revoking a right of occupancy which he knew did not exist - because of lack of a certificate of occupancy; he must have assumed that the right of occupancy had come into existence because of the letter of offer and acceptance of B the offer by the applicant the appellant.

Then some court decisions: As argued by Mr. Raithatha, in the Patman Garments C Industries Ltd. v Tanzania Manufacturers Ltd. case (supra) what was revoked by the President was the right of occupancy granted to the appellants. Patman Garments Manufacturers Ltd. At the time of the revocation the appellants had not been issued with a certificate of occupancy yet, though the respondents had. Yet what was revoked is referred to in the judgment of the Court of Appeal as a right of occupancy, not a mere D contract or commitment to issue a certificate of occupancy as Dr. Tenga contends. Secondly, in the case of Col. S.M.A. Kashimiri v Maginder Singh Matharu, (CA) Civ App. No. 4 of 1988 (unreported) a case to which I was referred by Dr. Tenga, it is stated in the following passage from the judgment of Omar, J.A.:

E This is a case of double allocation of a parcel of land. Both parties to the suit were each allocated the same plot within a space of two months. Respondent was the first person to be allocated on 20/11/80 after the Allocation Committee known by the name of Urban Planning Committee had sat on 18/11/80 and considered his application and approved his name as the F now owner of the plot for a lease of 99 years. Respondent was required to pay the necessary fees for the plot within thirty days from the date of this offer of right of occupancy before the plot could be legally deemed to have passed to him.

G From this passage it is clear that land becomes legally owned or a right of occupancy is established, once an offer for it is made and the offeree pays the fees. The question of a certificate does not arise in order for a right of occupancy to be created.

H As for the passage from Prof. Fimbo's paper referred to by Dr. Tenga, very unfortunately it is not elaborate enough to show exactly what it was intended to mean and in what context Prof. Fimbo makes the point. In one sense by saying that the grant of a right of occupancy is manifested by the certificate of occupancy, he may be taken to I mean the same thing as what were are trying to say here, i.e. that a certificate of occupancy is evidence of a right of occupancy but not A the right itself. But if he means that the certificate is the one which creates the right of occupancy I think, with utmost respect, he cannot be right. Prof. James in his book (supra) at p.117 says it is clear from section 9 of the Land Ordinance, Cap. 113, "that a B certificate is not the right of occupancy itself, but is a document evidencing the right...." In view of the mass of material I have attempted to examine above, I am of the view that it is him who is right and I will not accept the statement of the law as made by Prof. Fimbo on the point under consideration.

From the above then, it is obvious that the District Land Officer revoked a right of C occupancy. He himself in fact knew that he was revoking a right of occupancy for he states, as already shown, in the heading of his letter "Kufutwa kwa Haki ya Umilikaji wa Kiwanja..." (Revocation of a right of occupancy). I hold therefore that a right of D occupancy is created by the approval of the applicant's appliaction for the grant of one, i.e. a right of occupancy, and the acceptance by the applicant of the granted right. The trial magistrate was clearly wrong therefore when he held that what was revoked by the District Land Officer was not "the real right of occupancy" but only "an Offer of a right of Occupancy." As Prof. James states in his book referred to above, "Offer of a right of E Occupancy" is a misleading term, as the offer is in fact the grant itself. There is therefore no such thing as "real right of occupancy" in law, a term employed by the trial magistrate in his judgment.

Did the District Land Officer have power to revoke the right of occupancy? Obviously F not. While power to grant rights of occupancy have been delegated to him (see James, "Land Tenure and Policy in Tanzania" (supra), p. 116, no powers to revoke the rights have been delegated to him. It is only the President who has such powers, or at the G lowest, the Minister for Lands or the Director for Land Development Services. So the purported revocation of the right of occupancy granted to the appellant in this instant case was of no effect at all. It was made by someone who had no power to revoke.

Is it perhaps that failure to complete building on the plot by the appellant within 36 H months from the date of commencement of the right caused the right to lapse? I do not think this was possibly the case, for although there is this requirement that building was to be completed within 36 months there is no indication in the Letter of Offer as to what I would happen if construction had not been finished within that period. In paragraph 6 of the Letter of Offer, it

A is only failure to accept the grant and to pay fees within 30 days "from the date of this letter" that lead to lapsing of a grant. Nothing occurs where development within the 36 months is not carried out according to that Letter. Revocation for failure to develop must therefore be resorted to only as provided for in s.10 of the Land Ordinance Cap. 113. B Under that section the President can revoke a right of occupancy for good cause on the ground of non-development if the holder of a right has abandoned or does not use the land for a period of five years. So even if the District Land Officer had powers to C revoke, he would have acted prematurely in the instant case by revoking for non-development for a period of three years only. The law provides for abandonment or non-use of land for five years, not three years, to warrant a revocation of a right of occupancy over it.

D What then is the result of the District Land Officer's wrongful and in ineffectual revocation of the appellant's right? Dr. Tenga, as shown above says the remedies to the appellant are in specific performance and damages, as against the Government. I do not think that is the case. First as Dr. Tenga himself submitted, those would have been the remedies if I had held that what was revoked was a mere contract. But I have held that E what was revoked was a right of occupancy conferring upon the appellant's rights over the suit plot. If the perported revocation was without effect as I have held it means that those rights were never in law ever taken away from him (the appellant) and the only thing for this court to do is to declare that he is still the rightful owner of the plot. F Appellant's rights over the plot still subsisting, it means that any later grant of a right over the same plot is null and void. In other words nothing was granted at all after the grant to the appellant for the land Office could not have granted another right over a plot it had already granted to another person. I declare here that the grant or purported grant of a G right over the plot in dispute in this case to the respondent in null and void. The appellant remains the rightful owner of the suit plot.

Secondly concerning a possible claim for specific performance and damages against the H Government, I think this is open to either party, who eventually loses in a suit over a disputed plot to sue for these. In the instant case it can be said that it is open to the respondent too to sue the Government for allocating him a plot over which the existing right of occupancy had not been properly revoked. I do not accept the argument that the appellant, the rightful owner of the the plot, should have been the one to sue for specific I performance and damages as against the Government. This stop is open to either party and I think, as I have said, it all depends on who eventually loses in a suit over a disputed plot. A

As to whether the appellant should have sought a rectification of the Land Register rather than sueing as he did, the course of action the appellant took has been taken in many cases against registered grantees of rights of occupancies (see, e.g. Patman Garments B Industries Ltd. v Tanzania Manufactures Ltd. case (supra).) So I do not think by suing the appellant adopted an unusual or improper step in seeking redress in this case.

In the final analysis therefore, I hold that revocation in this case was not pleaded or proved by credible evidence. If it was proved, it (the revocation) was done by a person C who had no power to do it. For these reasons I declare that the appellant is the rightful owner of Plot No. 978, Msasani Peninsula, Dar es Salaam, and the prayer for perpetual injunction against the respondent is granted. I allow the appeal by the appellant and set aside the judgment and decree of the trial court which erroneously deprived him of the D plot. The respondent is given one month from the date of this judgment to remove the structure he has put up and the materials he has collected on the suit plot. He is restrained, together with his agents or servants, from interfering with the plot in anyway.

The appellant appealed to the High Court which was not satisfied that the items were properly identified. Ramadhani C.J. could not support a conviction of stealing by servant. However, the learned Chief Justice was on the evidence B satisfied that it was the appellant who took the box of motor vehicle spares to the shop and that because the appellant was unable to explain how he came by the same, the Chief Justice substituted a conviction of being in possession of property suspected to have been stolen c/s 285A of the Penal Decree. The appellant appealed to the Court of C Appeal challenging the evidence relied upon by the High Court and the sentence imposed in that it was excessive. Mr. Mtembei for the Republic submitted that the learned Chief Justice erred in convicting the appellant under the provisions of section 285A without the sanction of the Attorney General.

D Held: (i) Where an accused person is charged with an offence requiring the previous sanction of the Attorney General for prosecution, the court cannot substitute the charge with a conviction for an offence whose prosecution does not require such sanction.

E (ii) in the present case conviction for possession of suspected stolen property could be substituted for stealing by servant under section 271 (1) (a) of the Criminal Procedure Decree.

Mtembei, for the Respondent

G Mustafa, Makame and Omar, JJ.A.: The appellant was charged with and convicted of stealing by servant contrary to section 248(4) of the Penal Decree (Cap. 13) of Zanzibar in a Resident Magistrate's Court and was sentenced to 5 years imprisonment. He appealed to the High Court and the High Court (Ramadhani, C.J.) substituted a conviction of being in possession of property suspected to have been stolen H contrary to section 285 A of the Penal Decree and reduced the sentence of imprisonment to three years. The appellant is appealing from that judgment to this Court.

The case for the prosecution was that the appellant was an employee of the Zanzibar I State Trading Corporation. The Corporation dealt in various kinds of articles for sale, among which were motor vehicle spares. The appellant, one week end, was alleged to have brought a box to the shop of P.W.2. The box contained various kinds of motor A spares, steering racks, engine mountings, armatures and carburettors. There was a theft at the Corporation of motor vehicle spare parts, which included items similar to those allegedly contained in the box brought by the appellant to P.W.2. P.W.2. was a shop keeper. It was alleged that the appellant had asked P.W.2 to sell the spares on his B (appellant's) behalf. P.W.2 had agreed, and the transaction was still in progress when the Police, on information received, came to the shop of P.W.2, about 4 days later, and discovered the motor vehicle spares. P.W.2 alleged that the appellant had brought those motor spares to his shop. P.W.2 was supported in that testimony by P.W.1, and P.W.4, C both brothers of P.W.2. However, P.W.3, a neighbour, had also seen the appellant carrying a box to the shop of P.W.2, and soon thereafter saw the contents, which were motor vehicle spare parts.

MUSTAFA JJA, MAKAME JJA AND OMAR JJA

The appellant admitted that he was an employee of the Corporation but denied that he D had ever brought a box containing motor spares to the shop of P.W.2. He alleged that P.W.1, P.W.2, P.W.3 and P.W.4 had all told lies to implicate him.

The trial magistrate concluded that the appellant had stolen the various motor vehicle E spare parts contained in the box he had carried to P.W.2's shop and that, in the circumstances, although the spare parts carried no identification marks, they must have been the property of the Corporation. He accordingly convicted the appellant of stealing as charged. The learned Chief Justice, on first appeal, was not satisfied that the motor F vehicle spare parts had been properly identified as those stolen from the Corporation and could not support a conviction for stealing by a servant. He treated P.W.1. P.W.2, and P.W.4 as accomplices but he found corroboration of their testimony in the evidence of P.W.3. The learned Chief Justice was satisfied that the appellant had taken the box of motor vehicle spares to the shop of P.W.2. Since the appellant did not explain how he G had obtained these spares, in fact the appellant had denied he ever had had those spares, the Chief Justice substituted a conviction of being in possession of property suspected to have been stolen in purported contravention of section 285 A of the Penal Decree. H

Mr. El-Maamry appeared for the appellant before us. He submitted that there was insufficient evidence adduced at the trial to support a finding that the appellant was in possession of the motor vehicle spares. He contended that the Chief Justice did not give I any or any sufficient consideration to the evidence tendered by the appellant. Since both the courts below had found that it was the

MUSTAFA JJA, MAKAME JJA AND OMAR JJA

A appellant who had brought the motor spare parts to P.W.2's shop, Mr. El-Maamry's submission has no merit. He also submitted that the terms of 3 years imprisonment imposed by the Chief Justice was excessive, and he suggested that the Chief Justice had erred in assessing the sentence since he had relied partly on the value of the said motor B vehicle parts said to be worth Shs. 100,000/=. He said these values must have been less, as shs. 100,000/= covered 19 items, and only 4 types of items were allegedly in the possession of the appellant.

Mr. Mtembei for the Republic began his address to us by submitting that the learned C Chief Justice had erred in substituting a conviction of being in possession for one of stealing. He submitted that section 285A was an additional section immediately following section 285 of the Penal Decree and was brought in by an amendment to the Penal D Decree by Decree No. 1 of 1980 and in section 6 of Decree No. 10 of 1985 a prosecution for an offence under inter alia section 285A "shall not be instituted except by or with the sanction in writing of the Attorney General". We think that Mr. Mtembei's point was that in the absence of such a sanction by the Attorney General the appellant E could not have been convicted under the provisions of section 285 A.

We are satisfied that the learned Chief Justice had erred to have purported to rely on the provisions of section 285A. Section 285 of the Penal Decree is invoked by reference to F section 18 of the Criminal Procedure Decree, an offence connected with the conveyance of property suspected to have been stolen or unlawfully obtained. Although the scope of Section 285 A would seem wider than that of section 285 we think that section 285 A was basically designed to enhance punishment and for forfeiture of goods recovered to the Government, in respect of offences of the type caught by section 285. G The Chief Justice could not have invoked the provisions of Section 285 A in this case.

However the Chief Justice could have invoked the provisions of section 271 of the Criminal Procedure Decree in substituting a conviction for possession of suspected stolen property. We will correct the order of the Chief Justice by setting aside the reference to H section 285 A of the Penal Decree and in place thereof substitute the reference to section 271 (1) (a) of the Criminal Procedure Decree.

Mr. Mtembei otherwise supported the conclusion of the Chief Justice, and submitted that I the accomplice evidence of P.W.1, P.W.2 and P.W.4 was corroborated by the testimony of P.W.3. He also submitted that the sentence of 3 years imposed was not excessive.

In our view, the order of the Chief Justice, as corrected, was justified on the evidence. A We do not think that the terms of 3 years imprisonment was so severe as to call for interference. We dismiss the appeal in its entirety.

Appeal dismissed. B

Case Information
A Application is dismissed.
[zJDz]Judgment
Makame, J.A.: This application arises from a transaction in a financial culture I found interesting. The applicant, resident in Pemba, borrowed from the respondent, in Zanzibar, various sums of money for each of which he issued what was described as a warka, pledging some of his date trees in Muscat. Thereafter the applicant kept on issuing warkas to other people pledging more trees so as to raise more and more sums of money. That complicated matters for the respondent, who eventually had to file a suit in the High Court of Zanzibar to recover shs. 300,000/=. The sum prayed for was duly awarded to the respondent in a judgment delivered by the learned Chief Justice on 16/10/86. On that day the applicant was not in court, but, according to the record, one Abbas Nada Hija, who said he and the applicant were married in the same family, received the judgment, "k.n.y. Mdaiwa" - on behalf of the defendant.
On 17th December, 1986, that is over two months later, the applicant swore an affidavit to say that he was away in Oman when the judgment was delivered and did not return to Zanzibar until 6th November, 1986. He came to know of the existence of the judgment only when he was called to the High Court on 15th November, 1986. Two days later he filed a Notice of Appeal but was advised that he was already out of time.

F At the hearing of this application Mr. Lipiki, learned advocate, represented the applicant, while the respondent appeared in person. Mr. Lipiki submitted, in effect, that the Notice itself was in fact in time because the applicant did not know, and could not have known, of the judgment until on 15th November, 1986. Mr. Lipiki said that the man Abbas Nada Hija was not the applicant's representative, as he had no power of G attorney, and had no business to receive judgment on behalf of the applicant. In reply the respondent, unrepresented as he was, had nothing of moment to say, only that he was wondering what this application was all about, when the applicant had admitted liability and had in fact paid the money.

H I would not go as far as saying that to receive a judgment on behalf of another one would necessarily need a power of attorney, as Mr. Lipiki submitted. He was not able to refer me to any authority. In my view it would all depend on the circumstances and, ordinarily, it would be enough if the representative can produce any convincing proof that I he was sent and authorized by the party concerned to receive judgment on the latter's behalf. In the present case, however,

MAKAME JA

Hija is shown in the coram as being "k.n.y. Mdaiwa" without any indication as to where A that information came from. "Mdaiwa is mume mwenzangu" seems to be the answer to the only question Hija was asked; and that information, per se, even if true, does not make Hija authorized and entitled to receive judgment on behalf of the applicant. I am satisfied that Mr. Lipiki's submission on this is quite sound, and I would have allowed the B application if there was no other factor to be considered. There is however another factor I have to take into account, and it is this: Going by the record, the parties were both present in court, on 25/7/86, when the hearing was concluded and the case was adjourned for judgment on 16/10/86. The judgment was delivered on the appointed day, C 16/10/86, and if the applicant chose to be away in Oman Arabia, or any other place, and absent from the court, it was his duty to make provisions for him to learn of the outcome of the case soon. It cannot do just to go away and wait until one is called by the court. The Notice the applicant received from the High Court, dated 8/11/86, said D "Madhumuni ya wito utaelezwa baada ya kufika" and one is entitled to surmise, especially as, as far as record went, Hija had already received the judgment k.n.y. the applicant, that the purpose was to make the applicant pay up the decretal amount. If 15th November, 1986 was the day he came to know of the judgment it was the result of his E own lack of diligence and he had only himself to blame. The purported Notice on 17/11/86, if there was one, was clearly out of time and I am not persuaded to hold that the applicant has advanced any credible reason why I should exercise my discretion under Rule 8 to extend time as prayed. F

This application is accordingly dismissed and the applicant is ordered to pay the respondent's costs.

-Headnote
C This was an appeal from the decision of the District Court of Tarime.
The appellant and the respondent were husband and wife. They got married in 1982. They appear to have had four years of happy and peaceful marriage. In 1987 the situation changed to the extent that the respondent instituted proceedings in the Shirati D Primary Court Civil case No. 130 of 1987 seeking divorce. She claimed to have been frequently beaten and threatened and that she had consulted both the family council and the marriage reconciliation board whose decisions she was not satisfied with. Both lower courts granted divorce under section 107 (3) (c) and 107 (3) (b) of the marriage Act E 1971.
Held: (i)The two incidents that are established by the evidence to have happened cannot be said to have been clear indication that this marriage was irreparably broken. They F were the usual wear and tear of married life. They did not amount to cruelty in terms of sec. 107 (2) (c) of the law marriage Act 1971, nor did they fall without the purview of section 107 (3) (b) of the Law marriage Act 1971;
G (ii) on the evidence on record the marriage was not irreparably broken down.

[zJDz]Judgment
H Sekule, J. The appellant and the respondent were husband and wife. They got married in 1982. They appear to have had four years of happy and peaceful married life. In 1987 the situation changed to the extent that the respondent instituted proceedings in the Shirati Primary Court, Civil Case No. 130 of 1987 seeking divorce.
I It was the respondent's case at the trial that from 1982 - 1985 they lived peacefully. However sometime in 1986, the appellant started beating her daily A and telling her to go back to her parents as she was barren. Their marriage had not by that time been blessed with a child. She contended that she reported these happenings to her parents but they did not take her complaints seriously. In February, 1987 she was B beaten again by the appellant because of money that she had been given by the appellant to keep. The appellant wanted the money and while she was still looking for it in their house she was beaten. After the incident she absconded from the home and went to her relative at Mgango in Musoma. The appellant followed her and brought her back. Her C father convened a family council to discuss their problems. She had also alleged that the appellant was threatening to kill her. The family council discussed their problems and it resolved that the respondent should go back to her marriage. She was not satisfied with this decision, she therefore took the matter to a marriage reconciliation board. The board after hearing and considering their problems, it also advised her to go back to her D marriage. She was again not happy with the decision and she proceeded to court.

She called three witnesses at the trial to support her case. One of them was one Omwasi Okoro - the chairman of the marriage reconciliation board and another one was her own E father.

The chairman of the marriage reconciliation board testified to the effect they dealt with the parties' problems. That the respondent alleged before them that the appellant was threatening to kill her. An allegation which the appellant denied and she tendered no F evidence to substantiate it. Apart from this allegation, the respondent said they had one other quarrel. It was further his evidence that after they had considered the matter, they advised the respondent to go back to her marriage because they saw that only one G incident had been established. This is what the witness said in response to a question put to him by a second assessor:

Her father testified that the respondent was beaten on two occasions. On the first occasion she was beaten because of money. And on the second occasion it was because she had refused to boil some medicine for the appellant. The appellant was sick. They I too advised her to go back to her marriage. The appellant on his part stated in his testimony at the trial that they had a peaceful marriage for about

A 41/2 years and then the respondent started to be unfaithful to the marriage. He spoke to her about this conduct but that he never beat her for the sake of protecting the marriage. He however, stated that they had two quarrels at the beginning of 1987. One quarrel concerned appellant's money shs. 1,800/=. The appellant contended that the respondent B had hid or stolen that money. The second quarrel concerned the respondent's refusal to boil some medicine for him when he was sick. He further said that he still loved his wife and that though the respondent had had occasion to do wrong things to him he was prepared to forgive. The appellant too called witnesses to support his case. The C substance of their testimony was that they had not seen or heard frequent quarrels between these two people in the course of their marriage prior to the events that gave rise to this case.

D At the end of the case, the trial court found that the appellant had beaten the respondent twice, on the first occasion it was because of the money and on the second occasion it was because of her refusal to boil medicine for the appellant. And that this conduct was wrong and an offence on the part of the appellant under section 66 of the Marriage Act 1971 which forbids the infliction of corporal punishment on one's spouse. E The trial court further held that the appellant must have threatened to kill the respondent for otherwise how could she have absconded to Mgango.

The court was therefore of the view that the respondent had proved her case and granted F her prayer. In concluding the case the trial court observed as follows:

Kwa hali hiyo ya vituko ambavyo mdai anatendewa na mdaiwa chini ya fungu 107 (2) (c) la Sheria ya Ndoa 5/71 vya kumpiga na kumlalamikia kila mara ni msherati na kumtishia ni G vitendo vya kuvunja ndoa. Hivyo nakubaliana na washauri kuwa ndoa ya wadaawa haiwezi kushamili kama awali inavunjwa.

The appellant was aggrieved and unsuccessfully appealed to the District Court of Tarime H District. In dismissing the appellant's appeal, the appellate District Court held that as the parties were trading blames against each other and since the marriage reconciliation board had failed to reconcile them, then the five years childless marriage was broken down and it accordingly confirmed the divorce granted to the respondent under section I 107 (3) (b) of the Marriage Act, 1971.

The appellant is not challenging this decision before this court.

SEKULE J

Both parties appeared in person at the hearing of this appeal. The appellant essentially A reiterated what he had stated in his petition of appeal and concluded that in his view the marriage was not irreparably broken down.

On the other hand the respondent admitted that both the family council and the marriage reconciliation Board had advised her to go back to the marriage and that she did not B agree with their opinion because the appellant used to beat her.

The crucial issue for determination is, was this marriage irreparably broken. I have carefully examined and considered the evidence tendered by both parties, at the trial and on this evidence, I am far from being satisfied that this marriage was or is irreparably C broken down.

From the trial record, only two incidents are borne out, by the evidence that is, the quarrels between the parties over the issue of the money and the respondent's refusal to boil some medicine for the appellant. D

The allegation that the appellant threatened to kill the respondent was not supported by any evidence. The inference drawn by the trial court that the respondent must have been so threatened for otherwise why did she abscond to Mgango was in my view without E basis. Going by her own testimony her departure to Mgango seems to have been prompted by the quarrel they had over the issue of money. There was also no evidence from the record to the effect that the appellant constantly complained or accused her of being unfaithful to the marriage. As a matter of fact the respondent herself never F complained or raised this issue in her testimony. It was raised by the appellant himself in an attempt to explain the causes of the problems the marriage started to face after the peaceful era. He stated that the respondent started to be unfaithful and he talked to her over that issue and that he never beat her over it. G

In my view the two incidents that are established by the evidence on record to have happened, cannot be said to have been clear indication that this marriage was irreparably broken. They were in my opinion the usual wear and tear of married life. They did not also amount to cruelty in terms of section 107(2)(c) of the Marriage Act 1971 - the basis H of the trial court's decision. Also and with respect, I am of the view that the facts of this case did not come within the purview of section 107(3)(b) of the Marriage Act, 1971 as the appellate District Court held.

The appellant pleaded guilty to the offence of being found in possession of native liquor, moshi, and on conviction was sentenced to five month's imprisonment. She was not given a fine option.
F When addressing the court in mitigation, the appellant, a first offender, said that she had problems that is why she manufactures gongo (moshi).
This was an appeal against sentence. The appeal court considered the law and the circumstance of the case.
G Held: (i) It is a common law principle that where a statute creating an offence lays down in no uncertain terms the sort of punishment to be imposed on offenders against that statute, it is incumbent on the court called upon to enforce the law to act within the H strict language of the law;

(ii) section 30 of the Moshi (Manufacture and Distillation) Act uses the words "shall be liable on conviction to imprisonment" which when properly construed gives discretion to the court to impose an option of a fine sentence;

Samatta, J.: On March 10, 1988, the appellant, Tabu Fikwa who, according to the charge-sheet, is aged 33 and was employed as a nurse at the Government Hospital, Dodoma (according to Mr. Rweyongeza, her counsel, however, her title at the hospital E was that of assistant nurse), was, together with five others, brought before the District Court of Dodoma District and charged with unlawful possession of illicit liquor commonly known as moshi, contrary to section 30 of the Moshi (Manufacture and Distillation) Act, 1966. The particulars of offence alleged that the appellant and her co-accused: F

... jointly and together on 7th day of March, 1988, at about 20.30 hrs at Bahi Road within the Municipality, District and Region of Dodoma, were found in possession of 11/2 litres of native G liquor commonly known as moshi.

The appellant's plea to that charge was:

It is true. I was found with native liquor known as Gongo without permit. H

All the appellant's co-accused protested their innocence. Their trial is yet to be completed. The learned District Magistrate entered the appellant's plea as a plea of guilty to the charge laid at her door. I

SAMATTA J

A The prosecutor, in accordance with the time-honoured practice, then outlined the facts of the case. He said:

On the 7th March, 1988, at about 8.30 p.m., at Bahi Road in Dodoma one No. B 9457 Detective Corporal Selemani was on duty (patrol) at Bahi road. He found the 1st accused in her house B where many people gathered, and then discovered that those people were taking local liquor commonly known as gongo. He arrested them all (including) the 1st accused who was also among them and taking the same liquor without permit. The charges were (then) opened C against them as per charge sheet.

The appellant admitted that this outline correctly represented what had happened, whereupon the learned District Magistrate convicted her upon her own plea of guilty. The appellant, who is a first offender, then adressed the court in mitigation. She said very D little. In fact she uttered just one short sentence, which was as follows:

I have got problems, that is why I manufacture gongo.

E Immediately after the appellant had said this, the learned District Magistrate proceeded to sentence her. He said:

The accused is a first offender. I have taken into consideration her mitigating factors, but taking F into account the rempancy (sic) of the offence in the area, the accused is sentenced to 5 (five) months jail.

G Citing Cross and Jones Introduction to Criminal Law, 7th Edn. at p. 379, and Hattan v R., [1969] H.C.D. 234, Mr. Rweyongeza submitted that, having regard to the circumstances of the instant case, the learned District Magistrate erred in not giving the appellant the option of a fine. Supporting the decision of the learned District Magistrate, Mr. Benne, for the Republic, contended, with a degree of plausibility, that no H circumstances existed in this case making a custodial sentence inappropriate.

In this appeal I ask myself this question: Is there any merit in Mr. Rweyongeza's submission? I would answer that question in the affirmative. It is not necessary, I think, to I cite any authority for the proposition that the following principles form part of the law of this country:

SAMATTA J

1. An offender is a member of society and quite often a product of social and A economic conditions. If his interests and those of society are in conflict the former must be subordinated to the latter. If, however, they can be reconciled the court should embark upon that course.

2. In determining or assessing sentence what the court must consider is the triad B consisting of the offence, the offender and the interests of society. Thus, the magnitude of the offence and motives to its commission and the character of the offender are some of the matters which the court must have regard to. The court must strive to strike a reasonable balance between the elements of the C triad.

3. When called upon to impose punishment upon the offender a judicial officer would be right in appreciating that the natural indignating of interested parties and of the community at large should receive some recognition in the sentence D he imposes, but he would be wrong - very wrong - if he assesses the sentence simply upn the basis of the indignation. It is not sufficient for punishment to be fair to society, it must also fit the crime as well as the criminal. Righteous anger should not becloud judgment. E

4. While it is impossible to over-emphasize the need for justice to be done, it must always be remembered that mercy, not a sledge-hammer, is justice's concomitant. In Sentencing a fellow mortal, therefore, an insensitively F censorius attitude should be avoided. It is wrong to equate the approach of mercy or plain humanity with maudlin sympathy or misplaced pity for the offender. Mercy is an element of justice itself. It is not unlikely that it was his belief in the correctness of that notion which inspired Willam Shakespeare (in Measure for Measure, Act 11, Section 2) to observe, through Isabella, that: G

> No ceremony that to great ones longs,
> Not the king's crown, nor the deputed sword,
> The marshal's truncheon, nor the judge's robe,
> Become then with, one half so good a grace H
> As mercy does.

5. Deterrence is a well-recognised purpose of punishment, but imprisonment has never been regarded by judges, lawyers or experts in penology as being the only punishment which is I

A appropriate for that purpose. The object of punishment to hurt the offender (the justness of the object is, understandably, a subject matter of serious controversy) can fairly often be met by a substantial fine. The fine has several advantages which the punishment of imprisonment lacks. These are mentioned by Alex Samuels in his article, "The fine: The principles" (see [1970] Crim. B L.R. 201) where he says, inter alia:

"The fine is simple, uncomplicated, adaptable and popular, because it involves no expense to the public, no burden on the prison system, no social dislocation and less C stigma than most other criminal sanctions. Stigma tends to impede reformation."

6. In determining or occasion sentence the court is perfectly entitled to take into D account the necessity of deterring other persons from perpetrating similar offences, but that factor is not the sole or predominant basis for assessment of sentence.

7. Generally speaking, imprisonment is only justified if it is necessary that the E criminal be removed from society. Save where the nature of the offence and the circumstances of its commission call for a custodial sentence, or where the nature of the offence and the circumstances of its commission call for a custodial sentence, or where the court has no discretion in the matter because F the offence attracts a mandatory sentence of imprisonment under the Minimum Sentences Act, 1972, or under any other legislation, the court should seriously consider alternative punishments before sending an offender to prison, especially if he is a first offender.

8. The deterrent effect of a sentence of imprisonment is not always G proportionate to its length.

9. The imposition of a substantial fine can have a deterrent effect and may constitute adequate penalty even in a case of serious nature. Its appropriateness or otherwise always depends upon the circumstances of each case.

H 10. Every reasonable effort should be made to keep first offenders out of prison. Where appropriate, however, the court will send a first offender to prison to demonstrate that crime does not pay or to protect genuine and important interests of the community. A fine will not be imposed on an offender, even a first offender, where that punishment is considered by the court, after having I paid due weight to each of the relevant factors, including the interests of society, as being inappropriate. A

11. The remorse or repentance, expressed inter alia in a plea of guilty, is a mitigating factor and must be given due weight by the court when sentencing the offender.

12. The prevalence of an offence and the need for sentence to deter the B perpetration of it in future must not be permitted to outweigh the appropriate sentence for the offence itself. Prevalence of offence should be given no more than its due weight. Failure to adhere to that rule may result in offenders being kept in prison for longer than is necessary to protect the interests of the C offenders, of society or both. In ordinary cases the judicial officer should steer a course between the Scylla of misplaced pity and the Charybdis of severity.

It was once observed by a distinguished jurist -with respect, correctly in my view - that, D compared with task of deciding what sentence should be imposed on the offender, trying an accused person is as easy as falling off a log. The difficult task must nevertheless be discharged. The offence which the appellant was convicted of attracts the maximum sentence of five years' imprisonment. Bearing that in mind, it is as plain as a pikestaff, in E my opinion, that Parliament regards the offence as a serious one. It is not surprising that the offence is so regarded.

According to the report of the Government Chemist, put before the learned District Magistrate, those who drink moshi are likely to suffer from the following: F

(a) damage to the eye-sight;
(b) very serious damage to the liver;
(c) damage to the nervous system; and G
(d) general deterioration of health.

It must be correct to say, therefore, that widespread drinking of moshi is bound to have extremely harmful effects on the lives of the drinkers, their families as well as on the life of H the community at large. Seriousness and prevelence of an offence are, however, just two of the many factors which the court is required to take into consideration in assessing sentence. In the present case the fact that the (serious) offence of unlawful possession of moshi is a prevalent one (in Dodoma) had to be weighed with the strong mitigating I factors with existed in the case, to wit:

A (1) the appellant is a first offender;

(2) she expressed contrition by pleading guilty to the charge;

(3) the amount of the illicit spirit she was found in (unlawful) possession of - 11/2 litres - was not considerable;

(4) while the method she chose to use in the war against inflation is B unquestionably condemnable, hard life seems to have been the thing which drove her to desperation; and

(5) she was gainfully employed as an assistant nurse for many years before she foolishly chose to fight inflation by manufacturing and selling moshi.

C The learned District Magistrate appears to have entertained the view, that, because the offence she was convicted of happens to be a common one, the appellant had to receive a severe sentence.

With respect, this was wrong approach in law. I should have thought that the decision of D the Court of Appeal in Silvanus Leonard Nguruwe v Republic, [1981] TLR 67 inflicted a fatal blow on that approach. Speaking through Mwakasendo, J.A. the Court said, at p. 68:

E Prevalence of an offence is indeed a factor which a trial court should always take into account when assessing a proper sentence to impose in any particular case; but it would be contrary to principle to consider this factor either as the predominant or only factor that must guide the F court in its consideration of sentence.

Section 30 of the Moshi (Manufacture and Distillation) Act, 1966 (hereinafter referred to as the Act) which creates the offence the accused was convicted of reads as follows:

G 30. Any person, other than a licensee or a distiller, who has moshi in his possession shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable on conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.

H It leaps to the eye that there is no mention in the section of punishment of a fine. It is an elementary principle of common law that where a Statute creating an offence lays down in no un-certain terms the sort of punishment to be imposed on the offenders I against that Statute, it is incumbent on the court called upon to enforce the law to act within the strict language of the law. The section does not, in my considered opinion, bring that principle into play. I hold that view because, in A my opinion, the legislature having used the word "liable" in the section, imprisonment becomes the maximum, and not the sole, punishment which can be imposed on the one contravening the section. But assuming that that interpretation of the section is wrong, it B seems to me that the application of the common law principle in this case must be subject to section 27(3)of the Penal Code, which reads:

A person liable to imprisonment may be sentenced to pay a fine in addition to, or instead of, imprisonment. C

That being so, it cannot be doubted, in my opinion, that in the instant case the learned District Magistrate had the discretion at least to impose on the appellant the punishment of a fine. Did he exercise that discretion judicially? I am decisively of the view, having D given anxious and, I hope, careful consideration to both aggravating and mitigating circumstances in this case, that that question must be answered in the negative.

In my opinion, the learned magistrate ought to have exercised his discretion in E accordance with what was laid down by Georges, C.J. (as he then was) in Hattan v Republic (supra). In the course of his judgment the learned Chief Justice said:

I am quite satisfied that the learned Resident Magistrate was misdirecting himself, when he F stated that "a fine albeit heavy, would not meet the requirement of this case." Wherever a first offender is concerned the emphasis should always be on the reformative aspect of punishment unless the offence is one of such a serious nature that an exemplary punishment is required, or unless the offence is so widespread that severe punishment is needed as a G shock deterrent.

The appellant in that case, an American seaman, stole a radio belonging to a prostitute who he had met on his day-off when his vessel called at D'Salaam. The magistrate's H court sentenced him to six months' imprisonment. The sentence was varied to a fine of shs. 1,000/- or, in default of payment, three months' imprisonment. In my opinion, neither exemplary punishment nor a severe punishment as a shock deterrent was necessary in the instant case. Bearing in mind the existence of strong mitigating factors in the case, I am I decisively of the opinion that the sentence meted out to

A the appellant is manifestly excessive and that deterrent purposes and the interests of society could have been attained by means of imposition of a substantial fine. But since the appellant has already served slightly over half of the custodial sentence imposed on her, it would not be fair to the appellant, in my opinion, to set aside the sentence of B imprisonment and substitute therefor a fine. In my view, the period the appellant has spent in prison serving that sentence is a sufficient punishment for the crime she was convicted and of and an adequate and firm warning to others not to contravene section 30 of the Act. I would therefore, allow the appeal to a limited extent by reducing the C sentence of five months' imprisonment to such term of imprisonment as would result in the appellant's immediate release from custody.

Kazimoto. J.: In Langiro Primary Court Civil Case No. 14/85 the respondent Kasian I Paulo sued Gerwin Constantin and Gerion Ndunguru as the defendants for encroaching and occupying his garden. He formerly joined the appellant instead of Gerion Ndunguru. But the trial Court advised the respondent not to join the appellant in that A case. The respondent won the suit as against Gerwin Constantin and dismissed it as against Gerion Ndunguru. Then the respondent proceeded against the appellant again in Langiro Primary Court Civil Case No. 58/86 also for encroaching his garden and occupying part of it. The trial Court decided to divide the land in dispute and gave each B party half of it. The respondent was dissatisfied and he appealed to the District Court which upheld the decision of the Primary Court in Civil Case No. 38/86. The appellant to this appeal was aggrieved and has appealed to this Court.

The appellant has filed seven grounds of appeal and in my view the most important C grounds which are decisive for this appeal are grounds 3, 5 and 7. In ground 3 the appellant has argued that according to the decision in Civil Case No. 14/85 there were clear boundaries and that both courts erred in holding that the boundaries which formerly existed have been washed away by water. In ground 5 the appellant has argued that D according to the evidence and sketch map the boundaries were clearly shown. Lastly he argued that the law of limitation has no application and should not be used to deprive him of his garden. E

I propose to dispose of the last ground first. In his judgment the learned district magistrate has stated that the land in dispute ceased to be used in 1968 and resumed to be used in 1984, sixteen years had elapsed, the limitation period had elapsed and the land had been nobody's and anyone can occupy it. With respect the learned district F magistrate had misconstrued the provisions of the Law of Limitation Act. As he has correctly stated the land was not in use for 16 years. Had it been that the respondent had been using the land for 16 years clearly there could be great force in his conclusion. In determining whether the period of limitation has run out one has to determine when the cause of action arose. Section 4 of the Law of Limitation Act No. 10/1971 states: G

The period of limitation prescribed by this Act in relation to any proceedings shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, hereinafter contained, commence from the date on which the right of H action for such proceeding accrues.

It is therefore clear that the right to sue for encroachment does not arise, however long the land stayed uncultivated, until it has been encroached upon. According to the evidence, the alleged encroachment and therefore the cause of action took place in I 1983.

KAZIMOTO J

The suit was instituted in 1987 and the period of limitation had not run out. Clearly the A learned district magistrate has erred.

As I have stated the appellant in this appeal was a party in Civil Case No. 14/85 over the same cause of action and he had been struck off by the action of the trial court. In B that case the respondent's suit as against Gerion Ndunguru was dismissed. The appellant is arguing in effect that having decided in favour of the respondent in that case they cannot use double standard by dividing the land into two. He has stated:

Mjibu rufaa hana sababu ya kumegewa Bustani yangu ila Mahakama kama imeona bustani C ni halali yake apewe yote si kummegea.

Apparently the first appellate Court did not appreciate this issue. The witnesses in both D cases were the same. I have gone through the evidence and there is no material difference in the testimony between the two cases. It appears from the evidence that the parties in this case are related and come from the some clan. There is evidence that once E upon a time the land in dispute was cultivated but was abandoned because of over flooding in the area. There is evidence that later the village government called upon the respondent, Gerwin Constantin and Gerion Ndunguru to clear the area and make water trenches on the area in dispute. There is also evidence that while the respondent was F bereaved the land in dispute was encroached into. There is evidence that the appellant gave the disputed area to Gerion Ndunguru who was sued in Civil Case No. 14/85. The evidence of Beatus Nduvuhela in both cases confirmed that their grandfather Holiholi gave the disputed garden to respondent when he was a small boy. Having gone through G the evidence I am satisfied that the decision of the District Court affirming that of the Primary Court in Civil Case No. 58/86 was wrong. The evidence shows that the appellant had no right to give the garden or part of it to Gerion Ndunguru. The garden in dispute is the property of the respondent. That in effect disposes of grounds 3 and 5 of H the appeal.

For these reasons the appeal is dismissed. The decision of the District Court affirming the decision of the Primary Court in Civil Case No. 58/86 is set aside and instead I uphold the decision of the Primary Court in Civil Case No. 14/85 and declare the respondent as the owner of the whole garden in dispute. I

Appeal dismissed.

Mabere Marando, for the Appellant
Rweyemamu, for the Respondent B

Msumi, J.: At the material time appellant was a legal tenant of the respondents' corporation occupying flat No. 187/X along Uhuru/Kigogo roads, Ilala area. It is C uncontroverted that on 10/9/75, without lawful cause, respondents evicted the appellant from the said rented flat. The eviction was effected in the absence of the appellant by forcing open the door to the flat and removing the households from therein. Though later on respondents admitted of the alleged unlawful eviction, they did not redress the wrong. D In other words appellant was neither reinstated to the said flat nor was he offered an alternative accommodation equivalent to the one in question. And despite the appellant's demand, respondents failed to restore to him some of his household items which they removed from the rented flat when they effected the said unlawful eviction. Among these E missing items is a refrigerator and a gas cooker. Hence appellant sued the respondents in the District Court praying for recovery of his missing household items or shs. 197,875/= as replacement value of the said items; shs. 2,125/= being special damages incurred by him in repairing some of his articles returned to him in damaged condition; F general damages in excess of shs. 20,000/= and a declaration that he is entitled to alternative accommodation reasonably equivalent to one from which he had been unlawfully evicted. The District Court sustained the appellant's prayer for shs. 2,125/= as special damage and for the declaratory order that he is entitled to alternative G accommodation. However, his claim for shs. 197,875/= being the replacement value of his missing articles was dismissed and instead the court ordered that he was only entitled to be paid shs. 29,162/= which was the cost of the said articles when he bought them sometime in 1974. Similarly, his claim for general damages in excess of shs. 20,000/= H was wholly rejected. This appeal is against these two findings.

The memorandum of appeal consists of two grounds. Elaborating the first ground Mr. Marando, the learned counsel for the appellant argued that the learned trial magistrate I erred in awarding the appellant the cost of the missing items instead of their replacement value. The aim should be to put the appellant in the same position he had been immediately prior to the unlawful seizure of the goods. And A this goal can only be attained by awarding him an amount of money equivalent to the value of the said items at the time when they were taken. On the second ground of appeal, the learned counsel submitted that the circumstances of the case are such that B appellant is entitled to damages in excess of shs. 20,000/=. In reply, Mr. Rweyemamu from the Tanzania Legal Corporation argued that what the appellant was entitled to is the actual cost of the alleged goods and not their replacement value. Farthermore the court could not award him the replacement value of the goods in the absence of specific proof C of the alleged value. Similarly, the learned counsel went on to argue, the court was right in refusing the prayer for general damages in excess of shs. 20,000/= as the appellant has failed to establish that he has suffered any damage at all. D

Starting with the first ground of appeal, in essence what the appellant is saying is that he wants the respondents to return to him his missing household articles in the same condition as they had been at the time when they were taken. In the alternative, if for reasons known to themselves respondents are unable to return to him the said items, E then they should pay him some money equivalent to their market value at the time when they were seized. With respect this prayer is both legally and logically sound. It is consistent with the rationale of awarding damages to a victim of a civil wrong. As far as money can possibly do, plaintiff should be restored in the same condition he had been F immediately before the alleged actionable wrong was committed by the defendant. In the absence of reasonable explanation from the respondents on the whereabouts of the articles in issue, it is logical to assume that the same have been neglegently destroyed by the respondents. In such circumstances the law is quite clear viz. that the owner of such G articles is not only entitled to be paid the market value of such articles immediately before their destruction but also he may be paid any consequential loss resulting from such destruction. This expression is supported by the holding of the then Eastern African Court of Appeal in the case of Express Transport Company Limited v B.A.T. H Tanzania Limited [1968] E.A. 443 at p. 451 which says:

Where an article has been destroyed by negligence, the owner of that article is entitled to recover from the person who negligently caused the destruction the market value of the article I immediately before its destruction, together with any consequential loss following on the destruction of the article which is not too remote. A Thus appellant's claim for the market value of his missing articles at the time when they B were seized is consistent with a recognised principle of law. The only question in this case is whether appellant has managed to establish that at the time when they were taken, the said articles were worth shs. 197,875/=. These articles were taken on 10/9/75 and according to the testimony of the appellant they were bought sometime in 1974 for shs. 29,162/=. What the appellant is saying is that within a period of about one C year the value of these goods appreciated to shs. 197,875/=. If I may rely on my elementary knowledge in mathematics, this appreciation is about 1000 per cent. I take note of the fact that among the missing articles was a refrigerator, a gas cooker and D some musical gadgets whose value normally appreciates with time. However, I don't agree that within a span of only one year the appreciation of these goods was as much as 1000 per cent. There was an increase in value but not as much as that. It is a historical fact that from the year of independence to sometime in 1978 when we were forced into E the war against dictator Amin's forces, the country had been enjoying reasonable economic tranquility. Unlike the years which followed thereafter, there had been no soaring rises of costs of consumer goods. Hence in this case taking into account the nature of the alleged missing goods I am of the opinion that an increase of 20 per cent of F the original cost is reasonable. Accordingly appellant is entitled to shs. 36,000/= as replacement value of the articles in question immediately after they were unlawfully seized by the respondent about one year after they were bought.

As for the claim of general damages in excess of shs. 20,000/= I think it ought to be G upheld. Contrary to the view held by the learned trial magistrate, in order to succeed on this prayer appellant was not required to prove actual damage. In the English case of Interoven Stove Company Limited v Hibbard and Another [1936] 1 All ER at p.270 the court said: H

An illegal distress has always been a trespass and an action would always lie ..... And where there is a trespass to goods, though no actual damage results, the law gives a right to recover damages not limited to actual damage sustained, but a right to recover substantial damages I even though there be no proof of actual loss .....
This observation was quoted with approval by the Eastern African Court of Appeal in A Kassamali Bhogadia v M.A. Nasser [1963] E.A. 610. On my part I would add by saying that this principle is not only restricted to trespass to goods but it also extends to unlawful denial of one's right of use of land or premises. Thus in the present case whether or not appellant has suffered actual damage, he has the right to recover B substantial damages consequential to respondent's acts of trespass to his goods and the rented flat. Inclined to this view I am awarding the appellant shs. 100,000/= as general damage.
All in all this appeal succeeds with costs. C
Appeal allowed.

Msumi, J.: Respondent petitioned to the Primary Court for letters of administration in respect of the estate of the deceased Hadija Manzi. Among other things, deceased left a house situated along Uhuru Street, Dar es Salaam. While the respondent's petition was pending, appellant filed objection claiming that the said house was given to him by the deceased vide her will executed before her death in the presence of four witnesses. All the alleged four witnesses testified before the court of the said Will. However, the court was not satisfied with the genuineness of the alleged Will hence dismissed the appellant's claim over the house. He unsuccessfully appealed to the District Court. Hence this is his second appeal.
In dismissing the appellant's claim both lower courts were greatly influenced by the fact that none of the four witnesses to the alleged Will was related to the deceased. To the contrary, three of them appear to have some relation with the appellant. This observation was strongly attacked by Lamwai, the learned counsel for the appellant. He argued that since deceased had no relatives, it was quite proper for her to choose any person to witness the Will. With respect, I don't agree with this argument. The requirement that at least half of the number of witnesses to a will executed under customary law must be related to the testator is intended to act as a safeguard against any possible fraud against the testator and the lawful heirs to the estate. In this case it is not true, as the learned counsel for the appellant wants us to believe, that the deceased had no relatives when she allegedly executed the Will in question. According to the record four people, including the respondent, testified before the Primary Court claiming that they were related to the deceased. For example respondent testified, inter alia, that his mother and that of the deceased were sisters. The claims of all these witnesses have not been countered by any evidence.
But even if deceased had no relatives at the material time, the need to dispel the possibility of fraud on the Will still remains. For this reason, I totally associate with the lower courts' suggestion that in the absence of the deceased's relatives, her ten cell leader ought to have been included as among the witnesses to the alleged
MSUMI J
Will. This requirement was particularly necessary in this case bearing in mind the fact that deceased was a very old illiterate woman and at the time when she allegedly executed the Will she was bedridden with long time illness. This fact reasonably explains why Mr. F.S. Mbuya, the learned advocate who drew the Will had to go to the house of the appellant where the deceased was staying to get the Will executed.
Besides the alleged Will not being witnessed by relatives of the deceased, there are three other noticeable factors which make the Will suspect. First it is in evidence that prior to the alleged Will, deceased had executed two wills in respect of the house in question. In the first will she had given the house to her husband. Later on she executed another will in which she specifically revoked the grant of the house to her husband and instead she donated the said house as a Waqf. Both wills were executed before Ilala Primary Court according to the rules of Islamic Law. Appellant was aware of this fact. Hence in D the absence of any reasonable explanation it is amazing to note that deceased had freely decided to depart from her previous practice of executing her wills before the Primary Court in accordance with Islamic law. The fact that in her second will, deceased donated the house as a Waqf clearly expresses her intention to have her personal E matters governed by Islamic law.

Secondly, according to the evidence of the appellant and four witnesses to the Will, the advocate who drew the Will had to go to where the deceased was staying for the purpose of executing the Will. It would appear that that was the only time when the F advocate met the deceased in connection with the Will. In other words when the advocate went to see the deceased on the alleged day he had already drawn the Will ready for execution. The question which still remains unanswered is when and where did the learned advocate confer with the deceased before he drew the Will. Or does it mean G that all the transactions, that is getting deceased's instruction, drafting of the Will, typing it and the execution were done on the same occasion. I find such suggestion rather odd in that it implies that the learned advocate had to move his office, that is his secretary together with the typewriter, sheets of paper and his office seal, to mention a H few, to the house of the appellant where deceased was bedridden. And even more odd, this suggestion means that while the advocate was conferring with the deceased and the Will was being typed all the four witnesses had already been lined up ready to put their I signatures on it. This sounds more of an operation than routine office working practice.

MSUMI J

Thirdly, according to the record, deceased died in April 1985. And under the alleged A Will appellant was appointed administrator of the deceased estate on 9/1/85. Under this circumstance one would have reasonably expected the appellant to take the necessary legal steps in order to effectuate the terms of the alleged Will. For example appellant was B expected to file probate administration cause in the appropriate court. It is thus surprising to note that appellant took no such step and instead he remained quiet till over one year later when he raised objection against the respondent's application for letters of administration. This dilatoriness can be explained by the reasonable possibility that the C alleged Will was drawn and executed after the death of the deceased. I say this because of the evidence of the three of the four witnesses to the alleged Will regarding the date of the death of the deceased. To the astonishment of the Primary Court, these three D witnesses positively testified that deceased died in April 1986. At the material time all these witnesses were tenants in the house in question hence they were bound to get first hand information of the death of their landlady. As deposed in the alleged Will, all these three witnesses are literate and responsible people. One of them is described as E administrator while the other one is "a consultant". Hence their positive assertation that deceased died in April 1986 while deceased died in April 1985. The lapse of time was too short to be confused. Actually what the witnesses were saying is that deceased died about three months previous to the time they were giving their evidence. F

Appearing for the respondent, Mr. Muccadam submitted that the applicable law in this case is Islamic law and since appellant is a christian he cannot inherit the estate of the deceased who is a moslem. Admittedly this is a strong argument. However, I don't think G it is necessary to pursue this argument in order to determine this appeal. Like the two lower courts, I have decided to confine myself to the question of genuineness of the Will in issue. I am of the considered view that the cumulative effect of all the factors pointed out in this judgment renders the alleged Will suspect. The circumstances surrounding the execution of the said Will irresistibly lead to the conclusion that there are some fraudulent H conducts involved. This appeal is therefore dismissed with costs.

I Appeal dismissed.

The Appellant and respondent were friends and it was during that relationship that the appellant got pregnant and a child, now in dispute, was born. Their intention had been to marry, but the appellant changed her mind. Hence the dispute over the child. The Primary Court applied the Law of Persons in dismissing the E respondent's claim on grounds of respondent's non-compliance with the customary Rules embodied in G.N. 279/63. The District Court held that the respondent complied with s. 181 of the G.N. 279/63. That court based its decision on s.160 of the Law of Mariage Act, 1971. KAZIMOTO J

Kazimoto, J.: The respondent sued the appellant for custody of a child in the Primary A Court. He lost the suit with costs. He appealed to the District Court which allowed his appeal. The appellant was aggrieved and she has appealed to this court. The appeal was heard on 2/6/88. The appellant appeared in person, the respondent indicated that he did B not wish to be heard on appeal. I proceeded with the hearing.

According to the evidence on record which the trial court accepted the appellant and the respondent were friends and during their friendship the appellant got pregnant and a C child, now in dispute, was born. This was on 11/11/83. It appears from the evidence that they lived together. The respondent stated that they intended to marry each other but the appellant had changed her mind. Hence the claim over the child.

The Primary Court applied the Law of Persons in dismissing the respondent's claim D stating that the respondent did not follow the customary rules as embodied in Government Notice No. 279 of 1963. The first appellate court held that the respondent had complied with section 181 of the Law of Persons and that the father of the appellant had refused to accept Shs. 300/= paid by the respondent. He also based his decision on E section 160 of the Law of Marriage Act 1971. The appellant's appeal to this court mainly centres on section 181 of the Law of Persons. She has argued in effect that the purported payment by the respondent has no legal effect as the payment was made on 23/7/85 after the child had ceased weaning. F

It is quite clear from the evidence on record that the appellant and the respondent are not married. There is evidence that the appellant and the respondent were friends. The District Court and the trial court found that the appellant and the respondent lived under circumstances that there was a presumption of marriage under section 160 of the Law of G Marriage Act. The appellant has strongly denied this. I am satisfied that she has been lying. There is evidence which established that the appellant had cohabited with the respondent under assumption that they were married. The child in dispute was born when the appellant and respondent were living together. H

In his judgment the learned resident magistrate who heard the appeal stated that as the child was born under the circumstances described above then he invoked section 160 of the Law of Marriage Act to the effect that the child belongs to the respondent. The issue is whether the learned resident magistrate is right in his conclusion. I have no doubt in my I mind that he has erred. The child in question is an illegitimate child. Section 160 of the Law of Marriage Act does not deal with status A of children. It deals with maintenance. It enables a woman and her children born during such cohabitation to apply for maintenance when such marriage has been rebutted. In no way does the Law of Marriage Act deal with the status of illegitimate children. B

KAZIMOTO J

In Richard Mapesa v Rashid Bwana [1978] LRT n.4 the appellant sued the respondent for a declaration that the children born to his wife while living with the respondent were his and an order that they should be in his custody. In that case the wife with whom the respondent lived and with whom he had children was legally married to C the appellant. The wife deserted the appellant and went to cohabit with the respondent who fathered the children. The marriage between the appellant and his wife had not been dissolved. In dealing with the status of these children the High Court held: D

The evidence before the trial court therefore conclusively proved that the children were fathered by the respondent. The respondent in fact did not dispute this. Since it was established that the children were fathered by the respondent, the legal presumption of legitimacy of children E born in wedlock was thereby rebutted. This means that the two children are illegitimate. Since the Law of Marriage Act 1971 makes no provisions for the status of illegimate children, the court has to resort to the Customary Law of the parties to resolve the issue as to whom the children belong. F

In view of the above decision with which I agree I hold that the child being illegimate the learned resident magistrate erred in declaring it as the respondent's child under the Law G of Marriage Act 1971.

In her memorandum of appeal the appellant attacked the decision of the learned resident magistrate in holding that under customary law the respondent is entitled to the custody of the child. In his judgment the learned resident magistrate said this: H

Section 181 of the Law of Person G.N. 279/63 state that when such children are born during the said type of marriage then in order to legitimise a child must (sic) pay Sh. 100/= to the father of the girl and that that should be done before the child has left breasts (about two years I since birth).

KAZIMOTO J

He went on to note that the respondent tried without success to pay Shs. 300/= to the A appellant's father who refused to accept the money. There was evidence that appellant's father refused to accept the money. He went on to hold that the refusal by appellant's father to accept the money was immaterial. The appellant had contended that the payment was ineffectual in law as the respondent paid the money after the child had B weaned.

Section 181 of the Law of Persons G.N. 279/63 provides:

181 A. A father has the right to legitimize his illegitimate children at any time by marrying their mother. C

B. If a man wishes to legitimize his child without marying its mother he can do so before the child is weaned by paying Shs. 100/= to the girl's father.

Clearly the respondent could legitimize his child by marrying the appellant or by paying D Shs. 100/= to the father of the appellant. The appellant does not want to be married to the respondent. The respondent could have legitimated the child by paying to appellant's father Shs. 100/=. The issue is whether the respondent paid the money before the child E had been weaned. No direct evidence has been led on this. The learned resident magistrate stated in his judgment that a child stops breast feeding about two years. That could be his own personal experiment but there is no evidence on record to support this F finding. In absence of any evidence I am not prepared to agree that a child stops breast feeding in about two years. There is however evidence that the child was born on 12/11/83. The respondent wrote a letter to the appellant's father on 23/7/85 declaring himself that he is the father of the child the appellant gave birth to. The appellant's father G rejected the respondent's overtures on 28/7/85. In her submission before me the appellant stated that by the time the respondent attempted to pay the money to her father the child had stopped weaning. She also stated that by then the matter had been referred to the Welfare department. If respondent paid the money after the child had weaned the H payment was ineffectual as paragraph B of section 181 of the Law of Persons has not been complied with. In my judgment I hold that the learned resident magistrate errred in holding that the respondent had legitimated the child in accordance with section 181 of the Law of Persons.

There is one aspect which I have noted that escaped the attention of the learned resident I magistrate. In her evidence the appellant stated that the man who made her pregnant is not the appellant. She testified A that she had a number of men who had amorous association with her. She therefore denied that the respondent is the father of the child. Her evidence ran like this:

Huyu mdai namfahamu kama ni mfanyakazi mwenzangu tumefanya kazi pamoja. Katika B madai hayo huyu mtoto wangu nimezaa na wanaume wengine. Mwanaume niliyezaa naye namjua mimi siyo yeye.

Sections 183 and 184 clearly gives the final decision to a woman to nominate the man C who made her pregnant even if she falsely accuses a man of making her pregnant. Her word carries the day and the man has the ardous duty to discharge the allegation. As the appellant has named another man as the father of the child the respondent has to prove, and such proof is lacking in this case, that he is the man and only man who made the D appellant pregnant. The learned resident magistrate did not direct himself to these provisions and had he done so he would not have come to the conclusion he did.

As a result and for the reasons I have stated the judgment of the District Court which cannot be upheld is set aside and I allow the appeal with costs and uphold the judgment E of the trial court.
Appeal allowed.

[zJDz]Judgment
Kazimoto, J.: In Mkumbi Primary Court in Mbinga District the respondent sued the appellant for Shs. 2,000/= being the unpaid balance for the price of a cow. The appellant was ordered to pay the amount claimed. He unsuccessfully appealed to the District Court. He is now appealing to this court. He has submitted seven grounds of F appeal.

Before deciding whether I should deal with the appeal on merits I have to decide on one point first. I have noted that in this case there was a change of assessors during the trial. G On 22/10/85 the assessors who sat with the trial magistrate were Felix Kapungu and Vicent Nusuhela. They heard the evidence for the respondent until he closed his case. Then the case was adjourned for defence which was fixed on 21/11/85. On that day the assessors were H. Wandela and V Nusuhela. The appellant did not appear though he H was duly served. The trial court decided to close the appellant's case and summed up the case to the assessors who both found for the respondent. The issue is whether the proceedings are irregular and if so the irregularity is incurable.

As a matter of practice assessors during trial should not be changed. In this case there I can be no doubt that Wandela's participation in the trial on 21/11/85 was irregular. The issue is whether there has been a failure of justice in this case. Section 37(2) of the Magistrates' A Courts Act 1984 has provision to the effect that no decision or order of a Primary Court or a District Court shall be reversed or altered on appeal or revision on account of an error, omission or irregularity in the proceedings before or during the hearing or in such decision or order unless such error, omission or irregularity has in fact occasioned a B failure of justice. It is clear that an irregular proceeding can be upheld if no failure of justice has been occasioned thereby. In order to decide the issue one has to ask a further question if Wandela could have properly decided the case. In the case of C Arobogast Fundi v Masudi Zaidi [1980] TLR 125 where the facts of the case were exactly the same this court (Lugakingira, J.) decided that there was no failure of justice in the change of assessors. I have some difficulties in agreeing with that decision. Wandela in this case as the other assessor in the case cited above never heard the evidence of any D witness. He did not know the case for both the parties in the case. After the summing-up he could not give any meaningful and independent opinion. He was the first to give his opinion. In his opinion he found that the appellant was liable. Wandela was in my opinion incapable, without hearing the evidence of the witnesses in the case reach a E just decision. Nusuhela concurred with Wandela, who never heard the witnesses. In my considered view I find that the irregularity in this case has in fact occasioned a failure of justice and I, with greatest respect, dissent from the decision in Arobogast Fundi v Masudi Zaidi (supra).

For these reasons the proceedings are quashed and if the parties wish they can bring a F fresh suit. I make no order as to costs.

Order accordingly.

Kazimoto, J.: The repondent successfully sued the appellant in the Primary Court for breach of promise to marry and the return of gifts he allegedly gave her in contemplation of marriage. Her appeal to the District Court was dismissed with costs. She is now appealing to this Court. F

In the Primary Court the respondent claimed six bags of beans, ten bags of maize, one sponge mattress, a bamboo basket, a sieve and a number of other things. It was also stated that the respondent took a goat to the appellant's father. According to the G respondent's evidence they cohabited in concubinage from 1984 to 1986. The appellant had vehemently denied this. I think she is lying. There is evidence to support the finding of the Courts below that the appellant and the respondent had been cohabiting in concubinage for the period in question. The issue is whether the Courts below were right H in deciding that what the respondent claimed were gifts given in contemplation of a marriage which failed to take place.

Section 71 of the Law of Marriage Act 1971 provides:

A suit may be brought for the return of any gift made in contemplation of a marriage which has I not been contracted, where the court is satisfied that it was made with the intention on the part of the giver that it A should be conditional on the marriage being contracted but not otherwise.

The respondent had to prove that he gave the gifts to the appellant and the Court must B be satisfied that the gifts were made on the condition that the parties intended to marry.

In his evidence at the trial the respondent stated that he had been living in concubinage with the appellant from 1984 to 1986. He stated in his evidence that in 1986 their relationship with appellant began to become icy. He referred the matter to a conciliation C board. He also stated that before the matter was reconciled the appellant's mother went to harvest beans they cultivated in the shamba. He testified that they cultivated together for two years and then he went on to give the number of bags they got and the D value thereof. It is therefore clear from the evidence on record that these were not gifts. These were what they earned through their joint efforts. He is trying to apply for division of what they had earned together. There was no evidence before the trial court that the respondent gave gifts to the appellant with an intention that the respondent would marry the appellant. I hold therefore that what the appellant and respondent harvested E from the shamba during the two years of their cohabitation was not a gift and the respondent is not entitled to have it returned. That disposes of ground one and two of appeal. F

In ground three the appellant contended that the trial court and the first appellate court failed to call the appellant's brother as a witness. It is the duty of each party to prove his claim in Civil Case. The court can only summon witnesses if the court is asked to do so. The appellant called four witnesses. She was not prevented to call her brother Nathaniel G Januari Ndimbo if she thought that his evidence would be material to the case. That failure could not be blamed on the Courts. That ground has no merit.

As the main grounds of appeal have succeeded the judgments of the trial court and the District Court cannot be upheld. They are set aside. The appeal is allowed with costs. H

Munyera, J.: The appellant was the plaintiff in Urban Primary Court. She sued the two respondents for redemption of a shamba. It was agreed that the first respondent is the appellant's husband and the second respondent just an outsider. At the time of filing the suit the appellant and her husband had seven children in their marriage. It was her case that the husband sold the only shamba they had to the second respondent leaving the children with nothing for the future. On behalf of the children she sought to redeem the shamba. She won the suit and nobody appealed. She was told to pay Shs. 20,000/= purchase price. She got into difficulties in raising the money and the trial court threatened to foreclose her right of redemption. She sought to appeal to the District Court but she was told she was out of time. She filed an application for leave to appeal out of time but it too was dismissed. She appealed to this court.

In reading the judgment of the trial court I found she was given time up to 30/4/83, a period of 6 months, to pay the purchase money or else the sale be declared absolute. It appears she was unable to pay the money within the time given. That being the case there is no reason for foreclosing her rights to have the shamba back. This is a case where the interests of children are at stake because of their father's recklessness. The appellant should be given every assistance. The appeal is allowed but there is no need for her to appeal to the District Court. F

In exercise of my powers under the Judicature Ordinance I assume the position of the District Magistrate and order that the money the appellant deposited be paid to the second respondent immediately and he also do surrender the shamba to the appellant on G receipt of his purchase money. If there be any claim for improvements it should be directed against the first respondent.

The appellant was charged with and convicted of murder. After close of the hearing of D the case one assessor opined that the appellant was not guilty of murder. The second assessor was of the view that the evidence established the offence of manslaughter. The learned judge, on the evidence, was convinced that the appellant was guilty of murder as charged. The judge recorded his reasons for departing from his assessors in assessing the evidence and convicted the appellant as charged. E

On appeal the appellant charged that the judge erred in departing from his assessors in assessing the evidence.

Mneney for the appellant

Sengugi for the Republic

[zJDz]Judgment

Makame, Mustafa, and Omar, JJ.A.: The appellant Usi Athumani Matu was I sentenced to suffer death upon his conviction for murder by the High Court, Kyando, J., sitting at Mtwara. He is appealing against that A decision and Mrs. Mneney, learned Counsel, appeared on his behalf before us. Mr. Senguji, learned State Attorney who represented the Republic, resisted the appeal.

The appellant was at the material time a school teacher at Ngorongoro Primary School B in Newala District. On 1st February, 1983, at a pombe shop he saw the deceased who had stopped for the night at the village, Kitama Cha Pili, on his way to some other village to go and purchase some fish. The appellant conversed with the deceased before the appellant left the place, only to return after a brief while with the Village Chairman C who told the deceased that he was under arrest. The appellant said that the deceased had stolen his, that is the appellant's, clothes. The deceased was taken to the Chairman's house where it was decided that he should be escorted to the nearby Police Station at Nyamamba.

P.W.3 Salumu Nayava, a cousin of the deceased and who was travelling with the D deceased for the fish-buying, told the trial court that after they had covered only about three hundred metres from the Chairman's home the appellant, who was about five paces from P.W.3, cried out "Thief! Thief! Thief!" and started hitting the deceased several times on the head with a stick the thickness of P.W.3's wrist. A crowd of people E came in response to the alarm raised by the appellant. P.W.3 was clear that this was after the appellant had started assaulting the deceased. There was a general pushing around and a great deal of commotion. The crowd moved on towards the Police Station and when the appellant hit the deceased again with the stick, again on the head, the F deceased collapsed. The crowd then dispersed and the appellant also disappeared. The appellant conceded in his evidence that he went away from the scene, but he said that this was because he went back to the Chairman's house to go and fetch a letter to the Police. Another person who said he was present when the appellant attacked the G deceased was P.W.4, Hassani Nammenge, the deceased's brother-in-law. His testimony was not identical with that of P.W.3 and this fact formed the basis of an attack by Mr. Kisaka, learned Defence Counsel at the trial. The learned trial judge dealt with H this matter in the course of his judgment and was satisfied that the differences between the testimony of P.W.3 and that of P.W.4 were the type one would ordinarily find when two people relate an incident in circumstances like those which obtained in this particular case, and that they did not detract from the reliability of the Prosecution case as a whole. I

Mrs. Mneney argued two grounds of appeal before us. She
MAKAME JJA, MUSTAFA JJA AND OMAR JJA
submitted that the conditions for identifying the appellant as the assailant were far from A ideal. Her second argument was that, in any event, there was no evidence from which to hold that the assault upon the deceased was committed with malice aforethought, so that at most the appellant should have been found guilty of Manslaugter, and not of murder. B
Mr. Senguji responded by saying that the offence of murder had been proved: Not only was the appellant the first person to hit the deceased but he was also the person who raised the alarm which made the crowd of people converge on the scene and participate in the assault. C
The learned trial judge closely considered the evidence given by the appellant and was satisfied that it did not stand to scrutiny. As the learned trial judge remarked, and we respectfully agree, "Under cross-examination he (the appellant) was completely D shattered". Studying the evidence closely as we did, we came out with the same impression ourselves. The appellant's story was that the deceased was injured when the crowd arrived. He, the appellant did not cry out "Thief" and did not take part in the assault. The appellant's version of the facts postulates the presence of two crowds with E opposing intentions: There was this crowd which attacked in a bid to release the deceased and for that reason this crowd started by assaulting the militiaman in whose custody the deceased was. We wish to pause here and observe that if that was so the militiaman would have been a very useful witness for the defence, but he was not called. F
There was also a second crowd, which attacked the deceased. The appellant broke down in cross-examination as to which crowd came from where and did what. Now he says that the people who came from the houses lining the route were the ones who were intent upon rescuing the deceased. Then he says the people with whom the appellant and G others had left the Chairman's house were the ones who wanted to save the deceased. The ones from the houses along the route were the ones who wanted to beat him. The learned trial judge was satisfied that the appellant contradicted himself because he was telling lies. The learned trial judge quite properly went on to direct himself that the H appellant's lies could not however form the sole basis for his being convicted. The learned judge was, satisfied, rather, on the strength of the evidence by the Prosecution that appellant had indeed assaulted the deceased as alleged.
None of the two gentlemen assessors who sat with the learned High Court judge advised I that the appellant was guilty of Murder.
MAKAME JJA, MUSTAFA JJA AND OMAR JJA
One gentleman assessor found the appellant Not Guilty of any offence at all, while the A second gentleman assessor opined that the appellant was guilty of Manslaughter only. In effect therefore the learned trial judge disagreed with both his assessors. In such a situation it is a rules of practice for the judge to state his reasons for disagreeing with the assessors (See Charles Segesela v R. Criminal Appeal No. 13 of 1973 decided by the B Court of Appeal for East Africa). Especially where the assessors have given reasonable grounds for their opinions it is desirable that the judge should clearly record his reasons for differing with the assessors. (See Baland Singh v R. (1954) 21 C E.A.C.A. 209). In the present case the first gentleman assessor was bothered by the fact that P.W.4 had contradicted P.W.3 as to whether there was a little moonlight or no moonlight at all; and whether the two witnessess merely heard the appellant assaulting the deceased or actually saw him do so. On his part the second gantleman assessor was D satisfied that the appellant did assault the deceased and that he was the first person to do so. Not only that, but also that it was the appellant's cries of 'Thief' which summoned the crowd to the scene, and that the villagers also beat up the deceased. He expressed the opinion that although the appellant was the one who assaulted the deceased first, and E was also the one who caused the others to assault the deceased, the appellant did not kill the deceased 'intentionally'. He found the appellant guilty of Manslaugher only.

We are satisfied that the learned trial judge in this case complied with the Baland Singh F rule of practice and that he gave good and convincing reasons for reaching a different conclusion from those of his assessors. He explained why he was satisfied that the appellant assaulted the deceased as alleged and we agree with his assessement of the evidence on this. As to whether the appellant was guilty of the offence of Murder as G charged, and not of Manslaughter only, we are of the view that the proved facts showed that the offence of Murder was established. The appellant hit the deceased hard on the head several times with a stick and continued the treatment until the deceased collapsed. The appellant was teaching in the village and he must have known that his very H unnecessary alarm would in the circumstances be a clarion call to the villagers to get incited into an unrestrained attack on the poor deceased who was not resisting being taken to the Police Station. The appellant invited the dangerous violence on the deceased and he initiated that violence. We are satisfied that it was the violence which I caused the intracranial haemorrhage which resulted in the deceased's death. The High Court decision was sound and the appeal against it is A consequently dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

On the basis of information received, Police went to a house in Regent Estate Dar es E Salaam where a motor lorry was parked. The lorry was in the custody of the respondent despite the fact that the lorry was in the name of respondent's father. The respondent was present while the police were conducting search in a compartment of the parked F lorry where elephant tusks were hidden. This compartment was broken open to get the tusks in presence of witnesses which included both police officers and civilians. The respondent confessed that the elephant tusks were his and that he had collected them G from Mikumi. This statement was made in the presence of four reliable witnesses. When called upon to give their opinions both lay members of the court were of the view that the respondent was not guilty as charged because the evidence given by defence witnesses did cast some doubt. Although the presiding judge dissented from that opinion H the respondent had to be acquitted. Hence this appeal by the Republic.

No case referred to: A
Mustafa, Makame and Omar, JJ.A.: One Nuru Mohamedi Gulamrasul and another person were charged in the High Court in Dar es Salaam sitting as an Economic Crimes Court in Economic Crimes Case No. 1 of 1986. They were both charged with being in B unlawful possession of Government trophies (to wit 133 elephant tusks) contrary to section 67 (b) of the First Schedule to the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act, and section 59 of the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act, No. 13 of 1984.
The other person with Nuru was acquitted after the Prosecution evidence had finished, C the court holding that there was no case for him to answer. The case against Nuru Gulamrasul proceeded to its conclusion. In the result, the two lay members of the Court were of the view that Nuru Gulamrasul was not guilty, but the presiding trial judge dissented from that opinion. D
From that acquittal the Republic is appealing to this Court. There was some trouble concerning service of the appeal on Nuru Mohamedi Gulamrasul, hereafter called the respondent. He apparently could not be found in the Republic of Tanzania. On application by the Republic this Court, on 12.2.88 made an order for substituted service E by publication in the newspapers on certain conditions. These conditions have now been carried out and this morning we allowed State Attorney for the Republic to open his appeal before us in the absence of the respondent as we are satisfied that substituted service has been effected in the circumstances. We believe the position is analogous to F that which would obtain in a situation provided for in Rule 73(2) and (3) of the Court of Appeal Rules.

Briefly the facts as adduced in evidence at the trial were as follows. On information G received a police party went to a house in Regent Estate, Dar es Salaam where a motor lorry was parked. The lorry was in the custody and control of the respondent, although the lorry was in the name of the respondent's father. The respondent was present with the police party when the lorry was searched. In a well-hidden compartment built into H the body of this lorry a number of elephant tusks were discovered. The compartment had to be broken open to get at the tusks. In the presence of a number of witnesses, both Police and civil the respondent stated that the tusks were his as he had obtained or picked them up at Mikumi. That statement was made in the course of police I investigation, before the respondent was charged or arrested.

After he was arrested the respondent made a cautioned statement to P.W.6, a Police A inspector. In the statement the respondent revealed how he came to possess the tusks.

At the trial, the respondent denied that he had ever admitted that the tusks were in his possession. He called two witnesses, who alleged that they were part of a group of B people who were arrested after the discovery of the tusks in the lorry and who were present during the search. D.W.3 stated that the respondent said the tusks were not his while D.W.4 stated that the respondent said he did not know anything about the tusks. D.W.3 was respondent's fellow tribesman and D.W.4 his cousin. C

On the prosecution side, P.W.1 and P.W.2, both Police officers during the search stated that when questioned, after the tusks were discovered the respondent told them the tusks were his. P.W.3 a civilian neighbour and P.W.4 a C.C.M. Branch Secretary of the D area, both heard the respondent so saying. This , as pointed out earlier, was stated by the respondent before the respondent was charged or arrested. This was during an investigation searching for trophies. We have no doubt that these four prosecution witnesses were telling the truth, in fact their evidence stood clear and unshaken in court. E This admission by the respondent, heard by four obviously reliable witnesses, was sufficient by itself to have founded a conviction of unlawful possession, unless the respondent had authority to possess.

Then there is the cautioned statement. This was taken by P.W.6 a Police officer who F testified and produced the statement. He took all the proper precautions and took down the statement made by the respondent. It was duly signed by the respondent.

No objection was made to the admissibility of the cautioned statement, and in fact P.W.6 was not cross-examined as to the voluntariness or otherwise of the statement. G

After the Prosecution case was closed, the respondent in his evidence, purported to allege that the cautioned statement was taken from him by force or torture and was not read over to him. He repudiated it. H

We do not think a repudiation in such circumstances can carry weight. If it was alleged that P.W.6 had obtained the statement by torture, P.W.6 should have been cross-examined on that when he was testifying, or an objection raised to the admissibility of the statement. Nothing of the sort was done. The respondent was legally represented. It seems to us that the so-called repudiation was an afterthought and would not deserve I any serious consideration.

In his judgment the presiding judge, more in sorrow than in anger, stated that the two lay A members did not completely believe that the respondent made the "confession" during the search and interrogation. The two lay members thought that the evidence of D.W.3 and D.W.4 introduced an element of doubt. The two lay members were of the view that the cautioned statement was obtained under torture. B
With great respect to the lay members, in our view the evidence adduced by the Republic against the respondent in this case is overwhelming. The respondent's admission that he was the possessor of the tusks was satisfactorily proved; and so was C the incriminatory cautioned statement. The respondent's defence that it must have been his driver who had hidden the tusks in the lorry without his knowledge, in the circumstances, was pure fantasy. Both D.W.3 and D.W.4 were biased in his favour, being fellow-tribesman and a relative. D
Indeed we are of opinion that the finding of the two lay members that the respondent was not guilty of the offence charged was a perverse finding in the circumstances. No reasonable tribunal on a proper and objective view of the evidence could have arrived at such a conclusion. E
We allow the appeal, set aside the judgment and order of acquittal of the High Court sitting as an Economic Crimes Court, and substitute therefore a finding of guilty as charged against the respondent.
We sentence the respondent to 10 years imprisonment. We order the forfeiture of the F tusks (if not already forfeited) and of the lorry to the Republic.
Appeal allowed.

Rweyemamu for the appellant

Munyera, J.: The respondent was the plaintiff in Rubale Primary Court. He sued the appellant for vacant possession of a shamba and a house in it then occupied by her. It is agreed the appellant is a widow of one Andrea Katumwa who passed away on 16/5/85. The respondent is the deceased's brother. The appellant and the deceased were married many years ago and lived together in the suit land till his death, he was intered in this same shamba. After his death his widow the appellant continued to live in there. In 1986 the respondent filed this suit. His plaint averred:

> Mnamo 1971 marehemu Kaka Andrea Katumwa alinunua shamba la shauri, 1976 akajenga mle nyumba ya matofali, mwaka 1978 aliolea mle, 16/5/85 alikufa akazikwa mle, baada ya matanga mjane wake Regina ambaye hakuzaa na marehemu amejimilikisha shamba na nyumba, naomba mahakama imtoe

To begin with it is not true that the appellant "amejimilikisha baada ya matanga." She has been living in there with her deceased husband, she did not enter the shamba after the death. It was the respondent who sought to disrupt her long occupation of the shamba. In her defence the appellant argued the shamba did not belong to her deceased husband, she bought it with her own money and built the house also through her sweat. For that reason the property was not the subject of inheritance by the deceased's clan. So the issue before the court was whether the suit shamba belongs to the deceased or to the appellant. The respondent stated the deceased had bought the shamba from one Ahmad Omari Katundu for Shs. 7000/=. He called three witnesses who supported his case. It should be noted that he did not call the vendor Omari (DW5). In her evidence the appellant stated she bought the shamba from Omari for Shs. 8550/=. By then the deceased and herself were living elsewhere. With the help of her relative she built a house in the shamba. In 1971 she entered into occupation but her husband remained in another shamba at Izimbya and used to visit her occasionally. On his death the clan decided not to bury him in Izimbya but brought him in the suit shamba. She called the vendor Ahmad but he turned hostile. In cross-examination he replied he in fact gave the key of the house to the appellant and not to the deceased and it was the appellant who occupied the shamba and the house. The trial court by majority vote (one assessor dissenting) found the shamba belonged to the appellant and dismissed the respondent's claim. He appealed to the District Court which reversed the decidion of the trial court and gave judgment for the respondent. The appellant appealed to this court and Mr. Rweyemamu argued the appeal for her. D

The question before the court was the ownership of the suit property as between the deceased and his widow. The key witness was Ahmad Omari from whom the property was bought. Some months before this suit was filed, probably the appellant guessed E something sinister would befall her, she went to Ahmad and told him she had lost the sale document concerning the shamba; she wanted something to protect her. Ahmad agreed to accompany her to Bukoba town and there he swore an affidavit before an advocate F (Rutakelezibwa) to the effect that on 15/5/71 he sold the shamba to the appellant for Shs. 8550/=. She produced the affidavit in the trial court as Exh. B. Ahmad repudiated the affidavit as false. The trial court was not duped, it held the affidavit a genuine document if it were not, then Ahmad should have produced his own genuine document on which the sale to the deceased was recorded. I am inclined to agree with the trial G court. The fact that the respondent did not call Ahmed to give evidence on his side suggests that he feared the witness would speak the truth as to whom he sold the shamba. It did not matter that Ahmad turned hostile to the appellant, his affidavit and his admission in court that he handed the shamba to the appellant not to the deceased H supported the appellant's case. For that reason I disagree with the decision of the District Court.

I allow the appeal, set aside the decision of the District Court and restore that of the trial court in its entirety. I

Kyaruzi, for the Appellant

Kumwembe, for the Respodent G

Mustafa, Makame and Omar, JJ.A. This is an appeal by the Republic against the sentence of one day imprisonment imposed on the respondent consequent upon his conviction for the offence of being found in H unlawful possession of government trophies to wit, 224 elephant tusks, valued at shs. 4,660,000/-. The Republic was represented by Mr. Kyaruzi, learned State Attorney, while Mr. Kumwembe learned advocate, appeared for the respondent before us as he did also in the lower court presided over by Munyera, J.

The respondent is a reverend father in the Roman Catholic Church, and at the material I time he was the padre in charge of Mchuchu Parish at Mikindani, Mtwara District. He was charged in connection with the A elephant tusks as aforesaid, and in a unanimous judgment by the Economic Crimes Court he was found guilty.

The Republic's complaint was that the trial court took into consideration immaterial factors and left out important ones in sentencing the appellant. The second complaint B was that the sentence imposed was manifestly inadequate. Mr. Kyaruzi submitted that the trial court should have taken into account the number of tusks involved and their value, and the prevalence of the grave offence. He also pointed out that under the Wildlife Conservation Act the minimum sentence is three years and the maximum is C seven years imprisonment. Read together with the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act the maximum imprisonment for this offence is fifteen years. The position is therefore that a minimum sentence of three years is provided for under the Wildlife Conservation Act. D

Mr. Kumwembe, learned advocate, urged this Court to impose a suspended sentence. He submitted that the respondent did what he did because he was naive and he innocently thought he was acting the good samaritan to Aziz. Aziz is the person who allegedly took the tusks to the respondent's residence for safe custody, the villain who has since disappeared into thin air, leaving the respondent holding the baby, figuratively E speaking.

The trial court's 'sentence' was about as long as the rest of the judgment. We propose to make only a brief comment on it. The trial court opined that the respondent's conduct was innocent and also made reference to the "surroundings the accused has grown in till F this age of 56 (which) made his knowledge of such things as trophy laws very limited, that is why he fell an easy prey to rogue Aziz".

With respect, we do not think that Roman Catholic priests are necessarily that naive and gullible, if that was what the trial court was suggesting. We are satisfied that the G respondent is a well-educated and informed person and that, in getting mixed up with the alleged Aziz he knew what he was doing, and that he had his eyes wide open. The trial court made an oblique reference to the respondent's comparatively secluded life. The H respondent's life was not all that cloistered and we do not agree that he was all that unworldly. He was going about visiting people, meeting several people in Mikindani town and even drinking coconut liquor with some of them. To expect this Court to believe his story is to be too optimistic. Receiving elephant tusks at about 12 midnight, I and again at 3 a.m., allegedly because Aziz did not want to be seen by thieves and taking the tusks there because there was no other safe place, do not impress us as A being innocent. It may be suggested that the nearby Police station at Mikindani was at least as safe a depository as the respondent's official residence.

The sad fact is that the respondent knowingly got mixed up with a person or persons B cannibalizing the national economy. In his position the respondent fully knew that he was straying from the ideals he was supposed to personify. He degraded and scandalized his trusted position. It was submitted that the casual stocking of the elephant tusks in a C banda showed his innocence. No, it rather illustrated his modus operandi, playing rustic innocence, knowing and exploiting the respect and awe with which the parish premises were being treated. The respondent would hopefully be familiar with the ideas enunciated by his right reverend seniors, the Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops D of the then Tanganyika, in their Pastoral Letter of 1960, 'The Truth that makes men free', wherein it was propounded that "One cannot be a good Catholic without being a good citizen."

Mr. Kumwembe conceded that under the Wildlife Conversation Act there was no E discretion to impose the sentence of one day imposed. As it is known section 67(2) of the said Act provides a tariff of sentences for the offence of unlawful possession of Government trophies according to value. The value of the trophies in this case was over four million shillings. Taking into account all the relevant factors, and disregarding immaterial considerations, the punishment imposed was negligible, inapropriate, and F manifestly inadequate.

In view of the foregoing, we allow the appeal by the Repubic. We set aside the sentence of one day imprisonment and impose in its place a sentence of five years imprisonment.

In the court of appeal of Tanzania the appellant won his appeal against the respondents. Following the verdict, the appellant filed a bill of costs through his counsel, Mr. D Lukwaro, for a total sum of 965,237/90. A preliminary point was raised that the first respondent should not have been made a party to the present application because he was not blamed in any way in the court of appeal judgment and as such, not liable to pay costs. E
The bill consisted of a total number of 19 items. At the time of hearing the 18th item was struck off. Items 1, 3 - 11 were not in dispute and were taxed accordingly. Item 2 covered instructions costs under which a total sum of 250,000/= was presented. Items 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19 and 20 were on disbursements. F
Held: (i) A decision as to who should or shouldn't pay costs is a matter for the court to say and not the taxing master;

Msoffe, S.D.R. In support of this contention he cited, inter alia, the relevant Court's judgment at page 8 thus: E

> We have gone through the other grounds of complaint, especially those in connection with allegations of corrupt acts and in respect of the status of the 1st respondent had failed to establish or prove his allegations. F

In answer to the above submission, both Mr. Lukwaro and Mrs. Macha were of the view that the 1st respondent should pay costs; arguing among other things, that, a decision as to who should or should not pay costs is a matter for the Court of Appeal to G say and not the Taxing Master. And further that if the court was of a different view in so far as the 1st respondent is concerned, it would have specifically stated so. I agree.

Reading through the C.A.T. judgment it is clear that the appeal was allowed with costs H without any qualifications as to who shouldn't pay costs. In that regard therefore my answer to Mr. Marando's submission is simply that the 1st respondent is also liable to pay costs.

The bill consists of a total number of 19 items, the 18th item having been struck off at the I time of hearing this application. It was struck off at the request of counsel (Mr. Lukwaro).

MSOFFE SDR (TAXING MASTER)

Item 1, 3 - 11 are not in dispute. They are accordingly taxed as presented. A

Under item 2 (instructions to appeal) a total sum of 250,000/= is claimed. In support of this claim Mr. Lukwaro contended, among other things, that much energy and time were spent in preparing for and prosecuting the appeal. He had to go through 338 pages, look B for and cite relevant authorities, and that generally the appeal was much involving in that it took two days to be heard, and that in the course of all that time both points of law and fact were raised and argued. Both Mr. Marando and Mrs. Macha were of the view tht the 250,000/= is on the high side and that awarding it would amount to C excluding the poor from litigating their rights. They did not however directly address themselves to Mr. Lukwaro's arguments on time, energy etc. spent on the appeal. This notwithstanding, the law on this aspect is as contained in Rule 9 of the Third Schedule to The Court of Appeal Rules, 1979. Going by the law and the facts before me, I would D answer Mr. Lukwaro by simply saying this:- That much as I agree that a fairly amount of time, energy, industry etc. were spent by counsel but the 250,000/= is certainly not commensurate with all that effort. To my mind the sum is on the high side. I say so fully conscious of the fact that in view of the "fund" of the respondents (especially the 2nd E respondent) that sum could easily be paid. The idea however is to allow such sum as would he reasonable in the particular circumstances and not necessarily tying oneself to the "fund" of a person. In my view a sum of 125,000/= would be reasonable and just in the circumstances. I accordingly allow 125,000/= and tax off the rest. F

Item 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19 and 20 are DISBURSEMENTS. Where possible receipts were produced by counsel to justify the alleged expenditures. In others some of the alleged expenditures were unreceipted it being alleged that it was not always easy to G secure receipts. It is Mr. Lukwaro's general contention however that both the receipted and non-receipted expenditures were necessary since in preparing for the appeal the appellant had to travel extensively in looking for and instructing counsel and that by so doing he had to incur considerable expenses. H

On the issue of DISBURSEMENTS and with particular reference to the present application, the reasoning obtaining in Mulla's Code of Civil Procedure 13th Edition Vol I and at page 152 para 7 is to a certain extent relevant for my purposes. In the said paragraph Mulla states: I

MSOFFE SDR (TAXING MASTER)

Everything which increases the litigation and the costs and which places on the defendant a A burden which he ought not to bear in the litigation is a perfectly good cause for depriving the plaintiff of costs. A successful party will be deprived of the costs of issues which he has unneccesarily raised. B

Admittedly the appellant had to travel in order to look for and instruct counsel, and that by so doing he had to incur expenses. However one wonders if all the trips were really necessary. And assuming they were, one wonders further if it was necessary to spend so C much time on each such trip. Indeed even some of the local expenses in the form of taxi hire charges are also questionable.

Under item 12 a total of 81,470/30 is claimed as expenditure icurred during one such trips. It is clear here that the appellant was in Dar es Salaam during this trip alone, for a D total number of 31 days! Was it necessary for him to stay for all this long period? One wonders if for all those days he was looking for counsel! I would only say that much as one may appreciate the necessity for the trip in question, the time spent for the purpose, was unnecessarily long. I will only allow the air tickets; a maximum of ten days which I E fix at 3000/= per day to include both accommodation, food expenses and local transport. Accordingly only the sum of Shs. 37,970/= is allowed for this item; and the rest is taxed off.

Item 13 is another such trip where a total sum of 30,097/50 is claimed. Presumably he had to make this other trip, again, to look for and instruct counsel if his first trip under F item 12 hadn't been a success. However, the 15 days here was again unnecessarily long. In the same way I will allow only his air tickets, and a maximum of 3000/= per day to include accommodation, food expenses, and local transport. I therefore allow only Shs. 11,985/= for this item and tax off the rest. G

Under item 14 he claims to have travelled to Dar es Salaam for the same reasons, and claims a total sum of 160,805/25. According to Mr. Lukwaro, this trip (along with those in items 12 and 13) was necessary since he was still looking for good counsel of his H choice. It may be of interst to note here that all this time Mr. Lukwaro's firm had not been engaged. Indeed it is not in dispute that they were engaged in February 1987. I will reluctantly accept Mr. Lukwaro's submission but will allow only the air tickets and a maximum of two days which I fix at 3000/= per day to include accommodation, food I expenses and local transport. Accordingly I

MSOFFE SDR (TAXING MASTER)
allow a total sum of Shs. 8,985/= under this item and tax off the rest. A Item 15 is yet another trip to Dar es Salaam where a total sum of Shs. 72,898/= is claimed. To say the least this trip was not necessary. It was made at a time when Mr. Lukwaro's firm had already been engaged vide item 16. Having instructed counsel one B wonders if it was still necessary for him to travel to Dar es Salaam at this time. I will accordingly disallow this item.
Item 16 was probably necessary since this was the time that he engaged counsel. As mentioned earlier Mr. Lukwaro's firm was engaged in February 1987 and this trip was C allegedly made between 25/1/87 and 28/2/87. The trip was necessary so that he could adequately brief counsel. Against this item a total sum of Shs. 110,986/50 is claimed being an amount spent during a total stay of 33 days! This again was another unnecessarily long stay. One wonders if it takes one slightly more than a month to brief D counsel! I will allow only his air ticket and a maximum of 6 (six) days at 3000/= per day to include accommodation, food expenses, and local transport. Accordingly this item is taxed at Shs. 11,860.00 only.
Item 17 is yet another trip to Dar es Salaam (via Moshi) lasting for a total number of 31 days against which a total sum of 87,116/= is claimed. I share the view expressed by E Mr. Marando that having briefed counsel this trip was absolutely unnecessary. Indeed even Mr. Lukwaro does not justify the necessity for this particular trip in spite, of course, of his general assertion (as he did with other items) that it was necessary for him to travel and brief counsel. Even if one were to allow this item still the period taken would be F highly questionable. All in all, I disallow the whole of this item.
The trip in item 19 was necessary. This was made at a time when a date of hearing the appeal had already been set and Notices issued. According to a Notice of hearing dated G 20/6/87 the date of hearing the appeal was set for 13/7/87. It was therefore necessary for the appellant to make final consultations with counsel with the view to putting ends together. However it was not necessary for him to spend all that long period from 14/6/87 to 24/6/87. Presumably by this time counsel had gone through the record and H client's long stay was not only unnecessary but a useless bother to counsel. I will allow only the tickets and a maximum of two days at 3000/= per day to cover accommodation, food expenses and local transport. Accordingly the item is taxed at Shs. 9860/= only.
Item 20 encompasses the period during which the appeal was heard. Against this item a I total sum of Shs. 100,447/10 is claimed.
It is certainly understandable why the appellant had to be in Dar es Salaam during the A time of hearing the appeal and possibly some few days later to do the following:

(a) Wait for date of delivery of judgment.
(b) Sort out with counsel taxation matters after the judgement B
(c) Make travel arrangements home.

However, it is still not clear to me why he arrived in Dar es Salaam as early as 29/6/87 C when the appeal was set down for hearing on 13/7/87! This early arrival was unnecessary. Even Mr. Lukwaro submitted nothing to justify this early arrival. The appellant's presence two or three days before the date of hearing could be understandable but not earlier. As such I will allow only his tickets, and a total of 21 D days (1/7/87 - 31/7/87) at Shs. 3000/= per day to include accommodation, food expenses and local transport. Accordingly the item is taxed at Shs. 66,860/- only.

In the end result the appellant's bill of costs is taxed at Shs. two hundred and eighty four thousand and eighty only (284.080/=). E

Bill accordingly assessed.

Lakha, for the Appellant

Kesaria and Marando for the Respondent H

[zJDz]Judgment

Mustafa, Makame and Omar, JJ.A.: This appeal is conerned with the custody of an infant male child. The husband, who is the appellant in this appeal, had applied by way of Chamber Summons to a District Magistrate's court in Dar es Salaam for an order of I custody of the child to be made in his favour. He succeeded in the District Magistrate's Court, but that decision was overturned in the High Court on an A appeal by the wife, who then obtained an order of custody in her favour. The appellant is appealing from the decision of the High Court.

Before us Mr. Lakha appeared for the appellant husband and Mr. Kesaria, with Mr. B Marando, appeared for the respondent wife.

We will begin with the short facts of the case. It would seem that the parties who reside in Dar es Salaam, were married in 1980. There are two children of the marriage, one is now about 6 years old and the other being Keval, the subject of this appeal, is two years C old. The wife had had occasion to stay away for 2 years from the husband, from June 1982 to May, 1984, before the birth of Keval. The wife was supposed to have gone to her father in Tanga for a week or so, but stayed nearly 2 years. The wife had left her child with the husband during all that period.

The wife again left Dar es Salaam on 1.5.88 for Tanga, with the child Keval, with the D permission of the husband, for a stay with her father for a short period, a month or so! The wife has refused to return with the child Keval to the matrimonial home in Dar es Salaam, until certain conditions were met, namely, that the husband should obtain E accommodation on his own, and not live with his parents and his parents' family. As a result the husband applied for custody of the child Keval.

At the Magistrate's Court the application of the husband was supported by an affidavit sworn to by the husband alleging acts of commission or omission on the part of the wife F to indicate that she was not a proper or fit person to have custody of the child Keval. The wife filed a counter-affidavit. However the counter-affidavit surprisingly enough, was not sworn to by the wife, but by Mr. Marando, who was acting for her in the cause as G her advocate. The counter-affidavit contained allegations of ill-treatment of her by the husband, her mother-in-law and sisters-in-law. To the counter-affidavit the husband filed an affidavit in reply. At the hearing of the application the husband also testified, and called one witness Chohan. The wife did not testify.

Before us Mr. Lakha submitted that the counter-affidavit should not be looked at, as it H was pure hearsay. In that event the only evidence available to the court was that deponed to by the husband by way of his affidavits and the testimony given by him and his witness. However no objection was raised by the appellant at the trial court to the I admissibility of the counter-affidavit on the ground that it was hearsay or on any other ground. If such objection had been raised, we have no doubt a proper counter-affidavit would have been A provided, after an adjournment, perhaps on terms, which could hardly have been refused. In the result the court, the parties and their advocates conducted, argued and decided the matter on the allegations deponed to in the affidavits and counter-affidavit. B Similarly on first appeal, the High Court decided the appeal on the basis that the matters deponed to in the counter-affidavit were validly before the court. Both the courts below had acted on that basis. The wife had certainly good ground for believing, and was so led by the way the appellant conducted the case to believe, that the counter-affidavit was in order and had been accepted as such and she had conducted her case on that basis. C

The proper forum for raising the issue of hearsay was at the Magistrate's Court. In view of the course the matter has taken, we do not think at this stage we can allow this issue to be raised. The appellant would on the basis of something in the nature of an equitable D estoppel be barred from doing so. It is a civil matter, and the appellant had waived his right to object to the admissibility of hearsay evidence in this appeal.

The wife on 28/4/86 was physically assaulted by the husband. The wife apparently left the house after the assault. The husband and wife were reconciled by the members of E their Hindu Community and the wife was then "allowed to enter the petitioner's (husband) house," according to the evidence of the husband's witness Chohan. On 1.5.88 the wife left the matrimonial home and went to her father in Tanga with the child Keval and has refused to return unless the husband lived separately from his parents and family. F

The wife had alleged that she was not able to suffer any longer the indignity and cruelty meted on her by the husband's mother and sisters.

Since the trial court and the High Court had differed in their conclusions on the evidence G adduced by the parties, we will have a look at the facts ourselves.

Mr. Lakha at the outset of the appeal conceded that in terms of the Law of Marriage Act in Tanzania there is a rebuttable presumption that an infant below the age of seven H should be with the mother. It is also common ground that the most important factor in custody proceedings is the welfare of the child.

Mr. Lakha sought to rebut the presumption in favour of the mother on certain grounds. He submitted, inter alia, I

(1) That the elder child is still with the husband and in his

1988 TLR p100

custody, and that indicates that he is a proper person to look after infant children. He A wants both the children under his custody to keep them together, and not to have them separated.

(2) That the wife had been cruel to the infant Keval and that the husband has B so alleged. He referred to a paragraph in the husband's affidavit reading "On 28.4.86 Keval was crying from 8.30 to 9.00 am and despite my instructions she did not pull the cradle and instead she absconded from the matrimonial home without the child" C

(3) The wife is illiterate and therefore incapable or unsuitable as a mother as she committed an error, due to her illiteracy, in giving the age of Keval to a doctor.

(4) The wife had, from June, 1982 to May, 1984 abandoned the elder child D who was looked after by the husband's mother during that period.

(5) The accommodation in the wife's father's house in Tanga is insufficient E and worse than that provided by the husband's parents' house.

We will deal with the allegation of cruelty against the child Keval made by the husband. Even if we accept as true the allegation made by the husband about what has happened F on 28.4.86, we are not persuaded that that incident established cruelty on the part of the wife. From the evidence supplied by the affidavits, counter-affidavit and testimony given, it seemed that on 28.4.86 the husband assaulted the wife who left the house and G was later "allowed to enter the petitioner's (husband') house" after they were reconciled by members of their community. It would seem that there must have been some quarrel between the spouses before, that the wife had left the baby crying in the cradle without moving it to and fro. If that was "cruelty", which is open to doubt, we think the husband H was equally "cruel". He could have himself moved the cradle to lull the child, instead of merely instructing the wife to do so. If leaving the child in a cradle to cry for half and hour was cruelty, then we think both were "cruel". That allegation, however, did not in our view establish that the wife was cruel to the child Keval on 28.4.86. I

MUSTAFA JJA, MAKAME JJA, OMAR JJA

It would have been ideal to keep the two children together if possible, but that factor has A no great or particular significance in dealing with the custody of Keval. We do not think that literacy or illiteracy is a proper criterion for assessing the sustability of a woman as a mother. There was no evidence as to the relative space of the Dar es Salaam or Tanga accommodation, and that need not concern us. We do not think that B the wife, in view of her allegations as to the living conditions she had had to endure at the husband's parents' house, was wrong to have insisted that she could not stay with the husband in the latter's parents' home. C

We do not think that the grounds relied on by Mr. Lakha could rebut the presumption in the wife's favour. We think that the wife should have custody of the child Keval in the circumstance of this case. An infant child of two should be with the mother, unless there are very strong reasons to the contrary. No such reasons exist here.

The High Court, on first appeal, made an order for maintenance of the child Keval in the D sum of Shs.3,000/= per month to be paid by the husband. Both Mr. Lakha and Mr. Kesaria agree that, if the custody of Keval was given to the wife, an order for maintenance was in order. However Mr. Lakha submitted that the sum fixed was manifestly excessive, and was not supportable on any evidence. There was no E investigation as to means before the order was made. There was some evidence by the husband that his monthly net income was shs. 3,200/=. Both counsel accept that was correct. On that basis we think that the sum should be shs. 1,200/= per month and we accordingly set aside the sum of shs. 3,000/= per month made by the High Court and F substitute therefore a sum of shs. 1,200/ per month.

Apart therefore from reducing the order of maintenance from shs. 3,000/= to shs. 1,200/= per month the appeal is dismissed with costs. G

Moshi, J.: This is an appeal against the decision of the Mwanza Court of Resident Magistrate which adjudged to the respondent shs. 8,000/= general damages with costs, consequent upon the appellants' breach of a contract of carriage with the respondent. I

Mr. Rugarabamu, learned advocate, argued the appeal for both appellants, Materu Leison (DW1) and John Foya (DW2), whereas the respondent, A Mrs. Bajilo Sospeter (PW1) addressed the court in person.

It was the respondent's case that on 8/10/84 at 11.00 a.m. she boarded a Majira Bus Service bus at Mwanza bus stand intending to travel to Ukiriguru. The bus operates B between Mwanza/Malya route, and her husband (PW2), who escorted her to the bus stand, paid to the first appellant, the conductor, a fare of shs. 20/=, and got a receipt. The owner of the bus, according to her, was the second appellant.

Upon the arrival of the bus at Ukiriguru, the first appellant refused to stop it, and it C proceeded to a spot about ten miles from Mapilinga, where it stopped, and the respondent forced to disembark. A passenger (PW3) in the bus allegedly saw all this. The respondent had a bag which contained her clothes and other items allegedly worth shs. 7,000/=, and as she was walking back to her destination, she was allegedly D attacked by unknown persons, who took away her bag. She reported the incident at Mwanza Police Station, and subsequently filed the suit claiming general damages of unspecified sum, special damages of shs. 7,000/= and costs. E

For their part, the appellants denied any knowledge of the respondent as a passenger in their bus. Their buses, which are two, operate in the business name of Sinai Enterprises Ltd., and not Majira Bus Service. Sinai Enterprises Ltd buses operate along Mwanza/Nzega and Mwanza/Geita routes, and not Mwanza/Mallya, and they leave F Mwanza between 7.30 a.m. and 8.30 a.m. as shown in their time table (Ext. D2) and never at 11.00 a.m. They issue to passengers tickets (Ext. D1) bearing the letter head "Sinai Enterprises Ltd." The claim for special damages was rejected by the trial court and, in my view, rightly so. But the one for general damages and costs was granted, and both appellants, on being aggrieved, have now come to this court. G

Mr. Rugarabamu's main ground of complaint at the trial and before me, is that the learned trial resident magistrate erred in holding that the respondent boarded the appellants' bus which, as established in evidence, is Sinai Enterprises Ltd. With respect, H I entirely agree with him. Before the trial court, the respondent and her two witnesses were positive that she had boarded a Majira Bus Service bus, got a ticket, and left Mwanza at 11.00 a.m. But it would appear from the appellants' evidence, supported as it was by their bus time-table (Ext.D2) and their type of tickets (Ext.D1), that their I buses' operative business name is Sinai Enterprises Ltd, and not Majira Bus Service, and that their buses do not leave Mwanza later than 8.30 a.m. In dealing with this point A the learned resident magistrate had the following to say at page 4 in his judgment:

The fact that the defendants claimed that they operated their buses under the name of Sinai B Enterprises Ltd; that only, does not mean that there was no possibility for Majira Bus Service to have been changed to Sinai Enterprises Ltd.

With respect, this passage contains unsupported speculation and conjecture, and it C would seem that the trial magistrate had allowed such speculative views to affect his finding that there was a contract of carriage between the appellants and the respondent. There was no evidence whatsoever suggestive of, let alone in support of the magistrate's conjecture that Sinai Enterprises Ltd could have been the successor of Majira Bus D Sevice. There was evidence that these two bus firms are not one and same thing. They are different firms as their business names clearly shows. The ticket allegedly issued to the respondent was not produced or shown in court during the trial. There was no hint by the respondent that it was the same as that for Sinai Enterprises Ltd (Ext. D1) E Produced by the appellants. Be that as it may, since there was clear and positive evidence that the bus boarded was that of Majira bus service, chances are glaring that the ticket was that of Majira bus service, and not Sinai Enterprises Ltd. This is a first appeal, and this court has power to re-appraise the evidence and draw inferences of F fact. I am keenly aware that it is only in rare circumstances that an appellate court would interfere with the trial court's findings of fact, and it would interfere, for instance, where the trial court had ommitted to consider or had misconstrued some material evidence, or had acted on a wrong principle, or had erred in its approach in evaluation of the G evidence. I am satisfied that the trial court erred in its approach in evaluating the evidence by allowing speculative views to affect his decision. Had the learned resident magistrate evaluated the totality of the evidence before him with judicial objectivity, he H would most certainly not have come to the conclusion that a contract of carriage had been established between the appellants and the respondent.

For these reasons, I allow the appeal, and set aside the judgment of the court below and the orders made thereunder.

In the circumstances, there shall be no order for costs. I

Appeal allowed.

An alleged trade dispute between Hotel Africana and Juwata was referred to the Permanent Labour Tribunal by the Minister purporting to act under section 9A (1) of the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act, 1967 as amended by Act No. 18 of 1977. The Tribunal admitted that the reference was made to it by the Minister under the wrong D provision of the law. It nevertheless decided that it had jurisdiction to inquire into the dispute. Makame, Kisanga and Omar, JJ.A.: There was an alleged trade dispute between the C two parties in this appeal: the Management of Hotel Africana on the one hand, and Jumuiya ya Wafanyakazi wa Tanzania on behalf of some 225 employees of that hotel on the other. The alleged dispute was taken to the Permanent Labour Tribunal for inquiry D and at the hearing there the Management of Hotel Africana was represented by Mr. Lakha, learned advocate, whereas Jumuiya ya Wafanyakazi wa Tanzania was represented by Mr. Kazoka. So as to facilitate easy reference we shall hereinafter refer to the respective parties simply as Hotel Africana and Juwata.

Mr. Lakha at the Tribunal took three preliminary issues, urging that the matter should not E be heard there. One of the issues Mr. Lakha raised, and which was one relevant in this present appeal, was that the dispute was not properly before the Tribunal because a wrong provision of the law was used, as a result of which the matter had not been validly referred to the Tribunal: the Tribunal was therefore without jurisdiction.

At the end of the day, after considering the rival arguments, the Tribunal reached the F conclusion that it did have jurisdiction.

Dissatisfied with that decision, Hotel Africana sought, and was granted, leave to apply for orders of certiorari and mandamus to remove into the High Court, and quash, the G aforesaid decision of the Permanent Labour Tribunal. Again Hotel Africana was advocated by Mr. Lakha, and this time Juwata was represented by Mr. Ismail, learned counsel. The substantive application was heard by Msumi, J. who decided against Hotel Africana. The learned High Court judge was satisfied, for reasons he gave and which we H were urged to reconsider, that "the procedure adopted in referring the dispute to the Tribunal is legally sustainable.... it is quite evident that this Application cannot be sustained". Hotel Africana's application for the orders of certiorari and mandamus was accordingly dismissed, with costs. I

Hotel Africana is now before us represented by Professor

Fimbo, learned advocate. They are appealing against the High Court decision by Msumi, A J. and have filed six grounds of appeal. In the event, only two grounds, Grounds 5 and 6, were argued: the first four grounds were abandoned and not pursued. As before the High Court, the respondents were represented by Mr. Kisusi. He is resisting the appeal. B

Let us first clear the desks: What is the position in the matter so far; and exactly what is the appeal before this Court about? The position is that the intended inquiry by the Permanent Labour Tribunal has not yet taken off. Hotel Africana have twice unsuccessfully challenged the Tribunal's power to conduct the inquiry, and they are now C urging this Court to find that the two fora below erred in saying that the dispute was properly and validly before the Tribunal and so it had jurisdiction to inquire into it.

As Msumi, J. has correctly remarked, there are several ways of referring matters to the Permanent Labour Tribunal. We wish to add that the different modes cater for different D situations and are not necessarily designed to achieve identical goals. They have different destinations, as Prof. Fimbo observed.

For our purpose we need only confine ourselves to sections 4 and 9 of the Permanent E Labour Tribunal Act because the decisions below really hinged on these two sections.

On 13th July, 1987, the Labour Commissioner wrote a letter to the Minister for Labour, copied to Juwata, Hotel Africana and the Association of Tanzanian Employers, briefing him on what he reckoned was a trade dispute between Hotel Africana and Juwata. The F letter went on:

Baada ya mazungumzo hayo haukutokea muafaka wowote kati ya pande hizi mbili. Kwa hali hiyo, kwa misingi ya kifungu cha 9A cha Sheria ya Mahakama ya Kazi ninahisi kuwa huu ni H mgogoro wa kikazi unaofaa uchunguzwe na hatimae nawe utoe uamuzi wa mwisho. Hivyo nawasilisha taarifa hii kwako ili ukiridhika uiagize Mahakama ya Kazi ifanye uchunguzi kwa kadri utakavyoona inafaa.

The Minister for Labour responded on the morrow by writing to the Chairman of the Permanent Labour Tribunal, copy to Hotel Africana, Juwata and others. (but not to the Labour Commissioner). In that letter the Minister made reference to the letter from the Labour Commissioner and said, inter alia: I

MAKAME JJA, KISANGA JJA AND OMAR JJA

Kwa mujibu wa kifungu cha 9A(1) cha Sheria ya Mahakama ya Kazi 1967 ninatoa idhini kwa A Mahakama ichunguze:

(a) Kama utawala wa hoteli Africana ulikuwa umewaachisha wafanyakazi kwa kufuata taratibu na kwa sababu za misingi za kisheria.

(c) ...

Mr. Lakha's submision to the Tribunal was that Section 9A(1) did not empower the Minister himself to refer a trade dispute to the Tribunal. We think it is pertinent to C reproduce that section at this juncture:

Section 9A(1), introduced in 1977 by section 4 of Act No. 13 of 1977 provides:

Subject to subsection (2) where any trade dispute exists or is apprehended, the Labour D Commissioner may inquire into the causes and circumstances of the trade dispute and, with the approval of the Minister, refer any matters appearing to him to be connected with or relevant to that trade dispute to the Tribunal and the Tribunal shall inquire into the matters E referred to it and report on them to the Minister.

When the Tribunal submits its report to the Minister the latter "shall make a decision in relation to the matters contained in the report and submit to the Tribunal the said decision F and the Tribunal shall register the same as an award."

Now, what did the Tribunal say about Mr. Lakha's submission was: G nzito na murua kabisa kisheria. Mahakama moja kwa moja imetosheka kwamba uwezo wa Waziri wa Kazi ni wa kumwezesha kutoa idhini (approval) kwa Kamishna wa Kazi. Kwa kuwa Waziri alitoa maagizo kwa Mahakama kuchunguza mgogoro Wakili Lakha ametoa hoja H kubwa kwamba basi hakuna mgogoro mbele ya Mahakama ambao unaweza kushughulikia,. Mahakama imetazama hoja hizi na kwa unyenyekevu kabisa, ni lazima Mahakama itie hoja zote maanani.

Having said the foregoing, the Tribunal went on to ask itself whether the action of the I Minister was prejudicial. The Tribunal was satisfied that the error was merely procedural - what the Minister did was to A approve: it was, however, the Labour Commissioner who forwarded the file to the Tribunal.

The Tribunal, however, went on to warn: "Utaratibu huo sasa ukome, sheria ifuatwe." One may be tempted to interject here and ask, what if the practice is not stopped? B
We felt it would help to appreciate the issue better if we explained the stand the Tribunal took over the matter, as indicated above. It is against that background that Msumi, J.'s decision would be fully understood.
Msumi, J. was loud and clear regarding the Minister's action. In the learned judge's view C "The wording of this subsection is too clear to require interpolation. To constitute a valid reference before the Tribunal, the matter must be referred by the Labour Commissioner and not the Minister. The role of the Minister is to give fiat that the matter should be referred to the Tribunal." Msumi, J. went on: D

In this letter, which is addressed to the Chairman of the Tribunal, the Minister is, in no uncertain terms, referring the matter to the Tribunal for determination. This fact cannot be E clouded by the eleventh hour attempt by the Labour Commissioner to swear an affidavit that he was the one who referred the matter to the Tribunal ... And unless the Tribunal is properly seized with the matter in dispute it cannot exercise jurisdiction. In this case, so long as the F matter was referred by the Minister who purportedly acted under the provision of section 9A(1) of the Act there was nothing before the Tribunal for determination.
Having made these observations, however, the learned High Court judge went on to G consider whether the Minister in fact referred the matter to the Tribunal under section 9A(1) of the Act.
His answer to this question was in the negative. He found, by some process of reasoning, that the Minister in fact acted under section 4(4)(a) of the Act. We say 'by H some process of reasoning' by design, because as it is clear, the Minister himself said, and in so many words, that he was acting "Kwa mujibu wa Kifungu 9A(1)...". The finding by Msumi, J. therefore implies taking away the specific words of the Minister and putting in the Minister's mouth, as it were, section 4(4)(a). The said subsection goes thus: I

Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (2) and subject to the provisions of section 36, A where a trade dispute has been reported to the Labour Commissioner in accordance with subsection (1) and both the parties to the dispute apply in writing for the dispute to be referred B to the Tribunal for settlement, or where the Labour Commissioner, after consultation with parties to the dispute, is of the opinion that the dispute should be referred to the Tribunal for settlement without any conciliatory measures being first taken in respect thereof, he shall C report the dispute to the Minister, and the Minister shall within twenty-one days from the date when the dispute was reported to him either:

(b)refer the dispute back to the Labour Commissioner with a direction to proceed in D accordance with subsection (2); provided, etc.

As aforesaid, Msumi, J. found that the Minister referred the matter under section E 4(4)(a). He also found propriety in the Minister's action. The effect of this was, as it were, to save the day for Juwata, to say that the dispute was properly before the Tribunal, which therefore had the power to hear the matter. In the result Hotel Africana's application for the orders of certiorari and mandamus was dismissed, hence this appeal before us. F

As it can be seen therefore the Tribunal took the view in essence, that the reference was under section 9A(1) but that no harm was done - it was only a procedural error, so the Tribunal was empowered to entertain the matter; whereas the High Court found that the G Tribunal could not handle the dispute if the reference by the Minister was under section 9A(1), but that in this case the Tribunal had jurisdiction, albeit on a different score, that is, the reference was not under 9A(1) but rather under section 4(4)a.

Prof. Fimbo has invited us to go along with Msumi, J. to the extent of holding that a H reference under section 9A(1) can only be done by the Labour Commissioner and that if it was done by the Minister himself then the purported reference was invalid, with the consequence that the Tribunal was not clothed with the necessary jurisdiction. Learned advocate for Hotel Africana has further urged us to say that Msumi, J. erred in moving I from the correct proposition above and asserting that the Minister was acting under section 4(4)(a). He also submitted that in any event it was an error to hold in the circumstances A that the provisions of the said section 4(4)(a) were applicable. Prof. Fimbo also invited us to say that there was no evidence from which the High Court could properly hold that there was a report by the workers, in writing, to the Labour Commissioner. The significance of this last complaint by Prof. Fimbo is that the requirement of a report B in writing is one of the pre-requisites for activating section 4(4).

In his address to us Mr. Kisusi learned advocate for Juwata sought to support the High Court finding that the reference was indeed by the Minister but it was under section 4 C and not under section 9A(1). In answer to Prof. Fimbo's complaint that under section 4(4) there must be a report to the Labour Commissioner, and in writing, and that there was no evidence that such a report was made, Mr. Kisusi conceded that such written report is required but he submitted that such a report was not mandatory. The notice in D writing was to be by the Secretary General of Juwata but, according to Mr. Kisusi, the requirement merely enables the Secretary General to make the report in writing: The word may does not connote the imposition of a duty to make the written report so the absence of such a report cannot be of any consequence. Mr. Kisusi further submitted E that if it is held that a written notice was necessary Hotel Africana has not proved that such a notice was not there or that if it was there, that it was not in writing. Mr. Kisusi also argued that in the event that it is held that under section 4(4) the Labour Commissioner must expressly indicate his opinion such failure was not fatal. For good F measure Mr. Kisusi further argued that, in any event, the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act is silent as to the consequences of such failures as Prof. Fimbo has pointed out, which according to Mr. Kisusi were merely procedural, so the failures are 'harmless' and have not occasioned 'substantial prejudice'. G

We were treated to formidable lists of authorities, for which we are grateful to both learned counsel. Some of the authorities made very elementary points or enunciated very obvious principles. We do not propose to detain ourselves with some of these. H

We propose to take another look at section 4(4) and examine the learned argument spent on it. Msumi, J.'s view was, as aforesaid, that the Minister acted in accordance with section 4(4), and now see how he gauges the Minister's action within the said sub-section. Regarding the requirement of a written notice to the Labour Commissioner, I the learned judge appreciated that "admittedly there is no evidence to show how the Labour Commissioner received the information and A from whom" but he went on to assert that it is more likely than not that it was the employees through Juwata who made the report. Assuming that that was correct there was another hurdle the learned judge had to jump and it is this: the report had to be in B writing. This is how the learned judge managed the task. he said "And since the report was made by Juwata, the same must have been in writing." We wish to confess that we find this reasoning rather acrobatic. Quite obviously Juwata makes various reports to various people and not all such reports are in writing. Why must this one, if there was C one, have been in writing? It was required to be in writing but that is long way from saying it must have been in writing. A further probe into section 4(4) is necessary. It is another pre-requisite that both parties to such dispute apply in writing for the dispute to be referred to the Tribunal for settlement unless, on his own, the Labour Commissioner, D after consultation with the parties to the dispute, is of the opinion that the matter should be referred to the Tribunal for settlement without conciliatory measure being taken. In that case he shall report the dispute to the Minister who may do one of the two things - under section 4(4)(a) he may refer the dispute to the Tribunal for settlement, E which is what Msumi, J. says the Minister did, and which view is supported by Mr. Kisusi.

We are not satisfied that the various pre-requisites under section 4(4) were complied with. We think they have to be complied with and that they are there for some purpose. For example, the parties may not wish to go to the Permanent Labour Tribunal for F settlement. They may for example prefer to have a Labour Officer to try and effect a conciliation under section 4(2), and they, or one of them, can effectively bar recourse to the Permanent Labour Tribunal under section 4(4). Under section 4(2) incidentally the G Labour Commissioner may (with the prior approval of the Minister) tell the parties to go back to the table for negotiation and settlement. Yet another example: it may be more advantageous from a party's point of view to have his dispute proceeded with under section 9A(1), where the Tribunal would only inquire and report back to the Minister H who would make a decision to be registered as an award with the Tribunal. These different avenues are neither empty husks nor sheer formalities. They are variously designed to effect the settlement of a dispute and each avenue leads to its own destination and consequences.

With great respect, we are not satisfied that the various necessary pre-conditions were I satisfied under section 4(4). And for reasons we have attempted to show, we are of the view that those pre-conditions are A indeed necessary pre-requisites and not useless procedure. Failure to fulfil them is fatal to the process. In the event the Tribunal would have no jurisdiction to inquire into the dispute and such exercise by it would have been a nullity - See Anisminic Ltd. v Foreign Compensation Commission and Another [1969]2 WLR 163. B

Our ultimate decision does not depend on only what we have just said. We still have to answer the question as to whether the Minister's action was under section 4(4) or under section 9A(1). Of course, as indicated, the parties hold opposite views. Juwata's stand C is that it was under section 4(4) which view we are unable to sustain.

We have to turn to the other suggested alternative - that is that the Minister acted under section 9A(1). It is clear to us that for the reference to be valid it must be by the Labour Commissioner with the approval of the Minister. When the Tribunal has inquired into the D matter it reports back to the Minister who then makes a decision, unlike under section 4(4) where the reference is for a settlement by the Tribunal which then itself makes an award. In his letter to the Minister the Labour Commissioner clearly advised the Minister "uiagize Mahakama ya Kazi ifanye uchunguzi kwa kadri utakavyoona inafaa" so E that the Minister may ultimately decide. The Permanent Labour Tribunal found the reference by the Minister improper, whatever the Tribunal preferred to call the action, only that it did not cause prejudice. Msumi, J. found it clearly wrong for the Minister to purport to act under section 9A(1), only that he found that the Minister acted under a F different section, section 4(4). Before Msumi, J., Mr. Kisusi had argued that the reference was made by the Labour Commissioner or that if it was by the Minister, then the Minister was acting as a delegate of the Labour Commissioner. We think the latter limb of this submission was scraping the barrel of arguments and that it is clearly G untenable. The Labour Commissioner was not empowered to delegate, he did not say he was delegating, and it would have been quite awkward and suprising if he said he was. How the letter of the Minister reached the Tribunal and whether or not the whole Ministerial/Departmental File was in fact physically taken to the offices of the Tribunal, is H neither here nor there, really. What is important, and clear to us, is that the matter was bungled and we are not in a position to say, like the Tribunal in effect did, it is wrong and don't repeat it next time, in the meantime we shall close our eyes to the impropriety and I hear your problem. We do not think it is a mere procedural error, arid of consequences. The Tribunal has power, it is vested with jurisdiction, only when a dispute is properly before A it. If, before, it handled matters not properly taken to its door and no one raised a voice, we can only say that now that some one has challenged the practice it is proper that the matter be considered and adjudicated upon. We are of the considered view that B the Minister was wrongly advised to refer the dispute to the Tribunal under section 9A(1) and that he was not legally competent to do so. What was therefore taken to the Tribunal was, as it were, a nothing and the Tribunal had no jurisdiction to enquire into what was not there. It is not a question of mere procedure, it is not a question of C 'substantial prejudice' to use Mr. Kisusi's expression; it is a question of want of jurisdiction. The document must be by a person designated to issue it. This was one of the points made in The King v Postmaster General ex parte Carmichael [1928] 1KB 291.

Because of the foregoing we are satisfied that the Permanent Labour Tribunal erred in D assuming jurisdiction and that the High Court ought to have granted the orders prayed for. We therefore allow this appeal with costs, and accordingly quash the finding by the Permanent Labour Tribunal that it had jurisdiction to hear what was purportedly referred to it. There was no dispute properly before it neither under section 4(4) nor under section 9A(1). E

Appeal allowed.

Shahidi, for the Respondent

Mnzavas, J.K.: This is an appeal against the decision of the lower court on 28/5/88 in which the appellant, Athuman Ali Maumba, was refused bail. D

Mr. Lakha, learned Counsel for the appellant argued that the lower court erred in law in refusing bail on the ground that it believed appellant's safety would be better protected if he remains in custody. It was argued that the learned principal resident magistrate invoked the provisions of section 148(5) (f) of the Criminal Procedure Act because the E police argued that there was a danger of the appellant being assaulted by parents of the children he is alleged to have violated.

It was argued that the test to be used before the provisions of section 148(5)(f) are F applied should be the gravity of the danger an accused is liable to face if released on bail. It was Mr. Lakha's submission that mere apprehension or fear that an accused would be assaulted if released on bail will not do.

Secondly it was submitted that the Learned Magistrate failed to appreciate that the provisions of section 148(5)(f) require a very serious proof before bail is refused. The G learned magistrate was said to have been swayed by emotions in refusing bail.

Mr. Shahidi, learned Senior State Attoney, in rebuttal supported the lower court's ruling and argued that the court was, under the circumstances of the case right in refusing bail. H It was the learned counsel's submission that section 148(5) (f) of the C.P.A. says that if it appears (and not if it is necessary) to the court ... that the accused person be kept in custody for his own protection or safety.

It was further submitted that it cannot be disputed that the charges against the accused I are serious and outrageous and that the lower court was therefore right in ordering that the appellant be kept in custody. A

The court was told that the Police are most qualified to know the security of an accused person and that in this case they should be believed when they say that appellant's safety would be in danger if released out on bail. B

It was further submitted that there was a possibility that the accused could contact the alleged victims with a view to destroy evidence and that the heavy penalty the accused stands to suffer if convicted could prompt him to jump bail. C

On 27/5/88 when the learned Counsel for the appellant applied for bail the prosecution opposed the application arguing that the Republic was "very much concerned with accused's security".

The prosecutor told the lower court and I quote: "There is information reaching the Regional Crimes Officer that the parents are trying to find whatever means to get at the D accused .... It is our prayer that the Court uses its discretion u/s 148 (5)(f) to protect the accused". The prosecutor also said inter alia:

> This prayer I make specially so as investigations have yet to be completed. E

From the above submission by the prosecutor in the lower court it was asked to refuse bail under section 148(5)(f) of the Criminal Pr. Act on the ground that accused's life F could be in danger as parents of the alleged victims were said to be looking for the accused possibly with intention to harm him. Another reason was that the accused should not be released on bail as investigations had yet to be completed.

In refusing bail the learned Principal Resident Magistrate said inter alia when dealing G with the prosecution argument that relatives of the girls alleged to have been sexually assaulted were looking for the accused:

It can be stated with confidence that these relatives were not seeking the accused to pat him H on the back or congratulate him. Considering the outrageousness of the offence against the accused, I am inclined to believe that the accused, if he were to be granted bail, it would render his safety in jeopardy, so Panju v R. [1973] E.A. 282 is satisfied. ...I find that given the I nature of the offence with which the accused is charged, he will be better protected if he were to remain in custody.

MZAVAS JK

The appellant was refused bail under section 148(5)(f) of the Criminal Pr. Act. This A section provides among other things that if it appears to the court that it is necessary that an accused person be kept in custody for his own protection or safety the court may order that such accused be so kept in custody.

The question this Court has to ask itself is how does the court come to the conclusion B that it would appear necessary that an accused must be kept in custody for his own protection or safety under section 148(5)(f) of the Criminal Pr. Act. If, as it was in this case, it is the prosecution which applies to the court that an accused be kept in custody under section 148(5)(f) the prosecution must show definite reasons supported by proved C and admitted facts showing reasonable cause for the belief that accused's safety would be in jeopardy if released on bail. Vague fears or suspicion by the police that accused's safety will be in danger will not suffice to refuse bail under section 148(5)(f) of the Criminal Procedure Act. D

In the present case all that the prosecutor told the trial magistrate was that reports reaching the D.C.I were that relatives of the girls alleged to have been violated by the accused were looking for the accused and that accused's safety was in danger. There was no evidence in the lower court to support such reports other than the mere word of the prosecutor. E

The test required under section 148(5)(f) is not whether it would be better for the accused to be kept in custody for his own safety but rather whether it is necessary that the accused should be kept in custody for his own good. Before the provisions of F section 148(5) (f) of the Act are invoked to the detriment of an accused person the prosecution must clearly show that accused's safety is in danger and such information must be verified as to its authenticity. And what is more the police must prove that circumstances were such that they are unable to protect an accused from alleged threats G to his safety.

It is always the duty of the police to ensure that persons who have already been charged in court and are on bail pending hearing of their cases are not harassed in any way by relatives of victims of the alleged crimes. The police should not shirk this honourable H responsibility by invoking the provisions of section 148(5) (f) of the Act.

It was a total misdirection by the learned Principal Resident Magistrate to say - "I find that given the nature of the offence with which the accused is charged he will be better I protected if he were to remain in custody". The learned trial magistrate by so saying gives the impression that he refused the accused bail because of the nature of the offence A he is said to have committed not because his safety would be in danger if he was released on bail.
Before the provision of section 148(5) (f) are invoked by the court it must be clearly B shown that an accused's safety would be glaringly in danger and that circumstances are such that the police would not be in position to prevent such danger.
Many accused persons would be refused their statutory rights if the provisions of section 148(5)(f) are not strictly construed by the courts. In the present case there was no C suggestion in the lower court that the appellant would leave the jurisdiction of the court if granted bail nor was there any suggestion that the appellant was going to tamper with prosecution investigations if released on bail. Bearing in mind that the accused was arrested and brought to court on 27/5/88 the prosecution cannot, at this stage, be heard to say that investigations have not yet been completed. D
It is in the discretion of the court to decide whether or not to refuse bail under section 148(5)(f) of the Criminal Procedure Act. This discretion must always be vigilantly and justly exercised. This is all the more so where, as it is in this case, the accused himself E rebuts the prosecution argument that his safety would be in jeopardy if released on bail.
I agree with the learned counsel for the appellant that had the learned trial magistrated directed herself on these lines she would not have refused bail. In the event the appeal is upheld. F
The accused is released on bail on furnishing a bond of shs. 50,000/= with two sureties each in like sum.

The plaintiff held about 5 acres of land under the deemed right of occupancy. Due to poor health she invited relatives to live on it while she was staying in Dar es Salaam . In 1984, a survey was done on the piece of land resulting in two farms - Farm 2 and Farm 3. While Farm 2 was allocated to the plaintiff, Farm 3 was allocated to the first D defendant. Compensation in respect of Farm 3 was worked out and paid to those who were occupying it. Later the plaintiff came to know about the survey and allocation of Farm 3 to the first defendant. She, joining her children, sued the first defendant and the Municipal Director of Mwanza arguing that they were the lawful owners of Farm 3 E notwithstanding the compensation paid to third parties for the unexhausted improvements. One of the issues argued in court was whether or not payment of compensation for unexhausted improvements to the holder of a deemed right of occupancy or his agent or representative extinguishes that right. MOSHI J

Moshi, J.: The dispute between the parties involves the ownership of a parcel of land A measuring about 5 acres, presently know as Farms 2 and 3, measuring 2.17 and 2.8 acres respectively, in Bwiru area, which is a planning area, within the jurisdiction of Mwanza Municipal Council.

Mr. Maira, learned advocate, and Mr. Kahangwa, learned advocate, appeared for the B plaintiff and the first defendant respectively, whereas the Mwanza Municipal Council lawyer, Mr. Matata, represented the second defendant.

The case for the plaintiffs is that they are a family group-mother (PW1), elder son C (PW2) and younger son (PW3) respectively. The first plaintiff (PW1), who is now an old and blind woman, resides in Dar es Salaam with the second plaintiff (PW2), whereas the third defendant (PW3) is the Tabora T.T.C. Branch Manager. At an unknown time D in the distant past PW1 and her sister Sofia inherited the land in dispute from their father Ngunga. Sofia died, and PW1 stayed on the land with Sofia's sister Emersiana. About 13 years ago PW1 fell sick and went to Dar es Salaam, where she has resided todate, leaving the shamba under the care and management of Emersiana. She had two E houses on the land-one with a thatched roof and another with corrugated iron sheets roofing -and some crops - permanent and annual. The houses were on the part of the land which later became Farm 2, and site rate and service charge was being paid in connection therewith. Emersiana invited their relative, Ndege Masandika, to stay with F her on the land, and upon the death of Emersiana in 1983, Ndege took over the care and management of the land with leave of PW1. Ndege was living on the proceeds of the land, and he was living in one of the two houses. He was cultivating a variety of crops on the portion of the land which later became Farm 3, together with four persons, G Mdongo (PW7), Mtoka (PW8), Machai (PW9) and Kilangi (PW10), who had been invited to the farm by Emersiana and PW1. By 1985 when the land in dispute was surveyed, these persons had stayed on, and cultivated, the land for over ten years.

In 1980 the third plaintiff (PW3) applied (Ext. P3) to the Mwanza Municipal Planner H (DW2) for the survey of their land in Bwiru. They wanted to build permanent houses and modernise their farming. A reply in 1983 (Ext. P4) was to the effect that the application would be attended to soon. In 1985 the plaintiffs then learned that the land had been surveyed giving rise to two Farm - farms 2 and 3. Farm 3 was offered to the first I defendant, and the five persons, including Ndege, were paid a compensation totalling shs. 87,940/= for their crops and other unexhausted improvements. Farm 2 was A reserved for first plaintiff, and Ndege remained on Farm 2 taking care of the houses and the crops, on behalf of the first plaintiff, until his death in 1987. He was succeeded by one Maarifa Kinyozi (PW11) who is presently occupying that farm on behalf, and with the consent, of the first plaintiff. The plaintiffs were aggrieved, and felt that they were B robbed of their land - Farm 3 - and their letters of protest (Exts P1, P2, P6, P7 and P8) proved futile. They then filed the suit challenging the offer of Farm 3 to the first defendant, claiming that it was unlawful. C

The case for the defendants, on the other hand, was that in 1979 the first defendant (DW1), who is currently the Tabora Regional Commissioner, applied (Ext. D1) for a plot in any part of Bwiru area. He was then the Bariadi District Commissioner. In 1980 the third plaintiff lodged his application. The two applications were found and processed D by the Acting Municipal Planner (DW2) when he reported at Mwanza in 1982. He accompanied PW3 to the site, and PW3 showed him the area around the two houses - farm 2. He prepared a town planning drawing (Ext D6) for Bwiru area showing Farms 2 and 3 as Mwanza does not have a master plan. He made a survey request to the Acting Regional Land surveyor (DW3), and the survey was undertaken in 1984 giving rise to E Farm 2 and 3. The two applicants - the first plantiff and the first defendant, were allocated the farms - Farm 2 and Farm 3 - respectively. The use of the land was agricultural only, and according to the planning standards of that area, individual plots F were not to exceed 3 acres in size. The first defendant's offer was dated 28.11.85, and he followed up the offer and was duly issued with a certificate of occupancy No. 2155 (Ext D5) over Farm 3, Bwiru area, for a term of 99 years commencing from 1.10.1985. This was duly registered on 9th November, 1985, under number 20939. The certificate G of Title contains in its schedule a registered survey plan (Ext. D7) showing the boundaries of Farms 2 and 3. Compensation to the occupants of Farm 3 was processed by the Acting Municipal land officer (DW4) who was the Senior Assistant Valuer. He was introduced to the five persons by the secretary to the cell leader

(PW6) in the H presence of their CCM branch secretary and other villagers. They showed the demarcations of the farm and pointed out their crops and other unexhausted improvements. Their cell leader, Kafula, confirmed in writing (Ext D8) that Farm 3 belonged to Ndege. DW4 prepared a schedule of compensation (Ext D4) which I contained the names of the compensatees, a description of what they were being compensated for, and the amounts due to them. They were paid and, without raising any A objections or complaints, duly signed the compensation schedule, as did DW4, the Regional Land Development Officer (DW5), the District Commissioner and the Regional Commissioner.

The first defendant is presently developing the land. It is the defendant's contention that B the first defendant is the legal owner of Farm 3, and that the right of occupancy issued to him was processed, and obtained, legally. The following issues, which I have taken liberty to restructure, were agreed upon: C

1. Whether the plaintiffs had a deemed right of occupancy before the relevant land was surveyed. If so ..
2. Whether the deemed right of occupancy was surrendered upon payment of compensation.
3. Whether the offer of the land to the first defendant by the second defendant was lawful. D
4. Whether a deemed rights of occupancy is applicable in an urban planning area.
5. Reliefs. E

But, in the course of the trial, it transpired that the first and fourth issues were not in dispute. It was conceded that the first plaintiff had a deemed right of occupancy over the F land in dispute in terms of section 2 of the Land Ordinance, Cap. 113, before the survey, as she had inherited it from her father. I say the first plaintiff, and not all the plaintiffs, for it was the first plaintiff who had inherited the land, and there was no evidence that she had bequeathed it, or any part thereof, to any of her sons - the second G and third plaintiffs. It was equally conceded that Bwiru area, where the land in dispute is situate, is a planning area within the Municipality of Mwanza. In addition to these matters not being in dispute, there was evidence from both sides which established issues 1 and 4 in the affirmative. I therefore, hereby hold, in connection with issues 1 and 4, H that before the survey the first plaintiff had a deemed right of occupancy, over the land in dispute, which is in the planning area of Bwiru, within the Municipality of Mwanza.

Issue number 2 attracted a heated argument from both sides. Mr. Maira submitted that there was no evidence that the President had either acquired or revoked the deemed I right of occupancy under either section 10 of Cap. 113 or section 45 of Cap. 378 respectively.

MOSHI J

That may as well have been the case but, with respect, it appears to me to be out of A context, for the question before the court is whether the payment of compensation extinguished the deemed right of occupancy. The court was referred to a number of decided cases, the majority of which, after having had sight of them, appear to me to be, again with even greater respect to Mr. Maira, out of touch with the point in issue, and B others, distinguishable from the present case. The nearest authority to the point cited was the Court of Appeal judgment in Methuselah Paul Nyangwaswa v Christopher Mbote Nyirabu - Civil No. 14 of 1985, Dar es Salaam (unreported) in which, according to Mr. Maira, it was held that a deemed right of occupancy, held by virtue of C native law and custom, is not extinguished upon an area being declared to be a planning area. Having had an opportunity to read the Court of Appeal judgment in Methuselah's case, I find myself unable to agree with Mr. Maira. That was not the ratio decidendi of the case. The decision of the Court of Appeal was different. The facts of D that case and the points for decision were different. What transpired, for our purposes, was simply that the Court of Appeal felt unprepared to positively hold that a deemed right of occupancy extinguishes upon an area being declared a planning area on the rather inconclusive and tenuous arguments advanced before it, and in view of the still E developing Tanzania law on Land and Land Tenure whose certain areas are unclear and would have to await the necessary legislation. Let me, for purposes of clarity, reproduce hereunder what Mustafa, J.A. said at page 5 of the judgment which formed the basis for Mr. Maira's argument: F

In my view the law in Tanzania on Land and Land Tenure is still developing and certain areas are unclear and would have to await the necessary legislation. At any rate, I am not prepared, G on the rather inconclusive and tenuous arguments advanced in this appeal, to hold that the right of a holder of a right of occupancy by virtue of native law and custom is extinguished and he thereby becomes a "squatter" on an area being declared a planning area. (Emphasis mine). H

I would agree with Mr. Kahangwa, and hold that, Methuselah's case is not a positive authority for or against a legal proposition that a deemed right of occupancy, either extinguishes or does not extinguish, upon an area being declared a planning area. However, the events in this case did not end with the land being declared a planning I area. Compensation for unexhausted improvements was paid in connection with Farm 3 and, for my part, I would not hesitate to hold that A payment of compensation to a holder of a deemed right of occupancy, or his agent or his representative, extinguishes that right, for it would mean the surrender of the same. This takes us back to our question - whether the payment of the compensation extinguished B the first plaintiff's deemed right of occupancy in connection with Farm 3.

Mr. Maira has submitted that the compensatees were cultivators and/or users of the land with permission and were compensated only for their own unexhausted improvements. C He further argued that they had no right in the land which they could have surrendered since the interest in the land was with the first plaintiff. With respect, I am not, on the evidence, persuaded by that argument. The compensatees may as well have recognized the first plaintiff as the owner of the land, but it would appear that they kept that D knowledge to themselves. A different picture was portrayed to third parties. All the compensatees, except Ndege, physically stayed and lived on Farm 3 where they had houses, families and a variety of crops. They had, with leave and knowledge of the first plaintiff, thus remained in occupation for over ten years. In actual fact, they were the E occupiers and developers of that land. It is in evidence that they did not tell DW4, at the time the compensation was assessed, that the land belonged to person or persons other than themselves. They were introduced by the village leaders (PW6) as occupiers of the land, and they then showed the boundaries of their land as well as their property. They F held themselves out to the assessors as the owners of the land, and they accepted the compensation without remorse or complaint. An attempt was made by Mr. Maira to challenge the procedure followed in assessing the compensation by claiming that the G compensation was effected by force and that the compensatees were not given the right of first option. With respect, I do not agree. It was established in evidence, including that of the compensatees themselves, that such a thing never happened. I am satisfied that the correct procedure was followed in the assessment, and in the effecting, of the compensation. In the circumstances, third parties, in my view, had a right to believe that H the compensatees were both the owners of the land and the property thereon. I find substance in the submission by the learned advocates for the defendants that, in the event that the first plaintiff's right of occupancy were not extinguished upon the land being declared a planning area, then it was most certainly extinguished upon payment of the I compensation.

The status of Ndege, in my view, aggravated the matter to the detriment of the plaintiffs. A He had been paid compensation, both for his unexhausted improvements and those of the first plaintiff. Mr. Maira argued that he was neither an agent nor a representative of the first plaintiff, whereas both Mr. Kahangwa and Mr. Matata maintained that he was. B He had been invited to the land by Emersiana, with leave of the first plaintiff, and took over the care and management of the land from Emersiana, again with leave of the first plaintiff, at the death of Emersiana. An attempt was made to show that there were things which Emersiana could do or was empowered to do, but which Ndege could not do or C was not empowered to do. In other words, an attempt was made to show that Emersiana as a representative of the first plaintiff, had more authority and more power of representation than that of Ndege. With genuine respect, I am not persuaded that there was such a distinction, or that such a distinction could be drawn. Evidence established D the contrary. Both Emersiana and Ndege were relatives of the plaintiffs. They both stayed in the houses of the first plaintiff on Farm 2. Ndege stepped into the shoes of Emersiana upon her death, and his terms of reference, as those of Emersiana, were allegedly verbal. Unfortunately, both Emersiana and Ndege are dead, and it remains a E matter for conjecture as to what their version of the instructions between themselves and the first plaintiff could have been. By opting to stay away from the land for over 12 years, leaving the same under the charge and management of Emersiana and Ndege, the first plaintiff must be taken to have intended that third parties should have taken the two F as persons with her express and implied authority to act on her behalf. It was no doubt in acknowledgement of this that the plaintiffs opted not to proceed against Ndege, but to let him continue to stay on the land until his death in 1987. There is evidence from the cell leader (Ext D8), which was introduced at the instance of the plaintiffs' advocate, that G Ndege was being regarded at the village as the owner of that part of the land which became Farm 3. This piece of evidence lands substantial support to what the Senior Assistant Valuer (DW4) told the court, that Ndege held himself out as the owner of Farm 3 at the time of the assessment of the compensation. Be that as it may, I do not H think, in my considered opinion, that it is now open to the plaintiffs to disown Ndege. I am satisfied that Ndege, as had been Emersiana, was the agent and representative of the plaintiffs, and that he had received the compensation on their behalf. For all the foregoing I reasons, I would, therefore, hold issue number 2 in the affirmative, and hereby find that the first plaintiff's deemed right of occupancy over Farm 3 was surrendered upon A payment of the compensation.

Last in line for consideration is the third issue - whether the offer of Farm 3 to the first defendant was lawful. Mr. Maira's argument on this point was that as the plaintiffs had B the land, the second defendant had no land to allocate to the first defendant, and that the allocation was therefore unlawful with no legal force. It seems to me that this argument is now obsolete in view of my finding in issue 2. It is not in dispute that the second defendant is a planning authority. The first defendant had applied for a plot in Bwiru area C in the normal and usual manner. The evidence on record speaks for itself. There was no evidence of any fraud. The application was processed by the relevant competent authorities in the normal and usual manner. The compensation was assessed and paid under circumstances which, as already held, did not disclose any fault. I find nothing D suggestive of, let alone to establish, that the discretion to allocate the land was improperly exercised. The first plaintiff was not denied a piece of land. She has at her disposal Farm 2 which, in fact, is presently being occupied by a person of her choice (PW11). It is in evidence that according to the planning standards of the area, individual E plots were not to exceed three acres. I am satisfied that the first defendant's right of occupancy was issued in proper circumstances, and that it was obtained legally and without fraud. I hold the third issue in the affirmative.

In the final analysis therefore, I am satisfied, upon the foregoing reasons, that the F plaintiffs' claim must, on the balance of probabilities, fail. The suit is hereby dismissed with costs.

G Appeal dismissed.

Patel, for the appellant B

Mapigano, J.: Stephen Kiame Sefu, the appellant herein, was the holder of a Right of Occupancy over a parcel of land comprised in Title No. 16507 and described as Plot 13 Block J. Ilala, Dar es Salaam. In May, 1987, the appellant made a disposition of the C property in favour of one Hamoud Abdallah Sumry for a consideration of shs one million, and the disposition was duly effected by deed. The appellant afterwards sought for the consent of the appropriate authority to the disposition and on 4/6/87 that consent was duly granted. Then the appellant submitted the transfer to the Registrar of Titles for D registration. That was on 17/6/87. By his letter addressed to the advocate of the appellant dated 3/9/87, the Senior Assistant Registrar of Titles, the respondent herein, declined to register the transfer. The reason given by the respondent in that letter was that the appellant had not "sorted out the transfer problems with the Prime Minister's E Office". The respondent did not specify those problems, but counsel for the appellant has informed the Court that certain members of the appellant's Office in relation with the transfer and that office had consequently advised the Registrar of Titles to postpone the registration of the transfer. F

The appellant was aggrieved by the refusal of the respondent and has thus come to this Court to challenge it. The appeal is brought under section 102(1) of the Land Registration Ordinance, Cap. 334. By that provision any person who is aggrieved by a G decision, order or act of the Registrar of Titles may appeal to the High Court within three months from the date of such decision, order or act. And by subsection (9) thereof the High Court may make such order on the appeal as the circumstances may require.

There is only one substantive ground of appeal and it is that the respondent erred in law H in refusing registration on account of matters that were irrelevant or extraneous. The respondent has inexplicably not appeared at the hearing of this appeal and it is reasonable to conclude that he is indifferent to these proceedings.

I am bound to accept the appellant's contention. The law of the case is, doubtless, the I Land Registration Ordinance, and upon reading that Ordinance I have to say, with respect, that I find no function that has been given to the Prime Minster's Office in the whole scheme of A registration under that legislation. The power of the Registrar of Titles and his Assistants to refuse registration of transfers, absolutely or conditionally, is provided under section 42 of that Ordinance, which reads as follows: B

> If it appears to the Registrar that any deed presented for registration is improper in form or in substance, or is not clearly expressed, or does not indicate with sufficient precision the particular estate which it is intended to effect, or contains material provisions which are not the C proper subject of registration under this Ordinance or covenants or conditions which do not in law run with the land or are not capable of being annexed thereto, or is otherwise expressed in a manner inconsistent with the principles on which the land register is to be kept, he may refuse registration, either absolutely or subject only to such modification therein as he shall D approve.

It is my considered opinion, therefore, that once the appropriate authority has granted his approval to a transfer, the Registrar of Titles has no discretion to withhold registration E unless any of the circumstances mentioned in the above section actually obtains. So the respondent was in error at law.

In the event, I allow the appeal and set aside the decision of the respondent. I hereby direct the respondent to re-admit the appellant's application for registration and dispose F of it in the manner provided by the relevant provisions of the Land Registration Ordinance. I make no order as to costs.

Kazimoto, J.: Section 79 of the Law of Marriage Act 1971 empowers a magistrate hearing a matrimonial proceedings to state a case for the opinion of the High Court E where any question of law arises. Rule 40 of the Law of Marriage (Matrimonial Proceedings) Rules Government Notice No. 136 of 1971 lays down the procedures on how to state a case to the High Court. This case has been forwarded to this court under the provisions of Rule 40 aforesaid. The High Court is requested to give an opinion on two matters: F

(a) Whether or not the same court that hears a petition for divorce is competent also to hear a claim on the matrimonial assets, and

(b) If the same court is competent, whether or not it should use the same record G of proceedings.

I deem it appropriate to preview the background which gave rise to these proceedings. Fatuma Mohamed whom I will refer to as the petitioner had petitioned for divorce H against Said Omary Chikamba whom I will also refer to as the respondent in Mtwara Urban Court. She had also petitioned in her petition for division of matrimonial property. The trial magistrate heard the evidence as regards the petition for divorce. Then he wrote a judgment in which he granted the divorce, having been satisfied that the marriage had I been proved to have irreparably broken down. The trial magistrate thus made this order:

KAZIMOTO J

Amri: Mdaiwa anapewa nafasi na Mahakama kuleta mashahidi kama mdai hastahili A kugawiwa sehemu ya mali ambazo wamechuma wote wakati wa ndoa yao kwa juhudi za pamoja. The respondent then gave evidence and the court set a date to inspect the matrimonial B property. The respondent then went to the District Court, and, it would appear, lodged a complaint. The district magistrate wrote a letter to the trial magistrate instructing him to terminate the proceedings and advise the petitioner to file a fresh claim for division of matrimonial property. The matter came to the attention of the resident magistrate in C charge who believed that the case should have continued in the same file and before the same magistrate without having to open a fresh suit. In a nutshell then, this is all about this case.

It is necessary to examine the provisions of the Law of Marriage Act 1971 in order to D determine the procedure relevant when granting decrees for divorce and orders of divisions of matrimonial property. There are three sections and these are sections 106; 108 and 114 of the Law of Marriage Act. Section 106 deals with what is required to be E contained in a petition for divorce. Subsection (1) (f) of section 106 requires every petition for decree of divorce to state the terms of agreement regarding division of property acquired through the joint efforts of the parties or where no such agreement has been reached the petitioner should state his or her proposals. Section 108 of the Law of F Marriage Act 1971 imposes a duty on a court hearing a petition for a decree of separation or divorce to inquire into the arrangements made or proposed as regards maintenance and division of any matrimonial property and to satisfy itself that such arrangements are reasonable. Section 114 (1) provides: G

The court shall have power, when granting or subsequent to the grant of a decree of separation or divorce, to order the division between the parties of any assets acquired by them during the marriage by their joint efforts or to order the sale of any such assets and the H division between the parties of the proceeds of sale.

It should be noted at the outset that reading of sections 106, 108 and 114(1) shows that a party seeking an order for division of matrimonial property must plead in his or her I petition to that effect and must prove in court by adducing evidence to show that he or she contributed to the A acquisition of such property. An order for division of property is not therefore automatic upon the grant of a decree of divorce. When it is not pleaded and proved under section 106 (f) and section 108 the court has no power to enquire into the issue of B division and cannot make an order to that effect. Where a petitioner has pleaded for an order for division of matrimonial property in his or her petition he or she should be required to lead evidence at the same time and in the same proceedings regarding the relief of decree of divorce or separation. The court should first decide whether the C marriage has irreparably broken down and should it so hold it should proceed to consider and decide whether the property was a matrimonial property. If it is satisfied that the property is matrimonial property it should order division between the parties according to their contribution. Under this procedure which is contained in section 106 D of the Law of Marriage Act the same court which hears the petition is empowered to hear and determine the issue of division of matrimonial property.

The wording of section 114(1) of the Law of Marriage Act provides a second procedure under which one may petition for an order for division of property. A party E may first seek a decree of divorce without at the same time asking for an order for division of matrimonial property. The court may, when satisfied grant the decree dissolving the marriage. Subsequent to the grant of the decree of divorce a party to the F proceedings may institute fresh proceedings claiming division of matrimonial property. It may be asked to which court should the subsequent proceedings for division of property be instituted. Section 114 (1) has the answer:

> The court shall have power, when granting or subsequent to the grant of a decree .... to order G the division between the parties of any assets acquired.....

It must be the court which granted the decree of divorce or separation and not any other court. The proceedings for division must be instituted in the same court which granted H the decree of divorce. But it may be asked whether the same magistrate must hear the proceedings for division. As a matter of law I would answer in the negative because this is quite a different issue.
In the present case the proceedings show that the petitioner had petitioned for divorce I and at the same time she also had asked for an order for division in her petition. She appears to have brought her petition under section 106 of the Law of Marriage Act 1971. The petition for A divorce and order for division being in one and the same proceedings the court should have considered both issues and decided accordingly. It was wrong for the district Magistrate to have ordered the abandonment of the issue of division and directing the institution of fresh proceedings for division of property. B Certainly the procedure which the trial magistrate adopted in this issue is queer and might have prompted the district magistrate to act in the way he did. As I have said the petitioner had asked for division of property in her petition. She gave evidence as to what property she was claiming division. The respondent gave evidence as to the petition C for divorce and it appears that he gave no evidence to rebut the claim for division. The trial magistrate proceeded to grant divorce and order the respondent to defend himself as to why the petitioner was not entitled to the division of property jointly acquired during subsistance of the marriage. This procedure as adopted by the trial magistrate is D irregular under the circumstances of this case for after the grant of decree for divorce the petitioner did not lodge and claim for division and the respondent had no duty to defend himself. He should have defended himself before judgment in the petition had been delivered. E

Now as to the main points stated I would hold which I do as follows. Where a petitioner petitions for a decree of divorce and in the same petition he or she also prays for an order for division of matrimonial assets the same court, and the same magistrate should hear and determine both issues in the same file. This is in accordance with section 106 of F the Law of Marriage Act. On the other hand where a petitioner seeks and obtains a decree of divorce without at the same time asking for an order of division of matrimonial assets, and lodges the claim for division later, the claim for division need not be heard by the same magistrate and certainly there must be a different file. This is the procedure G obtainable subsequent to the grant of decree of divorce or separation as stated in section 114 of the Law of Marriage Act, 1971.

H Opined accordingly.

Lipiki, for the applicant F
Mwajasho, for the respondent
[zJDz]Judgment
Mtenga, J.: This is an application for revision of proceedings of Ilala District Court at Kisutu in respect of Probate and Administration Cause No. 5 of 1988, with the request G of quashing the proceedings and declaring them null and void.
This application has been brought under the provisions of section 44(1)(b) of the Magistrates Courts' Act, 1984.
Mr. Lipiki learned counsel appears for the applicant whereas Mr. Mwajasho another H learned counsel appears for the respondent.
The application is supported by an affidavit of the applicant Mr. Rashidi Hassan. In the affidavit of the applicant which was enlarged upon by his learned counsel it has been deposed that in filing Probate and Administration Cause No. 5 of 1988 in Ilala District I Court at Kisutu the respondent did not comply with the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code and those of the Probate and Administration Ordinance Cap. 445 of the Laws. Mr. Lipiki referred me to section A 22 C.P.C. which he argues to be a mandatory one. He further argued that rule 39 of the Probate Rules is also mandatory. Furthermore, Mr. Lipiki submitted that on perusing the record of the District Court in Probate and Administration Cause No. 5 of 1988 one can easily detect that there was no petition filed by the respondent and neither citation as B required by Rule 73 nor publication as required under Rule 75 of the Probate Rules. There were no court fees paid and the record does not say that the respondent was exempted from paying court fees.

Mr. Lipiki learned counsel conceded that there was a petition lodged by the respondent C for letters of administration in respect of the same deceased's estate at Kariakoo Primary Court but later there was an order to the effect that the petition be transferred to Ilala District Court. It was then the duty of the respondent to comply with the provisions of C.P.C. and Probate and Administration as above stated. Annexure "B" is the only D record at hand.
Mr. Lipiki learned counsel further contended that the respondent knew before Kariakoo Primary Court that the applicant was objecting to the respondent's application to be appointed as the administrator to the deceased's estate for it was the applicant who E moved the lower Kariakoo Primary Court to transfer the case to Ilala District Court at Kisutu but the respondent never notified the applicant that he had already filed Probate and Administration Cause No. 5 of 1988, at Ilala District Court. He therefore submitted that the proceedings in the lower Ilala District Court together with the appointment of the F respondent to the deceased's estate are null and void and they should be declared so.
Last but not least, Mr. Lipiki learned counsel submitted that there were errors apparent on the record in annexture "B" to the application, which errors are material to the merits G of the case involving injustice to the application and if Publication was made in Probate and Administration Cause No. 5 of 1988 the applicant would have objected it because by then the applicant had already lodged an application No. 34 of 1988 involving the same deceased's estate. In annexture "B" annexed to the application the objector is H marked "absent" but it does not show if he was notified or not, yet the proceedings went on ex-parte.

In reply to that, Mr. Mwajasho learned counsel for the respondent submitted that the matter was first heard at Kariakoo Primary Court but later the applicant moved the I lower Kariakoo Primary Court to transfer the matter to Ilala District Court, therefore it was the duty of the applicant to find it out as to whether or not it has already been A transferred there. Since the applicant did not do so, he slept on his own right and he cannot be heard to complain about it.

It is true as submitted by Mr. Lipiki learned counsel for the applicant that in filing B Probate and Administration Cause No. 5 of 1988 in Ilala District Court, the respondent did not abide himself within the ambit of the provisions of section 22 C.P.C. and rules 39, 73 and 75 of the Probate Rules. Indeed there was no petition of probate and administration lodged with Ilala District Court. There was neither citation nor publication C as required by the law. Court fees were never paid and there is no evidence to show that the respondent was exempted from paying court fees. To crown it all, the applicant was never notified of the hearing date of the objection at Ilala District Court though it is D evidently clear that the applicant was an interested person in the deceased's estate for he has already filed probate and Administration Case No. 34 of 1988 in respect of the same deceased's estate and it was he who moved Kariakoo Primary Court to transfer the matter to Ilala District Court.

It was therefore the duty of Ilala District Court to notify the applicant of the hearing date E of the matter.

Having so said I declare the proceedings in the lower Ilala District Court in Probate and Administration Cause No. 5 of 1988 together with the resultant appointment of the respondent as the administrator of the deceased's estate to be null and void and I quash F the proceedings and set aside the order of appointing the respondent as being the administrator of the deceased's estate. The respondent is to bear the costs of this application. If the parties are still interested in the deceased's estate then they should pursue the Probate and Administration Cause No. 34 of 1988 already pending in court G filed by the applicant. It is so ordered.

Order accordingly.

Family Law - Dissolution of marriage - Whether dowry and other traditional payments are recoverable - S. 71 Law of Marriage Act, 1971, and s. 3A Judicature and Application of Laws Ordinance Cap. 453.

In the Primary Court, the appellant won his claim for recovery of dowry and various traditional payments plus costs of the suit, on the ground that his wife had unreasonably refused to consummate the marriage. The respondent appealed to the District Court of Kondoa and the appellant was awarded just restitution of bride price. Hence this appeal against the decision of the District Court.

Held: Once a marriage has taken place any gifts, whether traditional or otherwise, given in contemplation of the marriage become the absolute property of the recipient and it cannot be diverted by subsequent divorce: s.7 of the Law of Marriage Act of 1971 which also supersedes rules of customary or Islamic law.

Samatta, J.: This is a somewhat unusual litigation. The appellant had filed a suit in the Primary Court of Haubi, claiming from the respondent recovery of dowry and various traditional payments he made when he married the respondent's daughter. The marriage was dissolved by the Primary Court in an earlier case, apparently on the ground that the wife had unreasonably refused to consummate the marriage. In that court the appellant was partly successful. In an unanimous decision the court decided that the appellant was entitled to recovery of the dowry which had been paid, which amounted to Shs. 500/=, and Shs. 3459/=, being made up of Shs. 3300/= as the total of some of the traditional payments he had made, and Shs. 150/= being costs of the suit. The respondent was aggrieved by this decision. He strongly believed that the appellant was not entitled to any amount he was awarded. He accordingly appealed against the decision to the District Court of

Kondoa. The appeal was partly successful. The District Court held that the appellant (the respondent then) was entitled to a restitution of the bride price only. The appellant believed that the District Court's decision was not just. He still believes so. Hence the present appeal.

In my opinion the appeal must be dismissed. Whatever the legal position might have been under the Customary Law or the Islamic law, the law now, as I apprehend it, is that once a marriage has taken place any gifts, whether traditional or otherwise, given in contemplation of the marriage, become the absolute property of the recipients. The property cannot be diverted by subsequent divorce. This legal position is the effect of s. 71 of the Law of Marriage Act, 1971 (the Act), which reads as follows:

71. A suit may be brought for the return of any gift made in contemplation of a marriage which D has not been contracted, where the court is satisfied that it was made with the intention on the part of the giver that it should be conditional on the marriage being contracted, but not otherwise.

Any rules of Customary Law or Islamic Law which might have regulated the return of E gifts made in contemplation of a marriage are now superseded by the provisions of s. 71 of the Act, quoted above. The provisions of s. 3A of the Judicature and Application of Laws Ordinance, Cap. 453, make that perfectly clear. The section reads: F

3A. Notwithstanding the provisions of this Act the rules of customary law and the rules of Islamic Law shall not apply in regard to any matter provided for in the Law of Marriage Act, 1971. G

The various payments made by the appellant in contemplation of the marriage to the respondent's daughter were in effect, whatever name one attaches to them, gifts, and, H therefore, are covered by the provisions of s.71 of the Act. It follows that, in my considered opinion, in law the appellant is not entitled to the restitution of the said gifts.

I Appeal dismissed.

Kisanga, Makame and Omar, JJ.A.: The appellant was convicted on his own plea of guilty to manslaughter, and was sentenced to 6 years' imprisonment. He is now H appealing against the sentence.
In his memorandum of appeal, he raises the following mitigating factors:- That he was a first offender; he had been in custody for about 31/2 years prior to the passing of the I sentence; that he was related to the deceased and that the deceased was the aggressor.
In assessing the sentence, the learned trial judge considered all these matters; but took A the view that the appellant's mode of retaliating by stabbing the deceased with a knife, a lethal weapon, was completely out of proportion to the deceased's act of merely kicking him. B
Mr. Rugarabamu, the learned advocate representing the appellant before us properly conceded that the memorandum of appeal, which was filed by the appellant, raises no new issues, and added that he himself had nothing to add to it.
We are satisfied that no grounds have been advanced to show that the sentence meted C out to the appellant was excessive, or that the learned trial judge was wrong in assessing it. Therefore there can be no ground for interfering. In the result, the appeal has no merit and is accordingly dismissed.

Butambala, for the Appellant

Nyabiri, for the Respondent. F

[zJDz]Judgment

Makame, Kisanga and Omar, JJ.A.: The High Court sitting at Tabora (Korosso, J.) condemned to death the appellant Nyehese Cheru following his conviction for the murder of his wife Kema Ndabawaliye, the mother of P.W.1 and P.W.5. Mr. G Butambala, learned advocate representing the appellant before us, filed a total of six grounds, but in the event argued only three, and prayed for a trial de novo. Mr. Mussa, learned attorney for the respondent Republic, did not seek to resist Mr. Butambala's submissions as he, too, felt that an order for a new trial would be the right thing. H

With respect, we think that the case could have been presented and tried a lot more carefully.

Mr. Butambala's first complaint was that the learned High Court judge, when he took over, tried the case with one original assessor and another quite new assessor. We wish I first to observe two things in connection with this ground: First, that there is no indication in the record as to what happened to the gentleman assessor who disappeared A from the scene, Hamisi Kabwe, and why, therefore, it was felt necessary to import a new gentleman assessor, Fadhiri Hamidi. Second, that Mr. Nyabiri, learned State Attorney conducting the case before Korosso, J., clearly misled the trial court when he B informed it, on 18th August, 1987, that "The two Gentlemen Assessors are the very ones who participated in the trial of the case with the previous judge." This was patently incorrect, and quite misleading. In this case, which had a chequered history, assessors Yusuf Omari and Mohamed Omari sat with Mushi, J.; Omary Sungura and Hamisi C Kabwe assisted Rubama, J., when the trial started de novo and the evidence of four Prosecution witnesses was taken; and then, when Korosso, J., took over and heard the last witness, Juma Nyemese, he sat with Rubama J's Omary Sungura and as aforesaid, a new person, Fadhiri Hamidi.

Mushi, J. heard one witness on 4th October 1979 and on the following day, for a good D reason clearly recorded, and to which we shall have occasion to refer later in this judgment, the case was adjourned. On 25th March, 1982 Rubama, J. started hearing the case afresh and four days later he adjourned the matter because the remaining E prospective witnesses were not available. When over two years later, on 4th September, 1984, Juma Nyehese showed up Chipeta, J. made the following order. "As the learned trial judge is away for treatment, hearing is adjourned to next session. Accused F.R.I.C." Then apparently nothing else happened until after almost three more years when, on 18th F August 1987, Korosso, J. took over the conduct of the case.

Neither the old Criminal Procedure Code nor the current Criminal Procedure Act allows a new assessor to be recruited after the hearing of the case has started. Under Section G 270 of the Criminal Procedure Code what a trial judge was empowered to do was to continue with only the remaining assessor or assessors. Under Section 286 of the current Criminal Procedure Act if an assessor is absent "the trial shall proceed before the remaining assessors but only if they are not less than two in number ...." And both under H the Code and under the Act the absence of an assessor had to be coupled with the condition that it is not practicable immediately to enforce his attendance.

This first ground of complaint is enough to vitiate the proceedings, but there is more.

The second ground argued by Mr. Butambala was that in taking over the conduct of the I proceedings Korosso, J. was presumably acting under the Criminal Procedure Act. As Mr. Butambala pointed out, if A that was so then Mr. Nyabiri referred the learned trial judge to the wrong section, section 264. The relevant section would have been section 299, in which case the learned judge did not fully comply with the provisions of the law under that section. If the continued trial purported to be under the Code there was no enabling section: Section B 196 of the Criminal Procedure Code of course only applied to trials in the subordinate courts. This second ground is also weighty.

The third ground argued by Mr. Butambala was that, in any event, the evidence on record could not have been relied on to arrive at the conclusion that the appellant was of C sound mind when he allegedly killed the deceased. The trial court apparently did not get a feed back to the order made by Mushi, J. that:

It is therefore ordered that the Accused be sent to Isanga Institute (sic) in accordance with D section 168A of the Criminal Procedure Code .....

In the course of his judgment Korosso, J. remarked that "On the evidence, the question of provocation or insanity cannot arise." In view of the background we think it would E have been in the interest of justice for the trial court to equip itself with the report from Isanga, which should have been available at the purported trial some eight years after Mushi, J. had made his order.

We respectfully agree with both learned Counsel that the proceedings should be F quashed. The appeal is thus allowed and the proceedings are accordingly quashed. We order a new trial.

There is one other thing we desire to make a brief comment on. The learned trial judge ordered that the deceased's body should be exhumed and given to the deceased's G relatives because it is "their birth right to bury their dead." This unsolicited order was made in August 1987, nearly ten years after the deceased's body had been interred. We are not so sure that the deceased's relatives would be anxious to see the mortal remains of their dear one after so many years. There might be aesthetic inhibitions and for all we H know it may well be taboo for them to handle what remains. They were not given a chance to decide. As these proceedings have been quashed the said order naturally goes with them, if, that is, it has not yet been carried out.

I Appeal allowed.

Omar, Makame and Kisanga, JJ.A.: This is an appeal by the Director of Public Prosecutions against the ruling of the High Court in Miscellaneous Criminal Cause No. 1 H of 1987, which discharged Respondent Jumanne Rajabu from the case of murder facing him. Repondent's six co-accused awaiting P.I. like Rajabu were also ordered to be discharged.

Appellant Republic represented by Mr. Tendwa, learned State Attorney, in arguing his grounds of appeal said that discharge was confined to trial only and there was no trial at I the District Court, only adjournments for more than a year. The Magistrate could not have discharged the accused person under section 225 (5) Criminal Procedure Act A because there was no trial and the offence of murder is not triable by him. And High Court cannot act under section 225 (5) Criminal Procedure Act because this provision concerns trials by subordinate Courts (See part VII of the Criminal Procedure Act). B High Court has inherent powers to grant bail but there was no "information" before the High Court, therefore the case was not ready for trial yet.

Mr. Kwikima learned Counsel for the respondent who made his first application to the District Court and then appealed to the High Court against the ruling of the District Court C admitted that for him it was a shot in the dark because he felt if the investigations were not ready or were dragging on indefinitely the accused person cannot be made to suffer being in remand indefinitely. The Court must have powers to rescue the accused person faced with this situation. D

We are of the considered view that the Republic can be persuaded by the Court to withdraw the charge against the accused if investigations are not ready and the accused is unduly kept in remand custody. But to invoke section 225(5) of Criminal Procedure Act for this purpose is to misconstrue the meaning of this section. Neither the High Court E nor the District Court in the circumstances of this case could have used this particular provision of the law.

We order that the respondent who had been wrongly discharged be arrested and remanded in custody together with his six co-accused so that they may await their trial in this case. F

Kapinga and Tenga for the appellants
Rutagatina and Chenge for the 1st and 2nd respondents respectively C
Nyalali, C.J., Mustafa, Makame, Kisanga, and Omar, JJ.A: This matter arose out of a trade dispute which was referred to the Permanent Labour Tribunal by the Minister responsible for labour matters under section 8 sub-section (1) of the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act, 1967 on the 2nd May, 1986. The trade dispute concerns, Jumuiya ya D Wafanyakazi Tanzania, commonly known by its acronym as JUWATA, on one side, and the firm of Kiwanda cha Uchapishaji cha Taifa commonly known by its acronym as KIUTA, on the other side. The trade dispute centres on the redundancy of 94 E employees of KIUTA, who were also members of JUWATA. When the matter came up for adjudication by the Tribunal on the 3rd September, 1986, a preliminary matter arose concerning the jurisdiction of the Tribunal to entertain the trade dispute. Acting on the authority of a decision made by a bench of three judges of this Court in the case of F Zambia/Tanzania Road Services Ltd. v J.K. Pallangyo in Civil Appeal No. 9 of 1982 (unreported), the Tribunal held that it had no jurisdiction to entertain the dispute on the ground that the matter had not been previously referred to a conciliation board under the provisions of section 40A of the Security Employment Act, 1964, Cap. 574 as amended G by the Labour Laws (Miscellaneous Amendments) Act, 1975.
Predictably JUWATA was aggrieved by the refusal of the Tribunal to entertain the dispute and it sought and obtained leave to apply for order of certiorari and mandamus in the High Court where the Permanent Labour Tribunal was joined as the second H respondent, whereas KIUTA appeared as the 1st respondent. On the 18th June, 1987 the High Court, Maina, J., dismissed the application on its merits. JUWATA was further aggrieved by this decision of the High Court, hence this appeal to this Court. In the proceedings before this Court, the Attorney-General was joined as the 2nd respondent I instead of the Tribunal, whereas KIUTA remained as the 1st respondent. All the parties were legally represented before us. Messrs Kapinga and A Tenga, learned advocates from the Legal Aid Committee of the Faculty of Law of the University of Dar es Salaam, appeared for the appellants, whereas Mr. Rutagatina, from the Tanzania Legal Corporation, appeared for the 1st respondent and Mr. Chenge, B Principal State Attorney, represented the 2nd respondent.

From the proceedings in this Court, the following matters of law are not in dispute between the parties. It is common ground that the relevant basis law applicable to the matter before us is contained in the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act 1967 and the C Security of Employment Act 1964, Cap. 574. The former Act concerns the settlement of collective disputes between employees and their employer whereas the latter concerns the settlement of non-collective disputes. The basic difference between the two is that in D a collective dispute there are more than one employee acting in concert and in conflict with their employer, whereas in the latter, a single employee is in conflict with his employer. It is common ground also that decisions of the Court of Appeal of Tanzania are binding upon any tribunal acting either under the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act, 1967 or the Security of Employment Act, 1964 by virtue of the common law doctrine of E precedent.

The appellants' case before this Court is contained in the memorandum of appeal and the submissions made by learned advocates for the appellants in the course of the F appeal. Three grounds of appeal were submitted by the appellants as follows:

1. The Hon. judge erred in law in holding that the judgment of this Honourable Court in Zambia/Tanzania Road Services Ltd. v J.K. Pallangyo, civil appeal No. 9 of 1982 (unreported) was not delivered per incuriam and G therefore the Permanent Labour Tribunal was bound to follow it.

2.(i) the Hon. Judge erred in law in holding that section 40A of the Security of Employment Act, Cap. 574 applied to trade disputes under section H 4(1) of the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act 1967;

(ii) the Hon. judge erred in law in holding that reference of a trade dispute to a conciliation board within 14 days under section 40A of the Security of I Employment Act was a condition precedent to be fulfilled before the Permanent Labour A Tribunal could hear and determine a trade dispute.

In elaborating these grounds of appeal, Mr. Kapinga, learned advocate, who dealt with the second ground of appeal, and Mr. Tenga, learned advocate, who dealt with the first B ground of appeal, submitted in effect that the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act and the series of legislation that preceded it are separate and independent from security of Employment Act and the series of legislation that preceded it. Mr. Kapinga further submitted to the effect that this Court in Pallangyo's case erred in applying the C provisions of section 40A of the Security of Employment Act to proceedings under the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act 1967. By so doing, he argued, the court appeared to amend the latter Act by incorporating into it provisions derived from the Security of Employment Act. Mr. Tenga, who addressed us on the 1st ground of appeal, submitted D also that the relevant rule in Pallangyo's case was decided by this Court in ignorance of the existence of these two separate and independent legal schemes for settlement of disputes between employees and their employers.

On the other hand, Mr. Rutagatina, learned advocate for the 1st respondent, submitted E in effect that the court in Pallangyo's case was right in applying the provisions of section 40A of the Security of Employment Act to proceedings under the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act, by prescribing a specific period for reference of trade disputes to the Permanent Labour Tribunal; thereby filling in a gap left open by the legislature. F However, Mr. Chenge, learned Principal State Attorney for the 2nd respondent, does not support this stand of the 1st Respondent and instead agrees with the submissions made for the appellant on this point.

It is apparent that the dispute in this case centres on the correctness of the relevant rule G in Pallangyo's case. The relevant rule appears in the following paragraph of the judgment in that case:

Admittedly there are no provisions under the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act relating to the H limitations of actions. But the view that claims brought under that Act are not subject to limitation seems untenable. If that view were to be upheld, the implication of it is that where an employee thinks that the termination of his services is wrongful, he may delay lodging his I grievance for ten or twenty years or even for an indefinite period. We think that is undesirable and would be objectionable. Such employee must act A promptly in seeking to vindicate his rights. For purposes of good and efficient management also, the employer should know of the final position as soon as is practicable so that he can take other necessary steps, for example, to consider filling the vacancy left by the employee in B question. Even assuming, as Mr. Muccadam contends, that the respondent was in the management of the business of his employer, we think that the provisions of section 40A of the Security of Employment Act quoted above applied to him. C

NYALALI CJ, MAKAME JJA, KISANGA JJA AND OMAR JJA

The first specific issue that arises in this dispute is whether Pallangyo's case, in so far as it concerns the rule quoted above, was decided per incuriam. The expression per incuriam, according to Jolowit's Dictionary of English Law, 2nd Edition, means: D "Through want of care. A decision or dictum of a judge which clearly is the result of some oversight". The meaning of that expression is further stated by Sir Raymond Evershed M.R. in the case of Morelle Ltd. v Wakeling [1955] (1) All E.R. at page 708 in the following words: E

As a general rule the only cases in which decisions should be held to have been given per incuriam are those decisions given in ignorance or forgetfulness of some inconsistent F statutory provision or some authority binding on the court concerned, so that in such cases some part of the decision or some step in reasoning on which it is based is found, on that account, to be demonstrably wrong. This definition is not necessarily exhaustive, but cases not strictly within it which can properly be held to have been decided per incuriam must in our G judgment, consistently with the stare decisis rule, which is an essential feature of our law, be, in the language of Lord Green, M.R., of the rarest occurrence.

Undoubtedly, the provisions of section 40A of the Security of Employment Act, 1964 H belong to the scheme for the settlement of non-collective disputes involving a single employee in conflict with his employer. That scheme was introduced in this country for the first time in 1924 under the Master and Native Servants Ordinance, Cap.78, and I was subsequently continued by the Employment Ordinance Cap. 366 with effect from 1st February,

1957, and was modified by the Security of Employment Act 1964 with effect from 1st A May, 1965 (subsequently amended by the Labour Laws (Miscellaneous Amendments) Act 1975) and by the Employment Ordinance (Amendment Act) 1969. Essentially, prior to the Security of Employment Act, this scheme provided for the settlement of B non-collective disputes by adjudication before a subordinate court. Prior to the Employment Ordinance (Amendment) Act 1969, proceedings before such subordinate court were basically criminal in nature. Under the amendment of 1969 a subordinate court was vested with both criminal and civil jurisdiction which it could exercise depending on the nature of a particular case (see sections 134 and 124A). However, the C Security of Employment Act as amended by the Labour Laws (Miscellaneous Amendment) Act 1975 ousted the jurisdiction of subordinate courts from specified matters, which were transferred to the exclusive jurisdiction of counciliation boards established under that Act. These specified matters were those concerning summary D dismissal, deduction in wages by way of disciplinary action and statutory compensation. Under the Security of Employment Act, an appeal from a decision of a conciliation board in these specified matters lies to the Minister responsible for labour matters and E his decision is final. Section 40A of the Act prescribes a period of 14 days within which a dispute has to be referred by an aggrieved employee to a conciliation board.

As for the scheme for settlement of collective disputes, it came into being for the first time in 1947 under the Trade Disputes (Arbitration and Inquiry) Ordinance, 1947. The F scheme was continued by the Trade Disputes (Arbitration and Settlement) Ordinance with effect from 19th January, 1951 and by the Trade Disputes (Settlement) Act 1962 Cap. 480, and, finally by the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act 1967.

Essentially, the scheme prescribes four methods for the settlement of collective disputes. G Firstly, by conciliation before a labour officer (see sections 4(2) and 6 of the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act 1967); secondly, by adjudication before a tribunal (see sections 4(4) and 8 of the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act. Thirdly, by inquiry and report of the Tribunal (see section 9 and 9A and 9B of the Permanent Labour Tribunal H Act. Fourthly by Advice of the Tribunal (see section 10 of the Act). These methods of settlement of collective disputes existed in all the relevant legislation since 1947 except the fourth one which came into being in 1967. At no stage in the history of this system I was a specific period prescribed for initiating a trade dispute. The reason is obvious. A trade dispute comes into existence only when it is declared by referring the matter to the labour A commissioner. Until such a reference is made, any conflict between employees and their employer amounts to no more than an apprehended trade dispute capable of being dealt with under the provisions of sections 9, 9A and 9B of the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act, 1967. B

The Security of Employment Act, 1964 as amended by Act No. 45 of 1969 introduced another feature into the scheme for settlement of non-collective disputes which did not exist prior to 1964. This concerns categories of employees who are covered by the C Security of Employment Act. Under the provisions of section 4 paragraph (e) of the Act, any person who is considered by a labour officer to be a member of the management of a business is not an employee for purposes of proceedings under the Act. In Pallangyo's case the court overlooked this statutory position. For this reason together D with the reasons given earlier we are satisfied that the decision in Pallangyo's case in so far as it requires a trade dispute to be reported to a conciliation board before it is entertained by the Permanent Labour Tribunal, and to the extent that it applies the provisions of section 40A of the Security of Employment Act to members of the management, was decided per incuriam. E

The second specific issue in the dispute is whether the Permanent Labour Tribunal and the High Court are bound to follow the dictum in Pallangyo's case. Notwithstanding what is stated in the first ground of appeal, both advocates for the appellants agreed in F the course of the hearing of this appeal, that under the common law doctrine of precedent, which is one of the pillars of the law of this land, all courts and tribunals below this court, are bound by the decisions of the court, regardless of their correctness. We have no doubt that this is a sound position which is necessary for the Rule of Law. It G follows therefore that the Permanent Labour Tribunal acted properly in refusing to entertain the trade dispute in the legal circumstances prevailing at the time.

The third specific issue in this dispute is whether this court has jurisdiction to over-rule its earlier decisions. There is common ground between all the parties that this court has such H jurisdiction in certain circumstances. The only dispute is whether Pallangyo's case falls within those circumstances. We are in general agreement with the parties on the question of jurisdiction for the following reasons. Historically this Court is the successor I to the Court of Appeal of East Africa in respect of the United Republic of Tanzania. The Court of Appeal of East Africa had jurisdiction to over rule its earlier decisions within the scope stated in the case of Dodhia v National & Grindlays A Bank Ltd. and another, [1970] E.A. p. 195 at pp. 198 to 200 as follows:

> It is, I think, beyond dispute that since this Court became the final Court of Appeal for the B sovereign countries of Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda no decision of the Privy Council or of any English court or of any foreign court is binding on this Court. Indeed, no such decision would be binding on any court in Kenya, Tanzania or Uganda, unless it was a decidion of the Privy Council on an appeal from any of these countries, though in so far as any such decision sets C out what is the English law, the High Courts of Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda would normally accept such to be the position and this Court would, I have no doubt, have regard to any decision of an English court setting out what is the English law. It would, however, always D be a matter for the courts of Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda to decide what is the law of those countries. Even where English law is applied in any such country, its application would be subject to such modifications as the circumstances of the country and its inhabitants required; E and it would be for the court of such country to determine what those modifications if any, would be in any particular case in order to determine what is the law of such country
> I accept that a system of law requires a considerable degree of certainty and uniformity and F that such certainty and uniformity would not exist if the courts were free to arrive at a decision without regard to any previous decision. I also accept that subordinate courts are bound by the decisions of superior courts and that a subordinate court of appeal should normally be bound by a previous decision of its own. But there is a great difference between a final court of appeal G and a subordinate court of appeal. If it is considered that a decision of a subordinate court of appeal was wrong it would always be open to have it tested and if necessary rectified in the final court of appeal. This would not be possible in the case of the decision of a final court of H appeal. Thus, on the face of it, there is a need for great flexibility in a final court of appeal than there is in any other court in the judicial hierarchy. Further, the need for such flexibility is the greater and not the less in a developing country, as there is a greater likelihood of rapid I changes in the customs, habits and needs of its people, which changes should be reflected in the decisions of the court of appeal. It should, moreover, A be borne in mind that too strict an adherence to the principle of stare decisis would, in fact, defeat its object of creating certainty, as a final court of appeal faced by a decision which was B unsuited to the present needs of the community would seek to distinguish it. The results of distinguishing a decision when there was no real difference results in uncertainty, an uncertainty which would not exist if it were clearly stated that the old decision was no longer the law. It must also be remembered that the Privy Council, when it was the final court of C appeal for Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda, never considered itself bound by its previous decisions. It would seem a retrograde step for this Court, now that it has taken over the functions of a final court of appeal for these countries, to discard the flexibility previously possessed by the final court of appeal and instead adopt a position of rigidity. D

For these reasons I am satisfied that as a matter of judicial policy this Court as the final Court of Appeal for Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda, while it would normally regard a previous decision E of its own as binding, should be free in both civil and criminal cases to depart from such a previous decision when it appears right to do so. It will, of course, exercise this power only after careful consideration of the consequences of doing so and the circumstances of the F particular case, but I would not seek to lay down any more detailed guide to the circumstances in which such a departure should take place as the matter would be best left to the discretion of the Court at the time it was up for consideration.

That was the position of the Court of Appeal for East Africa on this point. Since the G Court of Appeal of Tanzania is a successor of the former court, it stands in the same position as its predecessor, unless the law establishing it expressly provided to the contrary. A close scrutiny of the Constitution of the United Republic and the Appellate H Jurisdiction Act, 1979 shows that the Court of Appeal of Tanzania has been vested with more powers than its predecessor had. For instance, the Court of Appeal of Tanzania has jurisdiction in constitutional matters whereas its predecessor had none in so far as Tanzania was concerned. In short, the Court of Appeal of Tanzania has inherited all the I jurisdiction vested in its predecessor and has in addition, been granted more. The Court thus has the jurisdiction stated in the Dodhia's A case.

The fourth specific issue in the dispute is whether the decision in Pallangyo's case to the extent that it was given per incuriam ought now to be over-ruled by this Court. Mr. Rutagatina, learned advocate for the 1st respondent has submitted in effect that this B Court should not over-rule that decision because such an action would disturb the status quo. On the other hand, M/S Kapinga and Tenga, learned advocates for the appellants, have urged this Court to over-rule the decision on the basis that the existence of this precedent has paralysed the system for settlement of trade disputes. Mr. Chenge, C learned Principal State Attorney for the 2nd respondent, is basically in agreement with the stand of the appellants. In our considered opinion, we think that so long as Pallangyo's case continues to exist as a precedent, there can be no trade dispute referred to the Permanent Labour Tribunal. This is because, according to Pallangyo's D case, every trade dispute must first be reported to a conciliation board. But once such a reference is made, there can be no way of getting such a trade dispute back to the Permanent Labour Tribunal. That path leads to the Minister responsible for labour matters whose decision is final. In any case, as we have already demonstrated, a E conciliation board has no jurisdiction over collective disputes. We are aware that this present case is a test case which will set in motion the machinery for settlement of a number of trade disputes which currently cannot be processed either by the Permanent F Labour Tribunal or the conciliation boards, because of the Pallangyo's decision. We are satisfied that the circumstances of this case require us to exercise our unique jurisdiction in favour of the appellants so that justice may be done. We are aware that such a decision in this case will not alter the rights of the parties in the Pallangyo's case, G since the overall decision in that case to the effect that the Permanent Labour Tribunal had no jurisdiction to entertain the trade dispute in question, does not depend entirely on the rule given per incuriam, but depends also on the finding that the trade dispute was not a collective one: it concerned a single employee, that is, Mr. Pallangyo. Pallangyo's H case cannot therefore be reopened before the Permanent Labour Tribunal as a result of our decision in this case.

In the final analysis therefore, we allow this appeal by setting aside the decision of the High Court and the Permanent Labour Tribunal and directing the Permanent Labour Tribunal to proceed I to hear the trade dispute declared by JUWATA on behalf of its 94 members, with the A costs to the appellants.

Appeal allowed.

Chipeta, J.: In Kasulu Primary Court at Kasangezi, the appellant, Ntiyahela Boneka sued the respondents, Mutala Ujamaa Village, for shs. 14,000/= as compensation for his piece of land of ten acres which the respondents "nationalized" or unilaterally took over. The trial court unanimously found for the appellant but assessed the compensation at C Shs. 9,328/=. The respondents, however, successfully appealed to the District Court. Dissatisfied with the decision of the District Court, the appellant now appeals to this court.

The appellant's evidence, which was hardly disputed, was that in or about the year D 1974, during the movement of people into planned villages, the authorities measured 10 acres of virgin land and authorized the appellant to develop the same for his own use. The appellant cleared the bush, and by 1978, he had 477 banana trees and was also growing therein seasonal crops. E

In October, 1981, the respondents moved in the shamba and told the appellant to vacate because they had "nationalized" it on the ground of the newly drawn boundaries between Kisangezi village (the appellant's) and the respondent's village, that is, Mutala village. When the appellant asked the respondents to compensate him for his labour, F they refused and told him to remove his crops from the shamba. It was then that the appellant filed this suit, and since then he has never entered that shamba.

A village secretary of Mutala Ujamaa village testified for the respondents at the trial. He stated: G

> Kwa kukiwakilisha Kijiji, nakubali shamba hilo ni la Mdai. Baadaye tulimtaifisha kutokana Kijiji kuwa ardhi yake. Tulimwitisha ang'oe migomba hiyo, akakataa. Natoa barua ya Katibu Tarafa kama ushahidi. Hivyo hatuwezi kulipa. H

He went on to add that the shamba has now been divided into plots which have been allocated to individuals.

On that evidence the trial court found as a fact that the appellant cleared the shamba I when the land was virgin and planted therein, inter alia, 477 banana trees; and that he cultivated the same for his own needs for many years before he was unceremoniously evicted therefrom, for no A fault of his own. The trial court accordingly held that the appellant was entitled to compensation for his labour on that piece of land.

On appeal to the District Court, the learned senior district magistrate (as he then was) B appears to have accepted the findings of fact by the trial court, but he allowed the appeal on the ground that the appellant had failed to remove the banana trees when ordered to do so by the village authorities, that is the respondents.

On the evidence on record, there can be no dispute that the piece of land was lawfully C allocated to the appellant when it was virgin land for the appellant to develop it so as to meet his human needs. He did develop it and used it for many years to meet his needs. In other words, the appellant was at all material times in lawful occupation of that piece of land until the respondents seized it for no fault of the appellant. D

The question for consideration and decision in this case, therefore, is whether in those circumstances the appellant is entitled to compensation for his labour.

This important question is not a novel one. It has often exercised the minds of our E statesmen as well as our jurists. It moved the former Head of State, Mwalimu Julius K. Nyerere, to write, in his characteristic clarity:

> When I use my energy and talent to clear a piece of ground for my use, it is clear that I am F trying to transform this basic gift from God so that it can satisfy a human need. It is true, however, that this land is not mine, but the efforts made by me in clearing the land enable me to lay claim of ownership over the cleared piece of ground. But it is not really the land itself that G belongs to me but only the cleared ground which will remain mine as long as I continue to work it. By clearing that ground I have actually added to its value and have enabled it to be used to satisfy a human need. Whoever then takes this piece of ground must pay me for H adding value to it through clearing it by my own labour. (Freedom and Unity/Uhuru na Umoja, at pages 53 -54). (Emphasis supplied).

This court itself has on many occasions reiterated that statement of principle. It has held I that a person is entitled to compensation for improvements effected on the land provided that at the time of carrying out such improvements, he had apparent justification for doing so. (See Alli Mangosongo v Chrispina Magenje [1977] LRT A n.8).

I feel I should buttress this point by referring, with respectful approval, to the case of Lalata Msangawale v Henry Mwamlima, [1979] LRT n. 3 a case which is almost on all fours with the instant case. That case involved a dispute over a piece of land between B an individual who had developed it from virgin land and a village authority which purported to lay claim to it. On appeal to this court, Mwesiumo, J., like myself, could not resist quoting the above-quoted passage and stated, at page 24: C

In the instant case the appellant had successfully proved before the trial court that he had occupied the land in dispute when the same was virgin and unoccupied. Therefore even if the villagers considered it expedient to grab that piece of land in order to enlarge the adjacent D shamba of the Wajamaa, the appellant, at the very minimum, was entitled to be paid compensation by those wajamaa who wanted to, and who in fact did, take his shamba and crops thereon.

With that statement of principle, I respectfully agree. In that case, Mwesiumo, J. E underscores the point by referring to the letter and spirit of the then Preamble to the Constitution and the TANU Creed (that case having been decided before the political and constitutional changes of 1977 and after).

I propose to underscore the point by referring to the Supreme Law of the Land-the F Constitution of the United Republic, 1977 as amended up to 1985. Subsection (2) of section 23 of the Constitution provides that every person is entitled to a just reward for his labour.

Section 24 (2) of the Constitution is even more to the point for purposes of this case. It provides a follows: G

(2) Without prejudice to subsection (1), it is unlawful for any person to have his property seized for the purposes of nationalization or for any other purpose without any written law providing for commensurate compensation therefor. (A free translation from the original Kiswahili text). H

That is the law, and the respondents, indeed, all those authorities in the position of the respondents, would do well to bear in mind those legal provisions in making decisions I regarding property of individuals which is lawfully owned. A strict adherence to those provisions by all concerned will promote peace and harmony in our Society and A will eschew a proliferation of such cases in our courts.

To sum up, the law in this country does not sanction seizure of an individual's property in the absence of any enabling written law and without adequate compensation. B

In the instant case, since the appellant was lawfully allocated virgin land which he later cleared and developed to a stage where it now satisfies human needs, he is entitled to adequate compensation for his labour from the respondents.
In the result, this appeal succeeds. The judgment of the District Court is accordingly set C aside and that of the Primary Court restored. The appellant shall have his costs in this court and both courts below.

Moshi, J.: The appellant, Zaruki A. Mbekomize, was the unsuccessful party in a claim against both respondents, Swaibu Omari and Francis Adolf, for a shamba worth shs. 20,000/= at Katoro Primary Court. His appeal to Bukoba District Court was dismissed, D and hence this second appeal.

In this appeal, as was before the District Court, Mr. Rweyemamu, learned advocate, represented both respondents, whereas the appellant argued the appeal in person.

It was established in evidence before the Primary Court that the father of the appellant E died in 1973 leaving behind, among other property, two shambas - one for the appellant and the other for the appellant's brother, Mahmud Ahmed. The appellant's aunt, Malifedha d/o Mbekomize, was staying with, and guarding, the appellant, who was then F aged about 10 years, at the shamba left for the appellant.

On 15.12.75 Mahmud sold a portion of his shamba to the first respondent for shs. 2,000/=, and the remaining portion to the second respondent for shs. 4,500/=. Upon becoming aware of the sale, the aunt of the appellant, Malifedha, filed redemption G proceedings in Katoro Primary Court Civil Case No. 12 of 1977 on behalf of the minor children of the deceased and the clan.

On 17.5.78 the Primary Court, in that case, found the shamba in dispute to belong to Mahmud, and allowed Malifedha to redeem it within three months of that date by paying H back to the respondents the purchase price and their costs. No appeal was preferred against that decision. Malifedha, however, failed to redeem the shamba, and it then became and remained the property of the respondents. On 24th March, 1986 the appellant instituted these proceedings before the same Primary Court claiming the same I shamba from the respondents. On the evidence before it, the Primary Court unanimously found the case to be res judicata, and this finding was upheld by the A District Court on first appeal.

I would, on the evidence, respectfully agree with the concurrent finding by both courts below that the case filed by the appellant against the respondents was res judicata. The B matter had come before the same Primary Court in 1977, and disposed of, after being instituted by the guardian of the appellant, Malifedha, on his behalf. The issue of the ownership of the land in dispute had been finally decided upon in that earlier case. It was found to belong to Mahmud, who had sold it to respondents, and upon failure by C Malifedha to redeem it on behalf of the appellant, the shamba became the property of the respondents. The present case, in my view, cannot be said to have been based on different rights or different principles of law from those involved in the earlier case. And even if it is assumed, without deciding, that the suit was not res judicata, there was no D evidence, apart from the appellant's bare assertion, that the land in dispute belonged to the appellant. He could not have known the issues involved as he was then of tender age. There was no evidence before the trial court that the appellant had inherited the shamba in dispute or had otherwise acquired it. The evidence established that it E belonged to Mahmud who then sold it to the respondents. In his memorandum of appeal the appellant has more or less reiterated what he told both courts below, and which, in my considered opinion, was rightly rejected.

For the foregoing reasons, I find no merit in this second appeal which is, by reason F thereof, hereby dismissed with costs.
Appeal dismissed.

Omar, Makame and Kisanga, JJ.A.: The appellant Col. S.M.A. Kashimiri is aggrieved by the decision of the High Court (Maina, J.) dismissing his petition against respondent Naginder Singh Matharu for vacant possession of a piece of land variously described as plot No. 17 Block "5" Keko Industrial Area and Plot No. 17 Chang'ombe G industrial Area. He is now appealing against that decision.
This is a case of double allocation of a parcel of land. Both parties to the suit were each allocated the same plot within a space of two months. Respondent was the first person H to be allocated on 28/11/80 after the Allocation Committee known by the name of Urban Planning Committee had sat on 18/11/80 and considered his application and approved his name as the new owner of the plot for a lease of 99 years. Respondent was required to pay the necessary fees for the plot within thirty days from the date of this I offer of right of occupancy before the plot could be legally deemed to have passed to him. Respondent, however, did not pay the fees until one year later for A reasons beyond his control. He was asked by the District Land Officer to delay payment of fees until certain matters as to resurvey of the surrounding area of this plot had been completed, matters which were expected to involve new boundaries of this plot with B consequent alteration of fees. So the respondent waited. In the meantime on 28/1/81 two months after the respondent had been allocated this plot, Plot 17 Chang'ombe Industrial Area, Dar es salaam the appellant Col. Kashimiri was also allocated the same plot. This time it was called Plot No. 17 Block 5 Keko Industrial Area, Dar es Salaam. C

OMAR JJA, MAKAME JJA AND KISANGA JJA

We believe this is one and the same plot and none of the officials of the Ministry of Lands and the City Council who gave evidence had said otherwise. In fact if these were two different plots the parties to the suit would have gone their separate ways to develop their respective plots and no dispute would have arisen. D

The learned trial judge found that the respondent obtained this plot through approved channels and the late payment of fees by him was duly authorised whereas the plaintiff's application if there was any, did not pass through the allocation committee and therefore E he did not obtain this plot through the same laid down procedure as the other applicant. When the two documents of Right of Occupancy were before the Director for Land Development Services (DLDS) for his approval and signature before they could be sent for registration by the Registrar of Titles in the Land Registry, the DLDS F approved the document which bore the name of the respondent and rejected that of the appellant. In other words he disregarded the claim of the appellant to title of the land and upheld that of the respondent and so the respondent obtained his certificate of title to this piece of land.

In order to satisfy ourselves as to the authenticity of this approved procedure of G allocation of plots which was given in the testimony of land officers, we went through circulars of the then Ministry of Lands, Housing and Urban Development and came across this one circular No. NLUUD-C-1133/11/23 dated 13.11.78 signed by the H Principal Secretary one Joshua Daniel Minja which is titled "Plot Allocation". The circular does lay down the procedure referred to above for plot allocation and warns that any infringement of it will be visited by the cancellation of certificate of title so obtained. It in effect directs that all applications for allocation of plots must pass through I the allocation committee; in the cities there will be urban planning committees and in other areas there will be other committees - all specified. The circular warns that no individual A land officer, be he a city land officer or a district land officer or even DLDS, would be allowed to allocate a plot himself and any such allocation will not be recognised as valid by the Ministry of Lands.

We accept this procedure of the Ministry of Lands as valid and sound. It is geared to avoid the confusion and embarrassment emanating from the practice of multiple B allocation of the same plot to various people.
We accordingly find that this plot was properly allocated to the respondent but not to the appellant. C young person means a person who is twelve years of age or upwards and under the age of sixteen years. D

The accused falls in the category of young persons as defined above because he is about 14 years of age.

Under section 22(2) of the Children and Young Persons Ordinance no young person shall be sentenced to imprisonment if there are other methods of legally dealing with the juvenile offender. The material section states: E

22(2) No young person shall be sentenced to imprisonment unless the court considers that none of the other methods in which the case may be legally dealt with by the provisions of this or any other Ordinance is suitable. F

Alternative punishments for juvenile offenders include probation under section 18, absolute discharge, repatriation or committal to an approved school under sections 23 and 24 of the said Ordinance. G

The trial court had no legal justification to sentence the accused to 6 months imprisonment in the present case. The trial court ought to have resorted to the alternative forms of punishment provided for juvenile offenders. Accordingly the sentence of 6 months imprisonment is quashed and set aside. The accused is to be set at liberty H forthwith unless otherwise held for other lawful cause. The 6 strokes of the cane imposed on the accused meet the justice of the case.

I Order accordingly.

Later, the appellant too came up with yet another will purportedly executed by the deceased and witnessed by two clan members and one non-clan member.

Held: Rules 19 and 21 of the Local Customary Law (Declaration) (No. 4) Order of D 1963 clearly provide that if a testator is illiterate, a will executed by him must be attested by a minimum of two clan members and two non-clan members. Appeal dismissed.
Katabalwa, for appendant F
Moshi, J.: The appellant, Abdul Sadiki, was the unsuccessful party in Bukoba Urban Primary Court Civil Case No. 15 of 1987. The subject matter of the claim was a shamba which the respondent, Wilfred Rutakinikwa, established to have inherited from G one Miria Nsheke. The appellant's appeal was dismissed by the Bukoba district court, and hence this second appeal.
It was established in evidence before the Primary Court that Miria Nsheke was the grandmother of the appellant, whereas the husband of Miria was the uncle (baba H mdogo) of the respondent. The husband of Miria died without issue, and the respondent, who was staying with them, thought that he had a better title to their shamba, which is the shamba in dispute, than Miria. He filed a suit against Miria claiming the shamba which culminated in High Court (PC) Civil Appeal No. 97 of 1973. The I decision of the High Court was that the shamba in dispute was not clan land and that it was the sole property of Miria who could dispose of it in any manner she liked. A
Upon the death of Miria on 13/10/86 the respondent presented to a purported head of clan and administrator of the estate of Miria, Laurean Rugonzibwa (PW2) a Wili (Ext G) B dated 29.9.86 in which Miria had bequeathed the shamba in dispute to the respondent, Miria was an illiterate woman, and Ext G bore her thumb-print as well as two signatures of clan membes and two signatures of non-clan membes. PW2 allegedly refused to accept the Will (Ext G). It would appear that no other Will was declared or presented at that time. The appellant was at that time staying with Miria. The respondent C was in charge of and supervised, the funeral arrangements.
When the mourning period came to an end on 30.11.86, the clan members and the villagers met (Matanga) to devide the property of Miria. The shamba in dispute was D entrusted to the respondent, and he was placed in possession thereof. It was in writing (Ext. J), and all the clan members - Banyaruganda wa ukoo and the villagers participated. It would then appear that the appellant, spearheaded by PW2, came up with, and presented, another Will (Ext C) allegedly executed by Miria on 17.8.86 in E which the shamba in dispute was bequeathed to the appellant. The Will (Ext C) bore two signatures of clan members and one signature of non-clan members, and the thumb-print of Miria appeared below the signatures of the witnesses. The two Wills then gave rise to these proceedings.
In a well reasoned judgment, the Primary Court found the Will (Ect C) presented by the F appellant to be invalid mainly on the ground, among others, that it was not in conformity with Rules 19 and 21 of the Third Schedule to the Local Customary Law (Declaration) (No. 4) Order, 1963 - G.N. 436/63. Miria had been illiterate, and the Will did not have two non-clan members as its signatories. It only had one non-clan member G signatory. Furthermore, the purported thumb-print of Miria on the Will came after, and not before, the signatures of the signatories.

The same court found the Will (Ext G) presented by the respondent to be in conformity in all respect to Rules 19 and 21 of G.N. 436/63, and therefore valid, and declared the respondent to be the lawful occupier H of the shamba in dispute. These findings were upheld by the district court on first appeal, and the appellant has now come to this court.

In his submission before me, Mr. Katabalwa, learned advocate, stated that both courts below erred in holding Ext C to be invalid as the irregularities in connection therewith I were, according to him, minor. With a genuine respect to the learned advocate, I find no substance in that argument. The law governing the subject of Wills as proclaimed under A the Local Customary Law (Declaration) (No. 4) Order of 1963 is clear and unambiguous. If a testator is illiterate, a Will executed by him must be attested by a minimum of two clan members and two non-clan members. Miria was illiterate, and Ext C was not thus attested. This could not have been a minor irregularity under my B consideration. The irregularity was, in my view, very material in that it offended the provisions of the relevant law, and thus puts to question the validity of Ext C. In my view, the findings that Ext C was invalid, and Ext G was valid, could not, on the evidence, be faulted. Ext C was not in conformity with the law. It was not presented or C made known immediately upon the death of Miria. It was not read at the burial. Ext G was confirmed by the clan members meeting of 30.11.86 when they put the respondent into the possession of the shamba in dispute in writing (Ext H.). I am satisfied, as were both courts below, that, on the evidence, Ext. C was an invalid Will, and Ext G was the D valid Will. A view is expressed in the memorandum of appeal that a proper suit ought to have been one for an application by either party for letters of administration. In my view, this would have been an irrelevant consideration for purposes of this suit. Miria did E not die intestate. She had left a Will (Ext G), found to be valid, which clearly stated who was to get what of the properties of the deceased Miria. The respondent was clearly justified to sue for his share in the estate of Miria on the basis of Ext G - a move which was in conformity with what the clan members had earlier sanctioned in its meeting F of November, 1986. On the facts, and on the law, I am satisfied, as was the trial court, that the respondent is the lawful possessor of the land in dispute. He should not be disturbed.

For the foregoing reasons, I find no merit in this second appeal, which is hereby dismissed with costs. G

Kisanga, J.A.: Mr. D'Souza, the advocate for the applicant, had filed a notice of motion (Civil Application No. 5 of 1987 - Zuffer Kamarali v Yunus Elias) asking this G Court for an order of stay of execution of judgment in the Arusha High Court. Notice of the intended appeal was duly given before the filing of the notice of motion.

On the day set for hearing the notice of motion, however, Mr. D'Souza had filed yet H another application to withdraw his notice of appeal. Arguing in support of the latter application, he stated that there was no rule under the Court of Appeal Rules which specifically provided for withdrawal of notice of appeal in civil matters, but submitted that the Court would be entitled to grant the application under r. 3(1) and (2)(a) of the I Rules. The relevant parts of that rule say:

KISANGA JA

(1) The practice and procedure of the court in connection with appeals and intended A appeals from the High Court, and the practice and procedure of the High Court in connection with appeals to the Court shall be as prescribed in these Rules, but the Court may at any time, direct a departure from these Rules in any case in which this is required in the interests of Justice. B

(2) Where it is necessary to make an order for the purposes of the Court may, on application or on its own motion, give directions as to the procedure to be adopted or make any other order when it considers necessary. D

(a) dealing with any matter for which no provision is made by these Rules or any other written law; C

(b) ....

Like Mr. D'Souza, I have not been able to discover any rule in the Court of Appeal Rules which specifically allows the withdrawal of a notice of appeal in civil matters. The nearest provision I could find is r. 95(1) which allows an appellant to withdraw his E appeal any time after instituting the appeal but before it is called on for hearing. However, it is apparent that that subrule could not apply here because no appeal has been instituted in terms of r. 83. Nor could I make an order in terms of r. 84 (a) to the effect that Mr. D'Souza is deemed to have withdrawn his notice of appeal because Mr. F D'Souza assures me that the specified period for instituting the appeal has not run out in that the Deputy Registrar has not yet supplied him with a copy of the proceeding which Mr. D'Souza applied for.

Yet I think it would be unfair to deny an appellant the right to withdraw his notice of G appeal. To do that would amount to holding the appellant to the appeal against his wish. That would not make sense, nor would it be just. In the circumstances I am inclined to Mr. D'Souza's view that this is a fit case in which to invoke the provisions of r.3 as set out above. In so doing I take the view that it is fair that where for one reason or another H appellant no longer wishes to proceed with his intended appeal, he should be allowed to withdraw the notice of appeal. It should be borne in mind that it is the appellant himself who freely and voluntarily decided to file the notice of appeal; it is only just that I he should be equally free to withdraw that notice. This view would be in harmony with the provisions of r. 95(1) which, as stated above, permits an appellant to withdraw his A appeal after instituting it but before it is called on for hearing. For, it would sound almost absurd to say that a party cannot withdraw a mere notice of appeal but that he can withdraw after he has done much more in the matter by taking steps to institute the appeal itself. B

For these reasons I grant the application and order that the notice of appeal filed in respect of the Arusha High Court Civil Appeal No. 39 fo 1987 be marked withdrawn. With that, the notice of motion in Civil Application No. 5 of 1987 to this Court for stay of execution pending appeal is also marked withdrawn. C

Order accordingly.

Kazimoto, J.: This is an appeal against the decision and judgment of Mbinga District Court Civil Appeal No. 59/87 which overrulled the decision of Mkumbi Primary Court B in Civil Case No. 24/87. The parties in the Primary Court were the appellant and the respondent in this appeal.

Briefly the appellant and the respondent are members of the same clan. Both own clan land. The respondent sold clan land to a third party, that is, to a non-clan member. C Efforts by the appellant and the respondent's father to prevent the sale had failed despite the members of the clan's willingness to buy the land in dispute. The trial court unanimously found in favour of the appellant.

In allowing the appeal in favour of the respondent the District Court, although conceding that the land belonged to the clan, held nevertheless that the respondent had all the right D to dispose of his house and all plants which were in the clan land.

In my considered view the learned senior district magistrate erred in this. Clan land cannot be sold to non-clan members without the prior approval of the clan members. In E this case there was clear evidence that the members of the parties' clan had resisted the sale. They arranged a meeting and PW2 stated in his evidence that the respondent demanded shs.50,000/= and that he agreed to pay the amount and on the following day he took shs.35,000/= with him to give to the respondent. He said also that the F respondent did not appear and later he demanded shs.70,000/= and then shs150,000/=. The respondent did not dispute this evidence. The decision of the district court is perverse the evidence at the trial. Clearly PW2 was prepared to buy off the respondent and the respondent kept on vacillating in his demands which were clearly unreasonable G under the circumstances of the case. I therefore hold that the respondent had no right to sell clan land to a non clan - member without the prior consent which, in this case, has been withheld.

In its judgment the trial court held that the respondent can sell the permanent trees which H can be harvested and leave the land to the clan members. It be noted that the respondent had a house on the clan land. In my judgment the house and permanent crops on the land can only be sold to clan members and in the event of their failure to do so or inability to purchase the same only then can the respondent sell the property and the land to non-clan member. As stated above the members of the clan were prepared I to pay for the land but the respondent kept on changing the price. It cannot be said that the clan A members were unable to buy the land in dispute. This right which the respondent had in this case was to sell land to the clan members. This disposes the appeal.

One thing concerning the record must be stated. I have stated above that the parties in B Mkumbi Primary Court civil case No. 25 of 1987 were Nikolaus Komba and Kondrad Komba. In Mbinga Civil Appeal No. 59 of 1987 the parties were Kondrad Komba and Nikolaus Komba. The copy of judgment accompanying the memorandum of appeal shows that the parties in the District Court Civil Appeal No. 59/87 were Condrad C Komba and Nikodem Komba. This Nikodem Komba does not appear to be a party in these proceedings either at the trial or the District Court. Both appellants and respondent have assured the court that this case does not concern Nikodem Komba and that he is unknown to them. The judgment had been certified as a true copy of the judgment. It D now turns out to be untrue copy of the judgment. This underscores the need to be careful. Had the learned senior district magistrate exercised a bit of a diligence he would not have failed to notice that Nikodemu Komba was not a party in the appeal before him. That was for the record. E
As I have said the decision of the District Court was against the weight of the evidence at the trial and that the respondent had no right to sell clan land to a non clan member in the circumstances of this case. The decision of the District Court cannot be supported. F
In the result I allow the appeal with costs, set aside the judgment of the District Court and would uphold the judgment of the trial court which is affirmed.

During the hearing of this appeal, Mr. Kwikima, for the appellant submitted that the I appellant's plea was equivocal in that the words "unlawful possession" were not explained to the appellant, and that had the A court asked the appellant if he had a permit to possess the lion skin he would have produced one. Indeed, as it turned out, the appellant does possess a permit in respect of the lion skin duly issued by an administrative Officer, Shinyanga as per Exchequer Receipt No. 867197 dated 15/1/86. B

There is ample authority for the proposition that the words "It is true" when used by an accused person may not necessarily amount to a plea of guilty, particularly where the offence is a technical one, (See Kato v R. [1971] H.C. & 364). It is the duty of a trial court in such a case to search mind that before entering a conviction on any such plea, it C is highly desirable not only that every constituent of the charge should be explained to the accused, but that he should be required to admit or deny every constituent. (See Desai v R. [1971] H.C.D. 297). In the words of the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa D in the case of Yonasani Egalu and Others v R.; 9 E.A.C.A. 65 at page 67:

In any case in which a conviction is likely to proceed on a plea of guilty ... it is most desirable not only that every constituent of the charge should be explained to the accused but that he E should be required to admit or deny every element of it unequivocally.

If, however, the words used by an accused person may, per se, appear to be an unequivocal plea of guilty, a conviction may properly be entered against him if the facts given by the prosecutor and agreed to as correct by the accused fully disclose the offence charged. (See Sebastian Mpaka v R., [1975] LRTn, 28). G

In the present case, the appellant's words - "It is true" while indicating that the appellant was making an admission, did not constitute an unequivocal plea. The facts given by the public prosecutor cannot reasonably be said to amount to a full disclosure of the ingredients or elements of the offence charged. The facts appear to me to have H amounted to an allegation that the appellant had possession of the lion skin.

It is true that by adopting the particulars of the charge, the public prosecutor had, in effect, alleged that the possession was "unlawful". But bearing in mind the fact that the I offence is rather technical, and that the appellant was unrepresented, the words unlawful possession" ought to have been explained to the appellant by a question such A as, "Do you have a permit or other authority to possess this lion skin?" If that had been done, the appellant would readily have produced the exchequer receipt. Clearly, therefore, the appellant did not understand what he was admitting. It follows, therefore, B that the appellant's plea was equivocal, and so the conviction was bad.

Had all things been equal, I would have ordered a retrial. But the facts disclosed amply demonstrate that the appellant's possession of the lion skin was, at the time of his arrest, lawful.

In the result, this appeal succeeds. The appellant's conviction is accordingly hereby C quashed and sentence set aside. The appellant shall be released from custody forthwith unless otherwise lawfully detained. The order of forfeiture is also set aside and it is hereby ordered that the lion skin be restored to the appellant forthwith.

1. Chief Nehemia Gotonga v Stephen Kinyanjui [1959] EA 1096 (C.A.).

Bateyunga for the defendant D

Mwaikasu, J.: In this suit, Mpanda District Council, a Local Government Authority, established under Act No. 7 of 1982, sues the Defendant one Yekonia Ngiliye upon a contract to supply 600,000 burnt bricks.

The Council has sought for and has been offered the services of a State Attorney, an E officer of the Attorney General Chambers, stationed at Mbeya; to prosecute its claim. The defendant is defended by Mr. Bateyunga, learned advocate.

When the case came up for hearing on 13/10/88, Mr. Bateyunga, raised a preliminary F point of objection; contending that, while the learned State Attorney, was under the Advocates Ordinance Cap. 341, clearly an advocate for the government of the United Republic in both criminal and civil matters affecting the government as such, it was doubtful as to whether, such role of the State Attorney also extended to defending G corporate public bodies as the Mpanda District Council in civil matters; arguing that as such corporate body, the Council had been conferred with its own legal entity with power to sue and be sued and that in defending its interests in civil matters it had to use its own lawyers employed by it either on temporary terms or permanent terms. For this H reason the learned State Attorney was considered to have no locus standi.

Mr. Mbise, for his part maintained that as a legal officer in the Attorney General's Chambers, representing the Attorney General he was entitled to appear before this court I and defend the plaintiff Council because the Attorney General was, in law, empowered to appear to provide legal defence services to all Ministries, departments and institutions A that are directly under the government of the United Republic when the interests of the government of the United Republic were to be protected.

In this case he felt that the government of the United Republic had its financial interests at B stake as it was the provider of substantial sums for the carrying out of development projects by the Council. And that as evidence of such interest by the government of the United Republic, the Regional Commissioner had direct control over the funds of Local Government Authorities within his region and the accounts of such Authorities have to be C audited by the controller and Auditor General. He added that unlike most Urban Authorities, the District Council had no legal officer of its own and did not have provision for engaging one.

That is clearly evidenced by the fact that unlike the clear provision under s.100 of the D Local Government (Urban Authorities) Act No. 8 of 1992, relating to appearance of an Urban Authority in legal proceedings, no similar provision is to be found under the Local Government (District Authorities) Act No. 7 of 1982, under which Mpanda District E Council was established, hence the need for legal representation by the Attorney General's legal personnel. It is also interesting to note that under s.100 of the Local Government (Urban Authorities) Act 1982, even the representative of such Urban Authorities by any of their officers as provided there under is subjected to general institutions given by the Attorney Geneal.

Now as to the standing of the legal officers of the Attorney General's Chambers, in the F legal profession that is clearly laid down under S.3(1) (2) (a) of the Advocates Ordinance Cap. 341. It is there provided as follows:

3-(1) Every officer to whom this secion applies shall, in connection with the duties of this office, G be entitled to practise as an advocate in the High Court or in any court subordinate thereto constituted under the subordinate court's ordinance (now Magistrates Court Act 1984) and to perform any of the functions which in England may be performed by a member of the Bar as H such or by a solicitor of the supreme court of Judicature as such and shall not except as in this ordinance expressly provided, be subject to the provisions of this ordinance.

(2) The officers to whom this section applies are- I

MWAIKASU J

(a) The Attorney General, Parliamentary Draftsmen, and State Attorney, and any A person duly qualified holding office in the Attorney General's Chambers;

There is no doubt that though a body corporate, a District Concil has very close links B with the central government. This is clearly evidence by the close financial and administrative controls exercised by the central government of the United Republic over the financial and administrative affairs of all Local Government Authorities, both Urban and District Authorities. C

The issue is whether a State Attorney can legally be said to have audience before this court while representing a Local Government Authority as the case in the instant case.

I answer such question in the positive. I say so with much confidence upon reading first, the provision of s.100 of the Local Government (Urban Authorities) Act 1982. It is D under such section that whatever representation an Urban Authority may have in a legal proceedings that would have to be subject to general instructions from the Attorney General. That means that in such situation the Attorney General will have the liberty to stop any of the Authority's intended legal representative and take up the representation E himself, personally or by any other legal officer under him. I cannot imagine that the Attorney General having been clothed with such powers in respect of Urban Authorities, he is denied of similar powers in respect of legal representation for District Authorities. I F take the omission to have similar provision under the Local Government (District Authorities) Act No. 7 of 1982 as a mere oversight by the Parliamentary Draftsmen. For had it been intended to have a different system of representation for District Authorities it would have been so clearly stated. G

Secondly experience is not lacking. For the case of Chief Nehemia Otonga v Stephen Kinyanjui [1959] E.A. 1096 (C.A.) which originates from Kenya is very much to the point as it had to tackle a similar problem.

In that case the appellant was a Chief of the Chania Location, in the Republic of Kenya, H then a British colony. By virtue of s.5 of the Native Authority Ordinance (Cap. 97) it was the duty of every chief to maintain order in the area in respect of which he was appointed and for that purpose he was vested with certain powers under the Ordinance. The action from which this appeal to the Court of Appeal was preferred and in which I judgment had been given against the appellant as the defendant, related to the use by the appellant of a motor A truck belonging to the respondent on four occasions, in order to provide him transport for his duties as chief, and for use in certain matters related to the emergency. Counsel for the respondent took, among other things, a preliminary objection that Mr. Rumbold, B then crown counsel, was incompetent to appear on behalf of the appellant.

Dealing with such objection their Lordships, on the authority of a number of English cases held inter alia that it is within the administrative discretion of the Attorney General C to decide whether it is in the interest of the crown (the Republic in our case) that a particular litigant should be provided with legal representation and once the decision had been taken to provide the appellant with counsel, it was within the scope of crown counsel's official duties to appear on his behalf.

Now substituting our State Attorney for crown counsel, it goes without saying that D having been decided by the Attorney General to represent the plaintiff, Mpanda District Council, Mr. Mbise, learned State Attorney, has undented locus standi in this suit. He is therefore entitled to prosecute this suit as it is within the scope of his official duties. E

Order accordingly.

The appellant was convicted in the District Court of Songea of theft by agent c/s 273(b) A of the Penal Code and sentenced to five years imprisonment under the Minimum Sentences Act, 1972. It was common ground that the judgment of the District Court was neither dated nor signed as required by section 312(1) of the Criminal Procedure Act. The learned State Attorney submitted for the Republic that as a result of that B omission the trial became a nullity and prayed for an order to quash the proceedings and a trial de novo. It was also common ground that the offence of which the appellant was convicted was not a scheduled offence and furthermore, the appellant had a previous conviction. C

Held: (i) An omission of date and signature in a judgment can never occasion failure of justice. It is a mere irregularity which is curable under the provisions of section 388(1) of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985; D

(ii) in sentencing the appellant under the Minimum Sentence Act, 1972 for the offence of stealing by agent c/s 273(h) of the Penal Code, the learned trial magistrate clearly erred. That is not a scheduled offence and in any case the property does not belong to a specified authority within the meaning of the Act. Bearing in mind that the E appellant has previous conviction and his readiness to concede the sentence of five years imposed under the Minimum Sentences Act 1972 is set aside and the appellant is sentenced to three (3) years imprisonment for the offence charged. [zJDz]Judgment

Kazimoto, J.: The appellant has been convicted of theft by agent c/s 273(b) of the Penal Code and sentenced to five years imprisonment under the Minimum Sentences Act 1972. Being aggrieved he is appealing against both conviction and sentence imposed I against him.

MWAIKASU J

Learned State Attorney had submitted that the trial is a nullity. He argued that the A judgment was not dated nor was it signed. He contended that the effect of not dating and signing the judgment is to render it null and void and he relied on the case of Mugena and another v R. [1967] EA 676. He prayed for an order to quash the proceedings and for a fresh trial. Section 312(1) CPA provides: B

Every judgment under the provisions of section 311 shall, except as otherwise expressly provided by this Act, be written by, or reduced to writing under the personal directions and C superitendance of the presiding judge or magistrate in the language of court, and shall contain the point or points for determination, the decision thereon and the reasons for the decision, and shall be dated and signed by such presiding officer as of the date on which it is pronounced in open court. D

A perusal of the judgment shows clearly that it was not signed nor was it dated. The magistrate ought to have signed and dated the judgment after he had convicted the appellant. This was not done and this amounted to non-compliance with section 312(1) CPA. The issue is whether failure to sign and date a judgment renders the trial a nullity or E a mere irregularity.

First we have to look at the provisions of section 388 of the Criminal Procedure Act. That section provides as follows:

388(1) Subject to the provisions hereinbefore contained no finding, sentence, or order made F or passed by a court of competent jurisdiction shall be reversed or altered on appeal or revision on account of any error, ommission, or irregularity in the complaint, summons, warrant, charge, proclamation, order, judgment or in any inquiry or other proceedings under G this Act, save that where on appeal or revision, the court is satisfied that such error, omission, or irregularity has in fact occasioned failure or justice, the court may order a retrial or make such other order as it may consider just and equitable. H

Mugema and another v R. [1967] EA 676 which learned state attorney referred to is a decision of this court. In that case the accused were charged with assaulting a police officer in the due execution of his duty. After concluding hearing of the evidence, the I case was adjourned for judgment on 12th September 1966. On the file of the court proceedings there was an undated and unsigned judgment which found the accused guilty and commitment warrants dated 14th September, 1966 A purporting to show that the accused were sentenced to twelve months imprisonment and to pay shs. 50/= compensation. Platt, J. held at page 678:

These omissions constitute gross irregularity and I am not prepared to cure them under s. B 346 of the Criminal Procedure Code .... In my view the whole trial is a nullity.

I respectfully disagree with the decision in Mugema's case that the mere omission to sign and date a judgment constitutes gross irregularity which cannot be cured by the C application of section 346 CPC and now section 387 CPA. I do not see how a judgment delivered in the presence of the accused, though undated and unsigned can occasion in fact a failure of justice to an accused person. It is an irregularity which does not go to the root of the content of a judgment and can never occasion a failure of D justice.

This was the view of the Court of Appeal for East Africa in the case of Kagoye s/o Bundala v R. [1959] EA 900. This was a murder case. In that case the judgment which was short ran as follows: E

The accused is charged with the murder of Maganga his son, on April 8, 1959 c/s 196 of the Penal Code. I have summarised the evidence in my charge to the assessors and there is no need to repeat it. They are both of the opinion that he is guilty and I fully agree. He is F accordingly convicted.

The Court of Appeal found that the provisions of section 171(1) of the CPC, which are similar to section 312(1) CPA were not complied with and had to decide whether the conviction was invalidated or whether it could hear and determine the appeal on its G merits. Referring to the decision of Willy John v R. (1953), 23 EACA 509 it said:

Failure to date and sign the judgment is a mere irregularity which can be cured by the H application of section 304 of the Criminal Procedure Code since the whole of the record of the proceedings is in the hand of the trial judge and there was no prejudice to the appellant. But the failure to comply with the other requirements of the section is fatal to the conviction. In I Desiderio Kawunya v Regina 20 EACA 281, this court held that failure to comply with the provisions of s. 169(1) of the Uganda Criminal Procedure Code A which is similar in terms to s. 149(1) of the Seychelles Criminal procedure Code will not necessarily invalidate a conviction if there is sufficient material on the record to enable the Appeal Court to consider the appeal on merit. In this case there is clearly insufficient on record B to enable us to consider the appeal on the merit.

The same view was taken in the case of Ilanda s/o Kasongo v R. [1960] EA 780. C Retrial was ordered in each of these cases not because the judgments were not dated and signed but because the judgments did not contain the point or points for determination, the decision and the reasons for decision. There was therefore no sufficient material before the court of appeal to decide the cases on merit.

In the present case the learned resident magistrate had summarised the evidence for both D the prosecution and the defence and decided to convict the appellant as charged and had fully given his reasons as to why he believed the prosecution evidence and rejected the appellant's defence. There is in this case sufficient material to enable this court to E decide the appeal on merit. I would therefore hold that failure to sign and date a judgment is a curable irregularity under S. 388 C.P.A., and I have decided to cure the said irregularity by the invocation of section 388 C.P.A. which I do.

In his memorandum of appeal the appellant had stated that the learned trial resident F magistrate has erred in accepting the evidence of PW2 who had grudges against him. According to him PW2 had suspected him of having sexual relationship with PW2's wife and had confronted each other several times. With respect this allegation is not borne out by the evidence on record. PW2 was cross-examined by the appellant and because the G cross-examination was brief I propose to quote it:

xxd by the accused: Because he knows you he believed you. You did not mention the particular person you intended to go when you told us as you said that from 10.00 o'clock to H 6.00 o'clock you could be back.

How could the learned magistrate believe that PW2 suspected the appellant of having sexual intercourse with his (PW2's) wife and had confronted each other several times? The appellant should have asked PW2 specific questions on the alleged grudges and I only then can the court decide to believe or reject the evidence of any particular witness. A Ground of appeal has no ring of truth around it and it is rejected.

In ground two and four of appeal the appellant has argued that he was denied the opportunity to call his defence witnesses. This is not true. At the close of the prosecution case the appellant, after being informed of his right, elected to give unsworn statement B and said he wished to call one witness from Kagera. After giving his statement from the dock then in his own words he said "The case can be closed. I have no need to call the witness." There is therefore no merit at all in the allegation, which is rejected, that he was C denied opportunity to call his defence witnesses.

The appellant then argued in ground 3 of appeal that on the material day he was 50 Km away from the village and thus he could not have been given the bicycle by the complainant. This is a defence of alibi. The learned trial magistrate effectively dealt with D this issue and stated that the appellant and PW1 and PW2 are familiar to one another, they live in the same village and there could be no mistake. It appears to me that the trial magistrate gave no weight to the defence of alibi. The appellant did not give notice of his intention to rely on an alibi either to the prosecution or to the court before the hearing of E his case during the trial nor did he give any particulars of his alibi before the case for the prosecution was closed. He decided to raise his defence after the close of the prosecution case. This is a contravention of section 194(4)(b) fo the C.P.A. The learned trial resident magistrate had correctly accorded no weight to that defence. That ground F also fails. With that I find no merit in the appeal against conviction which is dismissed.

The appellant was sentenced to five years imprisonment under the Minimum Sentences Act 1972. In sentencing the appellant under that Act for the offence of theft by agent c/s G 273(b) the learned trial magistrate has clearly erred. That is not a scheduled offence and in any case the property does not belong to a specified authority within the meaning of that Act. The appellant should have been sentenced under the provision of the Penal Code. I have considered whether the sentence of five years imprisonment is not exessive. The maximum penalty for the offence charged is ten years. The prosecution H said that they had no previous record against the appellant who in turn stated that he is a convict. It is not known for what offence the appellant had been convicted. He has however stated in his defence that he is serving a sentence of three years imprisonment. I This case shows how lazy and lax the prosecution had been for they could easily have known that the appellant has a record of previous A conviction and would have stated the offence for which he was serving the three years sentence. That would have helped the court to meet out the appropriate sentence. On my part bearing in mind that the appellant has previous conviction and his readiness to concede I would set aside the sentence of five years imposed under the Minimum B Sentences Act 1972 and sentence the appellant to three (3) years imprisonment for the offence charged.

In the result, and to the extent of the variation of sentence, the appeal against sentence is also dismissed.

C Order accordingly.

One Osmund Ndunguru had applied to Mateka village government for a piece of land to build and the appellant, through the village building committee, allocated him land, which H the respondent claimed to be his. The respondent instituted proceedings in Kigonsera Primary Court civil case no 59 of 1983 in which the respondent prevailed. Osmund Ndunguru appealed to the District Court of Mbinga in Civil Appeal No. 81 of 1983. I The District Court quashed the proceedings for lack of jurisdiction on the part of the trial court. The respondent sucessfully instituted, on the advice of the District Court, fresh proceedings in Myangayanga Primary Court jurisdiction to try A the suit, having against the appellant as chairman of Mateka Village.

The District Court of Mbinga upheld the findings of the Primary Court that the land which the appellant had allocated to one Osmund Ndunguru belonged to the respondent and held that the village government had no right to allocate developed land without the B prior consent of the owner.
Held: (i) The respondent was not consulted prior to the reallocation of the land by the appellant to Osmund Ndunguru. Common sense and equity forbid a village government C to allocate land within its jurisdiction which is under the possession of another villager who is developing it without the prior consent of the villager. A village government which allocated land which is already under development and in the possession of another person would not only bring lawlessness and anarchy to the villages but would also D retard the development of the villages;

(ii) the appellant as chairman allocated the land to Osmund Ndunguru who entered into the land under the authority of the appellant. Had he done so without authority Osmund Ndunguru would be liable to be sued for ejection. As the appellant is E the authority which allocated the land in dispute he cannot be heard to complain for being sued in court;

(iii) the proceedings in Kigonsera Primary Court civil case No. 59 of 1983 were quashed by the Mbinga District Court in Civil Appeal No. 81 of 1983. The effect of F quashing court proceedings is to put the parties in the same position as if there had never been any proceedings. Under the circumstances nothing has been finally decided;

(iv) one of the conditions for successful invocation of the plea of res judicata is G that the parties in the previous suit must be the same as in the subsequent suit. In Kigonsera Primary Court civil case No. 59 of 1983 and Mbinga District Court Civil No. 81 of 1983 the parties were Antony Hyera and Osmund Ndunguru. The appellant as chairman was not a party to these proceedings. The plea is therefore not maintanable in H law.

KAZIMOTO J
Mwingira, for the respondent A
[zJDz]Judgment
Kazimoto, J.: The appellant was sucessfully sued by the respondent in Myangayanga Primary Court. He appealed to the District Court Mbinga and his appeal was dismissed. B He is now appealing to this court. The appellant appeared in person and the respondent was represented by Mr. Mwingira learned counsel. Having heard arguments from both parties I dismissed the appeal with costs and reserved my reasons. Now I proceed to give them.
First the background to the case. The respondent is a resident of Mateka village. The C appellant is the chairman of Mateka Village. The respondent had land in Mateka village and from the evidence on record he has been in that land since 1953. There is a house and permanent trees like coffee trees etc. It appears that he has never abandoned the land. In 1978 one Osmund Leodgar Ndunguru (DW3) was transferred from Tunduru D district to Mbinga district. He is a teacher and he was posted at Mateka primary school within Mateka village. He applied to the Matkea village government for a piece of land to build, and the appellant, through the village building committee allocated him land, E which the respondent claimed to be his. The respondent instituted proceedings against Osmund Ndunguru in Kigonsera Primary Court Civil Case No. 59 of 1983 which the respondent succeeded. Osmund Ndunguru appealled to the District Court Mbinga in Civil Appeal No. 81 of 1983. The district court quashed the proceedings for lack of F jurisdiction on the part of the trial court. The respondent was advised, if he wished, to institute fresh proceedings in the court having jurisdiction to try the suit. It transpired during those proceedings that Osmund Ndunguru had a letter of allocation issued by the appellant as chairman. The respondent then instituted the present proceedings against the appellant who allocated the subject matter of the suit. G

Both the trial court and the first appellate court found that the land which appellant had allocated to Osmund Ndunguru belonged to the respondent, that the land belonged to the father of the respondent one Francis who actually planted the permanent trees. The H district court held further that the village government had no right to allocate developed land without the prior consent of the owner thereof.

Now I turn to the grounds of appeal. The first issue is whether a village government can lawfully allocate land within its jurisdiction which is under the possession of another I villager who is developing it. I do not hesitate to answer that question with a big emphatic no.

KAZIMOTO J

Common sense will not allow it. Equity will forbid it. While saying so I should not be A taken to question the power of a village government to allocate land within its jurisdiction which has not been allocated to any person. Nor do I question the powers of a village government to allocate land which is already allocated to another person if the person in possession of such land is consulted prior to the re-allocation and he had consented to B the proposed re-allocation. A village government which allocated land, as in the present case, which is already under development and in the possession of another person would not only bring lawlessness and anarchy to the villages but would also retard the C development of the villages.

In Lukas Masirori Kateti v Sebege [1969] HCD 11 this court warned village development committees to use their powers justly and wisely instead of creating discontent amongt the inhabitants whom they are entrusted to look after. In that case the D respondent had already been allocated land. The village development committee re-allocated the same land to the appellant in that case. I would like to associate myself with the decision in that case and echo the same warning.

In the present case the respondent has been in possession of the land. He was not E consulted prior to the re-allocation of the land by the appellant to Osmund Ndunguru. The respondent did not consent and as it turns out he has resisted it. In my judgment I concur with the findings of the district court that the appellant has no right to allocate or re-allocate land within its jurisdiction which is in the possession of another villager F without the prior consent of the respondent.

The appellant has argued in his memorandum of appeal and before me that he was wrongly sued and that the person to be sued was Osmund Ndunguru. Mr. Mwingira for G the respondent has argued that Osmund Ndunguru had no fault. He applied to the village government which, allocated him the land in question by the appellant. He contendend that the case against the appellant has been properly instituted.

I agree with the submission of learned counsel. Osmund Ndunguru did not forcefully H enter the respondent's land. He submitted an application to the village government. That application was accepted and approved. The appellant as chairman allocated the land to Osmund Ndunguru who entered into the land under the authority of the appellant. Had I he done so without authority Osmund Ndunguru would be liable to be sued for ejection. As the appellant is the authority which allocated the land in dispute he cannot be heard to complain for A being sued in court.

The appellant has raised another point in his memorandum of appeal and in his submissions. He has submitted that this case has already been decided by the High B Court between Osmund Ndunguru and the respondent. He querried the "wisdom" of the law in instituting this fresh suit against him. He was having in mind the principles of res judicata.

Mr. Mwingira has argued that the appellant has no defence under section 9 of the Civil C Procedure Code. He submitted that the appellant was not a party to those proceedings.

I have already indicated that in Kigonsera Primary Court civil case No. 59 of 1983 the parties were Antony Hyera and Osmund Ndunguru. In Mbinga District Court Civil Appeal No. 81 of 1983 the parties were Osmund Ndunguru and Antony Hyera. The D appellant as chairman was not a party to those proceedings. As I have said those proceedings were quashed. The effect of quashing court proceedings is to put the parties in the same position as if there had never been any proceedings. Under the circumstances nothing has been finally decided.

Even if Osmund Ndunguru had won the appeal, that is there was a final decision on the E matter the plea of res judicata is not open to the appellant. One of the conditions for successful invocation of the plea of res judicata is that the parties in the previous suit must be the same as in the present suit. As demonstrated the appellant was not a party in F the previous suit in Kigonsera Primary Court Civil Case No.59 of 1983 and Mbinga District Court Civil Appeal No. 81 of 1983. The plea is therefore not maintainable in law.

The appellant has argued that the trial court and the District Court had wrongly analysed the evidence on record. He contended that there were no permanent trees on the land. G He complained about the sketch plan and that they did not take into account the evidence of Mputa who said that the land which was allocated was his and not that of the respondent.

Mr. Mwingira has argued that the appellant did not personally go to the land to ascertain H if Osmund Ndunguru was allocated proper land. He stated that according to the evidence the appellant said that he thought the land belonged to Joseph Lihakihala who denied that the land allocated to Osmund Ndunguru was his.

The evidence of Vicent John (DW4) and Joseph Lihakihala and Mputa DW5 is I unambigous. DW4 was the chairman of the building committee. According to his evidence they went to DW5 who showed them the area they allocated to Osmund Ndunguru. But DW5 had denied A this for he stated that the village government asked him who was living in the shambas which they were asking. He said in no uncertain terms as follows and I quote.

Serikali ya kijiji haikuwa na madaraka na sehemu hiyo. Waliokuwa wanaishi katika eneo la B ugomvi wote wamekufa akiwa ni baba yake Francis.

According to the testimony of the respondent Francis was his (respondent's) father. The trial court considered this evidence and accepted it as correct. The first appellate court C agreed with the assessment of the trial court. In view of the evidence of DW5 this court does not agree that the courts below had come to a wrong conclusion in its evaluation of the evidence of DW4 and DW5.
In the upshot therefore, I dismiss the appeal with costs. D in the family way by the appellant while the said girl was under the respondent's care and A schooling. On appeal to the District Court, that court held that the respondent was entitled to compensation and granted 20 head of cattle to him as compensation hence the present appeal. B

Held: (i) The respondent did suffer damage in that in the event of the girl getting married, she was unlikely to fetch as much bridewealth as she would have fetched were it not for the pregnancy out of wedlock and that Paragraph 89 of the Local Customary C (Declaration) Order, GN No. 279 for 1963 presupposes that the rule as to payment of compensation is meant to set off loss of anticipated bridewealth to a parent;

(ii) it is the duty of every parent to educate his child to the best of his ability and the ability of the child. Such duty, therefore, should not be a subject of compensation; D

(iii) the assessment of damages or compensation is within the discretion of the court and in exercising that discretion, the court must pay due regard to the customary practice of the community to which the parties belong as to the average amount of E bridewealth ordinarily payable for women who have had no pregnancy out of wedlock and for those who have had children or pregnancies out of wedlock, and other related payments;

(iv) while it is true that under the Sukuma customary practice, a woman who became pregnant out of wedlock stands a lesser chance of getting married, it would still F not be fair to allow full compensation which is equivalent to the would be bride price for a woman who is not pregnant, the reason being that it is also well known that women who have had pregnancy out of wedlock do marry, notwithstanding the less bridewealth they fetch.

Chipeta, J.: In Shinyanga Primary Court at Nindo, the respondent, Athumani Nhiga, unsuccessfully sued the appellant, Reuben S. Peter, for 20 head of cattle for loss of I anticipated bridewealth, educational and other expenses following the respondent's daughter being put in the family way by the appellant while the said girl was A under the respondent's care and was schooling.

It was conceded in both courts below that the appellant did put the respondent's daughter in the family way. The trial court, however, dismissed the suit holding that the respondent had suffered no damage. B

On appeal to the District Court, the District Court held that the respondent did suffer damage in that in the event of the girl getting married, she was unlikely to fetch as much bridewealth as she would have fetched were it not for the pregnancy out of wedlock. C The first appellant court accordingly granted 20 head of cattle as damages.

With respect, I am inclined to agree with the first appellate court. In principle a parent whose unmarried daughter under his care is made pregnant by some person is entitled to D be paid compensation by that other person. This principle, I dare say, springs from the customary practice of payment of bridewealth and other related payments. It is generally recognized that a woman who has a child out of wedlock usually reduces her chance of marrying and, if she does marry, she usually fetches less bridewealth than one who has E had no child or pregnancy out of wedlock.

This court has reiterated that principle on many occasions. (See Yahaya Abedi v Mrisho Hussein) [1967] LRT n. 56; Ananiah v Mwaitebele, [1972] H.C.D. n. 1; and Julius v Denis, [1971] H.C.D. n. 264). F

This principle, in my view, is in accord with the provisions of Paragraph 89 of the Local Customary law (Declaration) Order, G.N. No. 279 of 1963, which provides for the payment of a fine and compensation to the father by any person who entices such father's daughter who is under his care. That Paragraph and the following Paragraphs, it G should be noted, deal with questions of matrimony, the payment of bridewealth and matrimonial assets. That, in my opinion, presupposes that the rule as to payment of compensation is meant to off set loss of anticipated bridewealth by a parent.

In the present case, therefore, the respondent is clearly entitled to compensation in H respect of his daughter's pregnancy out of wedlock.

The respondent also claimed compensation or damages for the expenses he has incurred on the girl's education. The first appellate court declined to grant this relief and, in my I view, rightly so. It is the duty of every parent to educate his child to the best of his ability and the ability of the child. Such duty, therefore, ought not to be a subject of A compensation. (see Yahaya's case - supra).

Perhaps the greatest problem which such cases present is the assessment of damages or compensation payable. In Yayaya's case (supra) this court awarded shs. 1,200/=; but in B Ananiah's case (supra) this court reduced an award of shs. 600/= to shs. 200/=.

I respectfully agree with late Mwakasendo (Acting Judge as he then was) in Ananiah's case that the assessment of such compensantion is within the discretion of the court. I wish to add, however, and with respect, that in exercising that discretion the court must C pay due regard to the customary practice of the community to which the parties belong as to the average amount of bridewealth ordinarily payable for women who have had no pregnancy out of wedlock and for those who have had children or pregnancies out of wedlock, and other related payments.

In this regard, it is my view that apart from whatever evidence the parties may adduce on D the point for the assistance of the court, court assessor can be of immense help to a trial court.

In the instant case, both parties are Wasukuma of Shinyanga where the amount of bridewealth payable ranges between 20 and 40 head of cattle. For his part, the E respondent in this case claimed 30 head. His argument or basis for that figure was that he would have received that much as bridewealth if his daughter had married without the pregnancy out of wedlock. With respect, I do not think that that would be fair and just. While it is true that the chances of marrying are less for a woman who has had F pregnancy out of wedlock than one who has not, it is also well known that women who have had pregnancies out of wedlock do marry, although they are generally expected to fetch less bridewealth.

It also appears to me, in the present case, that in claiming that amount of compensation, G the respondent was influenced by, or took into account, his expenses for his daughter's education. These I have disallowed.

Having the foregoing in mind, and doing the best I can on the material available, I award compensation of seven head of cattle.

To the extent of the reduction of the amount of compensation payable, the appeal H succeeds but it is otherwise dismissed. The respondent shall have his costs in this court and both courts below.

I Order accordingly.

Marriage was declared irreparably broken down and thus dissolved by the trial court. The main issue was the division of the matrimonial house. Assessors and magistrate at the trial court had different views. In his determination, the District Court Magistrate D accorded the award of the division of the house.

Appellant aggrieved, appeals arguing non-participation on the part of the respondent in the construction of the house.

Held: (i) The principle under the division of property under s.114 of Law of Marriage E Act is one of compensation. Whether what is being compensated is direct monetary contribution or domestic services, it does not matter.

(ii) respondent's participation in clearing the site where the house was built amounted to her participation in its construction. F

Mnzavas J.K.: The appellant and the respondent were married in 1972 under Islamic law and cohabitated in Newala and Dar es Salaam where they are now domiciled.
The marriage started disintegrating in 1986 when the appellant married a second wife. Efforts by local conciliation board to reconcile them were of no avail and consequently H the respondent filed a petition seeking for divorce and division of matrimonial property.
The Magomeni Primary Court (in Magomeni Primary Court Civil Case No. 13 of 1987) the Primary Court magistrate and the two assessors agreed that the marriage between I the parties had
MNZAVAS JK
irreparably broken down and accordingly dissolved the union. A
They however differed on the question of division of matrimonial property. The two elders were of the view that the property, a house at Mburahati, was built by the appellant without any assistance from the respondent/petitioner and therefore concluded B that the respondent/petitioner was not entitled to a share in the house.
The Primary Court magistrate was, on the other hand of a different view. He was on the evidence, of the opinion that the respondent/ petitioner had contributed in the acquisition C of the house and therefore entitled to a share in the house. As the Primary Court magistrate was of the view that the two gentlemen assessors had erred he forwarded the record to the District Court for determination as to which of the two opposed views was right.
In his assessment of the evidence tendered in the court of first instance the learned D district magistrate was convinced that the house was jointly acquired by the parties during the subsistence of the marriage and that the respondent/petitioner was entitled to a share in the house as found by the Primary Court magistrate.
The District Court accordingly invoked its powers under section 21 of the Magistrates' E Courts Act and reversed the majority judgment of the Primary Court and ordered that the Primary Court assess what the respondent was entitled as her share in the acquisition of the house and be paid by the appellant/respondent.
Dissatisfied by the decision of the District Court the appellant/ respondent has appealed F to this Court.
Before this Court the appellant recapitulated his defence in the lower courts that the respondent/petitioner did not contribute in the acquisition of the house; and that he built the house through a loan from Tanzania Housing Bank. Appellant's argument that he G secured a loan from the bank to build the house may well be true but that does not necessarily mean that the respondent/petitioner did not contribute in the acquisition of the house.
The law regarding section 114 of the Law of Marriage Act is now well settled. The H principle underlying division of property under section 114 is one of compensation, it does not matter nor does it make any difference whether that being compensated is direct monetary contribution or domestic services.

There was no dispute that during the subsistence of the marriage in which the house was I built the respondent/petitioner bore children, reared them and took care of the matrimonial home. She thereby freed her husband, the appellant, for his economic activities. She is therefore entitled to share in the economic fruits. And what is more there A was independent evidence from Saidi Omari (PW2), which was to the effect that the respondent/petitioner participated in the construction of the disputed house by clearing the ground on which the house is built. Apparently the appellant did not challenge this evidence. I agree with the decision of the District Court that the respondent/petitioner B contributed in the acquisition of the house and she is therefore under section 114 of the Law of Marriage Act entitled to a share in the house.

Let the Primary Court assess the value (in monetary form), of her contribution and the respondent pays the sum to her as compensation. In the event the appellant fails to pay C compensation to the respondent the house will have to be sold to realize respondent's share.

The appeal accordingly fails. The respondent to have her costs in this and the lower courts. D

B The appellant was aggrieved by an ex parte order of the High Court of Tanzania at Dar es Salaam dated 10/6/88 granting stay of execution of a decree of the Regional Housing Tribunal for Dar es Salaam Region. The appellant sought to have that order set aside in an application to that effect filed in the High Court. The said application was C not pursued to its logical conclusion. Subsequently, the appellant lodged a notice of appeal against the ex parte order of the High Court and an application for a certificate on points of law. The High Court granted leave and certificate on a number of points of law.

D About three months after the appellant had lodged her notice of appeal she instituted the present appeal by lodging the necessary documents.

When the appeal came up for hearing, a preliminary point of law arose to the effect that the appeal was incompetent E as the same was not instituted within the 60 days period prescribed under the provisions of Rule 83 of the Tanzania Court of Appeal Rules, 1979. It was argued by Mr. Kesaria, learned advocate for the appellant, that the F appeal could not be instituted before the High Court granted leave and certificate on 13/9/81.

Held: (i) An appeal to the Court of Appeal must be instituted within 60 days of the date when the notice of appeal was lodged;

G (ii) the time required for the preparation and delivery of copy of proceedings in the High Court shall be excluded in computing the time within which an appeal to the Court of Appeal is to be instituted if an application for that copy has been made within 30 days of the decision to appeal; such time has certified by the registrar of the High Court as having been required for the preparation and delivery of the copy of proceedings and the application for H that copy was in writing and a copy thereof was sent to the other party;

(iii) where delay in instituting appeal is caused by good reasons, other than the time taken in preparing the I record of appeal, a prudent party to the proceedings may safeguard its position by applying for extension of the period prescribed for the doing of any act under Rule 8 of the Tanzania Court of Appeal Rules. It was thus open for the appellant in this case, particularly at the time when she was applying for leave and certificate of the High A Court, to also apply to this Court to extend or enlarge the period prescribed for instituting the appeal;

(iv) under Rule 8 of the Court of Appeal Rules failure to institute an appeal within the prescribed 60 days B renders the appeal incompetent and furthermore, the appellant is deemed to have withdrawn his appeal.

Nyalali, C.J., Makame and Omar, JJ.A.: When this appeal came up for hearing on the 31st October, 1988, a preliminary matter of law arose concerning the competence of the appeal. The matter concerns non-compliance by E the appellant with the provisions of Rule 83 of the Tanzania Court of Appeal Rules 1979, which require an appeal to be instituted by filing the record of appeal within 60 days from the date of the notice of appeal. That Rule states:

83 (1) subject to provisions of Rule 122, an appeal shall be instituted by lodging in the appropriate registry, within 60 days F of the date when the notice of appeal was lodged:

(a) a memorandum of appeal, in quintuplicate;

(b) the record of appeal, the quintuplicate;

(c) the prescribed fee; and G

(d) security for the costs of the appeal, save that where an application for a copy of the proceedings in the High Court has been made within 30 days of the H decision against which it is desired to appeal, there shall, in computing the time within which the appeal is to be instituted, be excluded such time as may be certified by the Registrar of the High Court as having been required for I the preparation and delivery of that copy to the appellant.

NYALALI CJ, MAKAME JJA AND OMAR JJA

A (2) An appellant shall not be entitled to rely on the exception to sub-rule (1) unless his application for the copy was in writing and a copy of it was sent to the respondent.

It is apparent from the record that the order against which this appeal is brought was that made by the High Court, B Mnzavas, JK on the 10th June 1988 granting stay of execution of a decree of the Regional Housing Tribunal for Dar es Salaam Region. That order of the High Court was granted ex-parte. The appellant was aggrieved by the decision of the High Court and he apparently sought to have it set aside in an application to that effect filed in the C High Court on the 15th June, 1988. The application was supported by an affidavit of the appellant in this case. It would seem from the record that this application was not pursued to its logical conclusion. On the 22nd June 1988, D a notice of appeal to this court was filed by the appellant against that order of the High Court. On the same day of 22nd June 1988, the appellant applied in the High Court for leave to appeal to this court, and for a certificate on points of law. On the 13th September 1988, the High Court, Mapigano, J. granted leave and certified a number of E points of law for decision by this court. 16 days later, that is on 29th September 1988, the appellant instituted this appeal by lodging in the appropriate registry the documents stated under Rule 83.

It is evident from the record that about three months had expired from the date of notice of appeal to the date when F the appellant instituted the appeal by lodging the necessary documents in the appropriate registry. Mr. Kesaria, learned advocate for the appellant has argued to the effect that the appeal could not be instituted before the High G Court granted leave and the certificate on the 13th September 1988. We appreciated the logic of this argument but with due respect to learned counsel, this logic must be applied within the context of the law. The law provides not only for the period within which an appeal must be instituted, but provides also for situations where there may be H good cause for delay in instituting the appeal within the prescribed period of 60 days. For instance, where delay is due to time taken in preparing the record of appeal, such time certified by the Registrar of the High Court will be excluded in computing the prescribed period, provided of course, a copy of the proceedings is applied for in writing I within 30 days of the judgment or order appealed against, and the application is copied to the other party. Furthermore, where the delay in instituting the appeal is caused by other good reasons, a prudent party to the proceedings may safeguard its position by applying for extension of any period prescribed for the doing of any act A under Rule 8 of the Tanzania Court of Appeal Rules. It was thus open for the appellant in this case particularly at the time when applying for leave and the certificate of the High Court, also to apply to this court to extend or enlarge the period prescribed under Rule 83. This the appellant failed to do, and he has only himself or his advocate to blame B for the consequences.

What then are the legal consequences for the failure to institute the appeal within the period prescribed under Rule 83? This court has consistently held that such failure renders the appeal incompetent. Under the provisions of Rule C 84, the appellant "shall be deemed to have withdrawn his notice of appeal". (See the case of Enock Chacha v Mwanza Fishnet Manufacturers Ltd. Civil Appeal No. 10 of 1987 (decided by this court but not yet reported. Also the case of Wile Mkandala v Phillip Chilla, Civil Appeal No. 13 of 1984 (decided by this court but not yet D reported).

In the final analysis therefore, we find the appeal incompetent, and the appellant is deemed to have withdrawn his notice of appeal, with cost to the respondent. We order accordingly. E

Order accordingly.

B In 1983 the 4th and 5th appellants, shareholders and directors of the 1st and 2nd appellants (limited liability companies), in view of the "crack down" and the state of fear it generated, sold the total shareholding in and all the assets of the 1st and 2nd appellants to one Manik, the 2nd respondent. The assets included two farms held under C Right of Occupancy. The agreement was made orally. The price of shares was not agreed upon and there was no means of ascertaining it. The 2nd respondent, Manik, was put in occupation of the farms as the buyer. In 1986 the appellants sought to repudiate the agreement arguing that they did not sell the farm to Manik and in the alternative that if there was any such agreement at all it could not be enforceable for lack of writing and consent as required by D Regulation 3(1) of the Land Regulations, 1948.
Held: (i) As the price was not agreed, and there were no means of ascertaining such price in a sale of individual shares, there was no agreement due to uncertainty;

H Mustafa, Makame and Kisanga, JJ.A.: In the High Court at Arusha the United Engineering Works Ltd. and Jagdev Singh Manik as 1st and 2nd Plaintiffs respectively sued the Nitin Coffee Estates Ltd., Rafiki Estates Ltd., Nanji Devchand Patel, Sudhir Nanji Ondhia and Vineshwar Nanji Ondhia as 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th and 5th defendants I respectively. The Plaintiffs had alleged that the 4th defendant Sudhir Ondhia and the 5th defendant Vineshwar Ondhia acting on behalf of themselves and of all the A other shareholders and directors of 1st and 2nd defendant companies had orally concluded negotiations to sell to the Plaintiffs all the shareholding in the 1st and 2nd defendant companies, and all the movable and immovable assets, including the farm at Oldeani held by the 2nd defendant company on a Right of Occupancy. B

The 1st Plaintiff is a limited liability company and the 2nd Plaintiff is the managing director and principal shareholder of the 1st Plaintiff Company.

The 1st and 2nd defendants are limited liability companies and the 3rd, 4th and 5th defendants are shareholders and C directors of the 1st and 2nd defendant companies. It appears that both the Plaintiff limited company and the Defendant limited companies are owned and controlled by the family members of the 2nd Plaintiff and the family members of the 3rd, 4th and 5th defendants respectively. D

It was alleged by the plaintiffs (hereinafter called the respondents) that the global purchase price for the two defendant companies, lock stock and barrel, and of the total shareholding in those two defendant companies was shs. 10 million. E

The defendants (hereinafter called the appellants) denied that the 4th and 5th appellants had concluded negotiations for the sale of the total shareholding and all movable and immovable assets of the 1st and 2nd appellant companies for the global sum of shs. 10 million or at all. And in so far as the alleged sale of the farms of the 1st and 2nd F appellant companies was concerned they submitted that the agreement was in any event unenforceable for lack of writing and the requisite content.

The cases came up for trial before Mwakibete, J. The respondents' case briefly was as follows. The respondent G Manik alleged that in 1983 there was what was known as the "crack down" in Tanzania and many businessmen were in a state of near panic and were selling their properties at give away prices. Manik understood that the farms of the appellant companies were for sale and he saw the 4th and 5th appellants who confirmed that it was true. 4th and 5th appellants told Manik that the total price was 10 million shillings. It was also agreed that Manik was to pay H 2.4 million shillings and the balance of the purchase price was to be paid from the proceeds of the crops grown in the two farms. After the total purchase price had been paid all the shares held in the 1st and 2nd appellant companies as well as all the assets of the two appellant I

A companies were to be transferred to the two respondents in proportions as would be decided by Manik. Only some holy pictures and brass vessels used by the 3rd, 4th and 5th appellants would not be transferred. As a result of the agreement Manik made payment of 2 million 75 thousand shllings to the appellant and was put in possession of B the farms and all the properties therein. That was in October/November, 1983. Manik was proclaimed to the staff and others as the new owner. Manik was also given 50 shares in the Nitin Coffee Estates Ltd. Manik worked the farms and used his own money in maintaining and developing them, and from the proceeds of the crops and coffee, C paid off the balance of the purchase price to the appellants towards the end of 1985.

Manik approached the appellants in early 1986 for the transfer of the shareholding, directorship and the farms to him and his company, but the appellants repudiated the agreement to sell.

D The respondents in March, 1986 filed action against the appellants for specific performance i.e. for the appellants to transfer all their shares in the two limited companies and for the two limited companies to transfer all their assets including the two farms to the respondents and a refund of 10.6 million shillings being the alleged excess payment in E respect of the agreed purchase price and for damages for breach of contract.

The appellants in Court denied that the 4th appellant and the 5th appellant had concluded any agreement of sale as alleged by Manik. They admitted receipt of Shs. 3 million and 75 thousand from the respondents but alleged that it F was in part payment for the 50 share in Nitin Coffee Estate sold by one Anupkumar Ondhia. The appellants alleged that the price for those 50 shares was 2.5 million shillings. They claimed that Manik was given possession of the two farms of the 1st and 2nd appellant companies as a director, and not as owner thereof. Manik was managing G and running the farms and he was paid a director's fee, as most of the shareholders and directors of the two companies were then living outside Tanzania.

Both the 4th and 5th appellants in their statement of defence denied selling their shares to the respondents. Appellant H 4 testified in court to that effect, but appellant 5 did not testify. The appellants claimed that only 50 shares of one Anupkumar Ondhia in Nitin Coffee Estate were sold to the respondents.

In any event the appellants contended that an alleged sale of the farm was unenforceable and of no effect as the I agreement was not in writing and was without the requisite constent.

MUSTAFA JJA, MAKAME JJA AND KISANGA JJA

The appellants in a counterclaim asked the respondents to give an account of their stewardship of the farms with full A accounts.

A number of witnesses were called on both sides in what appeared to have been a rather protracted trial.

The trial judge reviewed and analysed the evidence adduced with care and concluded that the sum of 2 million 75 B thousand shillings paid by Manik was in part payment of the purchase price of the sale of the appellants' farms and "possibly some of the shares". He also held that the putting of Manik into occupation of the farms was in part performance of the agreement to sell. He held that there was an irresistible conclusion of that there was an oral C agreement to sell the two farms of the 1st and 2nd appellant companies as alleged by Manik, although it was uncertain what the prices for them were. He held that because there was part performance of the agreement to sell the two farms, Regulation 3(1) of the Land Regulations 1948 (Cap 113 Supplement 64) would not be applicable D and he concluded that the oral agreement to sell the farms, "in the circumstances of this case" was enforceable.

As regards the 50 shares in Nitin Coffee Estates Limited sold by Anupkumar Ondhia, he considered the conflicting evidence adduced as to the price of the said shares. He concluded that the 50 shares were sold for shs. 125,000/= E and not 2.5 million shillings as contended by the appellants.

As regards the sale of shares by the 5th appellant, the judge held that since the 5th appellant did not testify although he was in court throughout the trial, he believed Manik that the 5th appellant had agreed to sell his shares to the F respondents, that is, 50 shares in Nitin Coffee Estates Limited. The judge stated "On the evidence plaintiff paid for the shares".

In regard to the sale of the shares by the 4th appellant, the judge stated that he preferred the evidence of Manik to G that of appellant 4, and believed Manik that 4th appellant had agreed to sell his shares. And the judge also added "having paid the purchase price in relation thereto."

With regard to the shares of appellant 3, the judge found that the 4th and 5th appellants had no authority to sell the H share of appellant 3, and such an agreement, even if made, was not enforceable against appellant 3.

And so far as the shareholders absent from Tanzania were concerned, the judge was unable to discover that 4th and 5th appellants had any authority to sell their shares. The judge was unable to find any clear and unambiguous I evidence to indicate that

A these absent shareholders had authorised or consented to the sale of their shares by 4th and 5th appellants. He held the agreement concerning these sales were not enforceable.

The judge considered the prayers for specific performance. He was of the opinion that since the sale of the majority B of the shares in the 1st and 2nd appellant companies was unenforceable, it would be "absurd granting the prayer for specific performance in relation to movable and immovable assets of Nitin Coffee Estates Limited and Rafiki Estates Limited."

C He ordered specific performance in respect of the sale of the shares by 4th and 5th appellants to the respondents.

He refused specific performance of the sale of the two farms and awarded damages "diverting the appellants of what they have unjustly benefited."

D He ordered that the appellants jointly and severally refund the respondents as under:

(1) The purchase price under the agreement 10 million shillings;

(2) The sum of shs. 10,608,620/= paid in excess of purchase price;

E (3) An agreed sum of 5 million shillings incurred by respondents in running the two farms from October 1983 to date of filing suit, that is, 5/3/86. A further sum in respect of such expenses be computed and taxed from date of filing suit to date of vacant possession;

F (4) The crops from Nitin Coffee Estate and Rafiki Estate which are in stores awaiting delivery to TCGA to be sold, and the coffee or any other crops to be picked this season from the two farms, belong to the respondents;

(5) General damages at 5 million shillings.

G He also ordered the respondents (in error appellants stated) to give possession a month after payment, within a month of this judgment, of the decretal sum in full. He awarded costs of the suit to the respondents. The judge dismissed the appellants' counterclaim and awarded costs of the counterclaim to the respondents.

H The appellants have appealed from that judgment. The respondents have also appealed. I will treat the respondents' appeal as a cross-appeal.

The appellants' appeal is on the following main grounds:

I (1) The oral agreement to sell the land is unenforceable because of Regulation 3(i) of Land Regulations 1948. The agreement is also illegal because it transgressed the Companies Ordinance Cap. 212 and was without the A approval of the Bank of Tanzania.

(2) The judge erred in holding that appellant 4 and appellant 5 had agreed to sell their shares and in any event such an agreement was void for uncertainty. B

(3) The judge erred in holding that the price for the 50 shares sold by Anupkumar Ondhia was shs. 125,000/= and not 2.5 million shillings.

(4) The judge erred in ordering the refund of the purchase price and the excess amount paid and in awarding C 5 million as general damages.

(5) The judge erred in refusing to order the respondents to give a full account to the appellants since the respondents' accupation of the farms.

The respondents' cross-appeal is on the following grounds: D

(1) The judge erred in holding that the 4th appellant and 5th appellant did not have authority to sell the shares of the absent shareholders, and in failing to order specific performance of the sale of the two farms. E Alternatively,

(2) The judge erred in awarding grossly inadequate damages.

I have perused the evidence on record and have carefully considered the submissions of learned counsel before this F court. I am of the opinion that the trial judge was right in his findings of fact. I am of the view that the 4th appellant and the 5th appellant did, in view of the "crack down" and the state of fear which it generated, want to sell the total shareholding in and all the assets of the 1st and 2nd appellant companies to Manik. I believe that there was an oral G agreement between Manik in his evidence. Manik was put in occupation of the farms as the buyer, not as a director or manager. On the basis of such facts I will now deal with the legal consequences flowing therefrom. H

I have said that the trial judge was correct in his findings of fact. Unfortunately, I cannot say the same about his conclusions in law. I begin with the applicability of Land Regulations 1948 to the oral agreement concerning the sale of the two farms.

I will set out the relevant Land Regulations: I

A "Land Regulations 1948 (Cap.113 - Supplement 64)

3 (1) A disposition of a Right of Occupancy shall not be operative unless it is in writing and until it is approved by the President (later to be Director Land Development Services).

B (2) n.a.

(3) In this regulation "disposition" means -

(a) a conveyance or assignment other than by way of mortgage....

C (b) n.a.

(c) a deed or agreement or declaration of trust binding any party to make such disposition as aforesaid, including a D deed or agreement entitling a party thereto to require any such disposition to be made.

In my view an oral agreement of the type sued on to sell land held under a Right of Occupancy is in-operative and of no effect. There is a long line of authority to that effect. In Patterson and another v Kanji (1956) E.A.C.A. 106 at E 111 the Court of Appeal of East Africa dealing with a similar regulation stated that one cannot seek "to enforce at law which he can only establish by relying on a transaction declared by law to be inoperative". That decision was followed in Patel v Lawrenson [1957] E.A. 9, Kassam v Kassam [1960] E.A. 1042 and in Patel v Marealle F and Another Court of Appeal C.A. 5/84 (unreported).

It seems that the trial judge was persuaded that since the agreement was part performed the need for writing could be dispensed with. But there was still the need for the requisite consent. In England at one stage, in order to prevent G fraud, certain transactions had to be evidenced by writing, otherwise they were of no effect. As a result a number of injustices occurred. To mitigate the harshness of that rule, part performance of an agreement was later held to be sufficient evidence of the transaction, if no writing existed. And that was later incorporated in the Statute of Frauds in H England. The doctrine of part performance cannot help as in Tanzania the regulation in question required both writing and consent.

Mr. Marando for the respondents submitted that there is some confusion on this matter in the High Court. He I referred to a High Court decision Sylveni Mushunga v Theonestina Rwekanika [1974]

LRT n. 30. Mfalila, J. in that case purported to distinguish it from Patterson v Kanji (supra). Mfalila, J. stated: A

I think that Regulation 3 of the Land Regulations 1948 may be abused by unscrupulous sellers. I think that Regulation 3 is applicable only to situations where the President's consent has been sought and refused ... A Contract of sale is not B contemplated by Regulation 3. This regulation refers to dispositions which are define ... to mean conveyances or assignments. A contract of sale is neither of these.

Obviously, Mfalila, J. had overlooked Regulation 3(3) (c) where such a contract is a "disposition". With respect, C that decision of Mfalila, J. was wrong.

Out of courtesy to Mfalila, J. and other judges of his way of thinking perhaps some subsidiary observations may be in order. A Right of Occupancy is something in the nature of a lease and a holder of a right of occupancy occupies D the position of a sort of leasee vis-a-vis the superior landlord. A right of occupancy is for a term, and is held under certain conditions. One of the conditions is that no disposition of the said right can be made without the consent of the superior landlord. There is now no freehold tenure in Tanzania. All land is vested in the Republic. So land held E under a right of occupancy is not a freely disposable or marketable commodity like a motor car. Its disposal is subject to the consent of the superior and paramount landlord as provided for in the relevant Land Regulations. F

Mr. Marando also called our attention to Denning v Edwardes and another [1960] EA 755 (PC), a case originating from Kenya. That case was inter alia, concerned with section 99(3) of the Crown Lands Ordinance of Kenya. In terms of that section an instrument which G purports to effect any of the transaction referred to in 'section (2), that is to sell, lease, sublease, assign, mortgage or otherwise ...', will be void without the Governor's consent. H

However, no consent was required to an agreement for the above transaction as an agreement did not "effect a transaction". However, according to Regulations 3 of the Land Regulations 1948 in Tanzania, an agreement of sale is a "disposition" which requires consent. I

A I am satisfied that the oral agreement concerning the sale of the two farms is inoperative and of no effect, in terms of Regulation 3(1) of Land Regulations 1948.

I will now deal with the sale of shares. I believe that there was an oral agreement by the 4th appellant and 5th B appellant to sell their shares to the respondents. But it is clear that no price was fixed or agreed. The trial judge stated that the sum of shs. 2 million 75 thousand, the initial payment made by Manik, was part payment of the purchase price for the two farms and "possibly some of the shares". I would think that price was one of the C fundamental matters in a sale of individual shares as the ones under consideration. As there was no agreed price and no means of ascertaining such a price there was no agreement, due to uncertainty. I think that the agreement by 4th appellant and 5th appellant to sell their shares was void for uncertainty in terms of section 29 of the Law of Contract D Ordinance Cap. 433.

I agree with the finding of the trial judge that the 50 shares in Nitin Coffee Estates Limited held by Anupkumar Ondhia were sold to the respondents for shs. 125,000. Professor Fimbo for the appellants submitted that Exhibit D4 E and Exhibit P7 - which related to the price of the said shares could not be looked at as they were for internal shareholders only. That submission is totally without merit. On the evidence I agree with the trial judge that the 50 shares of Anupkumar were sold to the respondents for shs. 125,000/=. Professor Fimbo submitted that the sale of the 50 shares to the respondents was illegal as it was made without the permission of the Treasury, in contraventing F of Section 9 of the Exchange Control Ordinance (Cap. 294 Supp. 65). However, there was no evidence that Anupkumar Ondhia was not a resident of Tanzania. No illegality can attach to such a sale in the circumstances.

G Professor Fimbo also referred to section 46 of the Companies Ordinance Cap. 212, which is in part material with section 54 of the U.K. Companies Act, 1948. He quoted several English authorities. Professor Fimbo was concerned with the provision in the agreement of sale that the payment of the balance of the purchase price was to H be obtained from the produce of the two farms of the appellants. The facts in this case differ from the facts in the authorities quoted and in any event no clear indication emerged from Professor Fimbo's laborious efforts on the point.

I At this stage it will be convenient to deal with the cross-appeal concerning the sale of shares of the absent shareholders by appellant 4 and appellant 5. The judge found that there was no evidence that appellant 4 and appellant 5 had authority to sell such shares, nor was there evidence that the absent shareholders A had authorised or consented to such sale. That finding was justified on the evidence adduced. That ground of cross-appeal is dismissed. So is the ground of cross-appeal about specific performance of the sale of the two farms; detailed reasons have already been given. B

The appellants complained about the order of the judge for them to refund the purchase price of 10 million shillings and a further sum of 10,608,629 shillings being payment in excess of the purchase price. In view of the finding that the sale was inoperative and of no effect no purchase price in fact was paid. The two sums were obtained from the C produce of the two farms of the appellant companies. This order of the judge cannot stand.

The appellants complained about the order of the judge that the crops of Nitin Coffee Estate and Rafiki Estate which are in stores awaiting delivery to TCGA and Coffee and other crops to be picked "this season" from the two farms D are the property of the respondents. Similarly this order of the judge cannot stand; all these crops belonged to the appellant companies.

The appellants complained about the award of 5 million shillings as general damages to the respondents. The E respondents on the other hand counterclaimed that, if damages for breach were to be awarded, the sum is too low. The judge had held that the agreement of sale was valid and enforceable, but instead of ordering specific performance, he awarded damages, in the exercise of his discretion, and for the reasons he gave. The appellant's F argument apparently was that since the agreement of sale was unenforceable and void, no breach had occurred, hence no damages should have been awarded for breach of contract. Superficially that argument is attractive. However, on the facts of this case Manik was led to believe that he had entered into a binding contract. At the G invitation of, and on the strength of the appellants representations Manik took over the farms and worked them for about 3 years. For two years before Manik took over, the farms were losing money. Manik by his work and diligence reversed the loss making trend and turned the farms into a profit making venture. He not only maintained H the farms but improved them. The appellant shareholders and directors were mostly away and could not work the farms, and in the state of fear and panic in 1983, they were in the process, probably, of neglecting them. The price agreed, 10 million shillings, was a ridiculously low sum, and that was clear evidence of a sale under distress or I duress. In about three years Manik managed to generate a sum of over 20

MUSTAFA JJA, MAKAME JJA AND KISANGA JJA

A million shillings from the produce of the farms. The judge had awarded damages on the basis of unjust enrichment - divesting the appellants of such enrichment. The farm prosperity was brought about solely by the work and labour of Manik. Manik believed the representations made to him by the appellants and on the basis of that belief worked B and improved the condition of the farms. Manik must be paid for his work and labour and for his contribution to the improved state of the farms.

I believe that the sum of 5 million shillings awarded by the judge was insufficient. I would award the respondents the C sum of 10 million shillings as compensation for the work and labour put into the farms, to the advantage of the appellants.

The cross-appeal has succeeded on this item of damages. The appellants have asked for an order that the respondents should render a full account of their stewardship of the farms during the period they have been in D occupation. I do not think such an order is called for at this stage. When the respondents will hand over possession of the farms to the appellants, an account will have to be taken as to how much the respondents had spent on the farms from the date of the filing of this suit in the High Court to the date of possession. In that process, I should think all the accounts can be dealt with.

E In the result I would allow the appeal to this extent. I would hold:

(1) that the oral agreement of sale was inoperative and of no effect in terms of Regulation 1948;

(2) that the sale of shares by 4th appellant and 5th appellant to the respondents was void for uncertainty and F is to be set aside;

(3) the order for the return of shs. 10 million purchase price and shs. 10,608,620 excess of the purchase price to be set aside. Similarly, the order concerning the crops of the two farms awaiting delivery to G TCGA and coffee and other crops to be picked "this season" to be set aside.

I would dismiss the other grounds of appeal.

H As regards the cross-appeal, I would increase the item of damages from 5 million to 10 million shillings. I would dismiss the other grounds of the cross-appeal.

On payment of Shs. 125,000 by the respondents to Anupkumar Ondhia of his nominee, 50 shares of the said I Anupkumar Ondhia in Nitin Coffee Estate Limited are to be transferred to Manik or his nominee.

The appellants are to pay 5 million shillings being expenses incurred by Manik until the date of the filing of this suit in A the High Court and the sum of 10 million shillings as damages to the respondents. The appellants are also to refund the respondents the initial payment of 2 million 75 thousand shillings made by Manik for the purchase.

The respondents are to vacate the two farms at Oldeani and hand over possession of them to the appellants or their B nominees 30 days from the date of this judgment.

On or before such handing over an account has to be taken of the expenses incurred by the respondents on the said C farms from the date of filing the suit in the High Court to date of possession. Such sum as found due is to be paid by the appellants to the respondents.

As to costs, I would award half the costs of the appeal to the appellants. For the avoidance of doubt such costs are to be taxed on the basis of one counsel only. D

I would make no order for costs of the cross-appeal.

I would not disturb the order for costs made in the High Court.
As the other members of the Court agree, there will be judgment on the terms hereinabove stated. E
Order accordingly.

The suit premises had prior to the occurrence of the dispute been in the occupation of M/s Colin Hood Insurance C (T) Limited, a servicing agent, as tenants of the respondent. The operation of the said servicing agent in Tanzania ceased after the National Insurance Corporation terminated their servicing agency. The said servicing agent then wrote the respondents requesting them to let the appellants occupy part of the suit premises in order to enable the appellants, within a D period up to the end of September, 1975, to assist in the winding up of the business of M/s Colin Hood Insurance (T) Limited. The respondents did not object to the request. The appellants went into occupation of the suit premises from October, 1974. Since then rent for the suit premises was paid by the appellants in their name. All receipts for E rent were issued in the name of the appellants and acknowledged by the respondents. In March, 1981 the appellants asked the respondents for two keys for the main entrance to the suit premises describing themselves as tenants of the respondents and the respondents obliged after being paid 250/= for the same.

F In March, 1982 the respondent served on the appellants three months notice to vacate the suit premises arguing that there was no tenancy agreement between them and the appellants and that the appellant's occupation of the premises was purely on temporary arrangements. In an action by the appellants before the resident magistrate court, G Dar es Salaam, for a declaratory judgment that they were the respondent's lawful tenants, the learned trial Magistrate held that the alleged tenant-landlord relationship was of a temporary nature intended to last after the completion of a specific task, which was to enable the appellants to assist in winding up the activities of the former H tenants, that is M/s Colin Hood Insurance (T) Limited. The trial magistrate further held that the said temporary tenancy had been effectively terminated by the respondent's notice to vacate.

It was common knowledge that there was no expressed tenancy agreement and that the appellants retained I possession after expiry of the specific period granted them to assist in the winding of the affairs of M/s Colin Hood Insurance (T) Limited.

Held: (i) In order for the provisions of the Rent Restriction Act to be applicable two factors must be established first A there must exist a landlord-tenant relationship. The occupation of a premise under some arrangements other than that of a landlord and tenant does not fall under the provisions of the Act. Secondly, the suit premises must be situated within a rent restriction area; B

(ii) the conduct of the respondents has throughout been consistent with the existence of tenancy relationship between the parties. Through their conduct the respondents accepted the appellants as their tenants;

(iii) one of the protections enjoyed by protected tenants is that they can only be evicted from the suit C premises for statutory misconducts as prescribed under the Rent Restriction Act or when the suit premises are required by their landlords for their use and the tenants have been offered alternative accommodation;

(iv) there is nothing like temporary or permanent tenancy in law. Tenancies are either for specific periods, D which may be short or long, or for some undeterminable period with right of termination explicity or impliedly reserved by each party. Since there has been no expressed tenancy agreement the parties are deemed to be in a statutory tenancy as prescribed under section 32(1) of the Rent Restriction Act; E

(v) consequent upon their retaining possession of the suit premises after the end of the specific period during which they were allowed to occupy the suit premises, the appellants became statutory tenants under section 32(1) of the Rent Restriction Act. As statutory tenants they become entitled to the protection of the relevant provisions of the F Rent Restriction Act and to the benefits and rights enjoyed by the former tenants under the original tenancy agreement.

Msumi, J:. This appeal is against the decision of the Resident Magistrate Court, Dar es Salaam. The subject matter H is a house belonging to the respondents. Appellants have been in occupation of the suit premises from October 1974. Before then the said premises were in the occupation of one M/s Colin Hood Insurance (T) Limited (henceforth referred as the former tenants). Before the appellants occupied the premises the former tenants wrote I the

MSUMI J

A respondents requesting them to let the appellants occupy the premise in order to enable them (the appellants), within a period up to the end of September 1975), execute work left pending by the former tenants. The operation of the business of the former tenants in Tanzania ceased after the National Insurance Corporation of Tanzania B terminated their servicing agency. As far as material this is what the letter said:

As you are aware the National Insurance Corporation of Tanzania have terminated the servicing Agency of M/s Colin Hood Insurance (T) Limited but they have requested that we carry on servicing business put through before the 1st of October, C 1974 up to the end of 1975.

In order that we carry out our commitments we have made arrangements with a newly formed company to take over all D forthcoming renewals and new business that previously would have been put through Colin Hood Insurance (T) Limited and for them also to service the business up to the end of September, 1975. In order that the new company, Sykes Insurance E Consultants Limited, can assist my company in servicing these clients and at the same time assist in the winding up of the company it will be necessary for them to occupy part of our office accommodation.

F We would therefore be grateful to have your confirmation that you have no objection to M/s Sykes Insurance Consultants Limited occupying part of our offices in order to carry out this very necessary task where the winding up of Limited Liability Companies are concerned.

G This letter which was tendered as Exh. D1 was accordingly acknowledged receipt and replied by the defendants in a letter dated 5th November 1974 produced in court as Exh. B1. The material portion of the reply says:

H Kindly be advised that we have no objection to M/s Sykes Insurance Consultants to occupy part of your offices provided they follow and abide to our Housing rules.

I Since then rents for the suit premises have been paid by the appellants in his name. All receipts for rents were issued in the name of the appellants. However, by a letter dated 30th March 1982 (produced as Exh. D2) respondents gave the A appellants three months notice to vacate the premises arguing that there is no tenancy agreement between them and the respondents and their occupation of the premises was purely on temporary arrangements. This is what they said:

"Dear Sir, B

RE:NOTICE TO VACATE FROM OFFICE PREMISES ON 3rd FLOOR OF BANK HOUSE BUILDING C

We have learnt that you were allowed by the Bank to occupy the said office premises formerly occupied by M/s Colin Hood Insurances (T) on temporary basis in order for you to finalise the work left by the termination of the latter's services as D Insurance Agent by the National Insurance Corporation late 1974. No formal lease was however prepared for your execution as the whole arrangement was purely a temporary one and you were expected to hand over the premises back to the Bank E immediately you finalised M/s Colin Hood's pending assignments. It has been brought to our knowledge that you are still in possession of the said premises to date. We have now been instructed to give you THREE MONTHS NOTICE from the date hereof, which we hereby do, to vacate the said premises and hand over vacant possession to the Chief Manager Bank F House Branch Dar es Salaam or Chief Manager Administrative Services Dept. in clean tenantable order. Kindly hand over the keys to him/them on or before the expiry of this notice period. Your liability to pay rent shall cease at the expiry of this notice G and any arrears must be paid forthwith.

This notice was followed by another one which required the appellants to vacate the premises immediately. Consequently appellants filed a suit in the Resident Magistrate Court praying for: H

1. Declaratory Order that they are the lawful tenants of the defendants in respect to room 1 - 9, 2nd Floor Bank House Building, Dar es Salaam.

2. Permanent Order of injunction to restrain the defendants from harassing the Plaintiffs. I

MSUMI J

A 3. Payment of the rent into court at the defendants' cost in event of further refusal to accept the same.

4. Cost of this suit.

5. Such further and other reliefs as may be deemed just and proper by this Honourable Court.

B In their written statement of defence, respondents strongly contested the allegation that appellants were legal tenants of the suit premises hence prayed for dismissal of the suit. Before the trial began the parties agreed that there C was only one issue in dispute, namely, whether the plaintiffs/appellants are legal tenants of the suit premises. The learned trial magistrate answered this issue in the affirmative. This is what he said:

..... it is clear in my mind that the plaintiffs were accepted by the defendants as tenants and their relationship can only be D described fairly as a tenant-landlord relationship. In that event therefore I rule that the plaintiffs were lawful tenants of the defendants.

E However, the learned trial magistrate was of the considered view that the alleged tenant-landlord relationship was of a temporary nature intended to last after a completion of a specific purpose which was to enable the appellants to assist in winding up the activities of the former tenants. The learned trial magistrate farther held that the said F temporary tenancy had been effectively terminated by the alleged notice which required the appellants to vacate the suit premises. This appeal is against the said decision of the trial court.

The learned counsel for the appellants submitted five grounds in support of the appeal. In the first ground he argued G that the learned trial magistrate misdirected himself at law by holding that appellants were not protected by the Rent Restriction Act. The remaining grounds are basically supplementary to the first ground. The determination of this appeal thus depends on the merits or demerits of the said first ground of appeal. In order for the provisions of H the Rent Restriction Act to be applicable two factors must be established. First there must exist a landlord- tenant relationship between the parties. An occupation of premises under some arrangements other than that of a landlord and a tenant does not fall under the provisions of the Act. Hence it has been held by this court in K.Y. Juma v Juma I Mwango [1973] LRT n.9 when El-Kindly J. observed, inter alia:

.... The second ground of appeal is more relevant in this appeal as it is the one that controls the first ground of appeal. Do the A provisions, or any of them of the Act apply in this case? As I have said the Act is only applicable where there is a relationship of landlord and tenant .....

As noted earlier, the learned trial magistrate made a specific finding that there is in existence a landlord - tenant B relationship between the respondents and appellants. With respect, I fully agree with him. Respondents' persistent denial that appellants are not legal tenants of the suit premises is unsupported by both facts and law. After they had C let the appellants occupy the suit premises for the period up to the end of September 1974 as requested by the former tenants, respondents, through their conducts, accepted them as their tenants. For example for about nine years respondents have been accepting rents from the appellants and issuing receipts in their name. Furthermore when communicating with appellants, they have been addressing them as the tenants of the suit premises. For D example on 3rd August 1982 respondents wrote to the appellants notifying them of their intention to raise the rent after the suit premises had been inspected by Government valuers. The heading of that notice reads "NOTICE TO INCREASE RENT PROPERTY LEASED TO TENANTS". And after the new rent had been fixed by the Rent E Tribunal, respondents notified the appellants and demanded from them a total of shs. 6,770/= being difference between the new and old rent for the period from 1st March 1983 to 31st December 1983. Appellants paid this F amount and respondents acknowledged receipt of the same. Then there is a letter dated 5th March 1981 written by the appellants to respondents asking for two keys for the main entrance to the suit premises. That letter which was produced by the appellants as Exh. D3, as far as material, reads: G

We are your tenants occupying Room Numbers 1 to 9 on second Floor of Bank House, Independence Avenue, and since most of our staff often work late in the evening we should be most grateful if you would let us have two keys for the main H entrance as soon as possible (emphasis supplied).

Respondents did not cntrovert the truth of the above underlined sentence. That would have been a proper opportunity for the respondents to restate their relationship with the appellants as far as the suit premises are I concerned. But on the contrary, respondents

MSUMI J

A gave the appellants the required two keys after they were paid shs. 250/= for the same. All in all, except for the controversial notice for vacating, the conducts of the respondents have been throughout consistent with the existence of tenancy relationship between the parties.

B The second factor which must exist in order for the provisions of the Act to apply is the situation of the suit premises within the area to which the Act applies; which is technically known as rent restriction area. The whole area within Dar es Salaam city is a rent restriction area as per section 3(1) of the Act. Since it is clear that the parties are C in the relationship of landlord and tenant and the suit premises are within the rent restriction area, the answer as to whether the provisions of the Act are applicable in this case must be in the affirmative form. This means that as tenants, appellants are fully protected by the provisions of the Act. One of such protections is that they can only be D evicted from the suit premises for statutory misconducts as prescribed under the Act or when the premises are required by the respondents for their own use and appellants have been offered alternative accommodation. It would appear the learned trial resident magistrate was aware of these rights hence explains his specific finding that E appellants cannot benefit from the provisions notwithstanding the fact that they are tenants of the suit premises. In coming to this finding the learned trial magistrate argued that the tenancy relationship existed between the parties at any time. With respect this argument is novel both factually and legally. As quite rightly submitted by the learned F counsel for the appellants that there is nothing like temporary or permanent tenancy known in law. Tenancies are either for specific periods, which may be short or long, or for some undeterminable period with right of termination explicitly or impliedly reserved by each party. As for this case, the first understanding was that the tenancy was to G last up to the end of September 1975 when the pending insurance servicing work and the process of winding up of the business of the former tenants would have been completed. But as amply demonstrated earlier, after the end of September 1975 respondents went on to accept the appellants as their tenants. Since there has been no expressed H tenancy agreement, the parties are deemed to be in a statutory tenancy as prescribed under 32(1) of the Act (equal to section 26(1) of the repealed Act) which says:

I .... tenant who, under the provisions of this Act, retains possession of any premises shall so long as he retains possession, observe and be entitled to the benefit of all the terms and conditions of the original contract of tenancy, so far as A the same are consistent with the provisions of this Act....

In this case there has been no dispute from the respondents on the legality of appellants' initial occupation of the suit premises. And there has been no suggestion, and I can find no basis for such suggestion, that the occupation of the B suit premises by the appellants was done contrary to the provisions of this Act. Hence consequent to his retaining possession of the suit premises after the end of September 1975 appellants became statutory tenants under section 32(1) of the Act and accordingly entitled to the protection of the relevant provisions of the Act. And farthermore C appellants are entitled to the benefits and rights enjoyed by the former tenants under the original tenancy agreement.

In their defence respondents are claiming that up to the time when they issued the appellants with notice to vacate D the suit premises, they were of the understanding that the former tenants were still in occupation of the premises. With respect, I don't think that respondents are serious on this claim. They have been corresponding with the E appellants in respect of the suit premises all this time. And as pointed out earlier, appellants, in the letter dated 5th March 1981 addressed to the respondents have lamely argued that appellants have been corresponding with the Bank House Branch as opposed to the Head Office of the respondents' corporation. Again this contention is not F worthy of serious consideration. To my understanding the National Bank of Commerce means and includes all its various branches and institutions. None of these branches enjoys separate legal entity from that of the National Bank of Commerce as a corporation. This means that the acts of these branches are the acts of the corporation as a body. But even if one was to be charitable enough as to accept the respondents' argument, respondents would still be held G bound by the various communications between the so called Bank House Branch and the appellants on the theory of principal/agent relationship. By his conducts, respondents have created reasonable impression to the appellants H that for the purposes of matters pertaining to the tenancy of the suit premises, the Bank House Branch office was their agents. For example, for the whole of this period the said branch office has been collecting rents of the suit premises with acknowledgement of the respondents. And after the Head Office had written the appellants notifying I them of their intention to raise rent, there followed letters

A by the said branch office informing the appellants of the arrangements for valuation of the suit premises, the subsequent new rent and the total arrears of rent being the difference between the old and new rent.

B Lastly, with respect, I appreciate the efforts made by the learned trial magistrate to support his decision to grant respondents vacant possession of the suit premises by citing a couple of court decisions. But with even greater respect, those decisions have no relevancy to the facts of this case. For example in Abdull Azizi v Hadija Salum [1980] TLR 22 my learned brother Mwakasendo, J., as he then was, was considering the right of a landlord to C repossess his premises for his personal use and his obligation to offer the tenant with alternative accommoation. In the present case there had been no specific prayer in the pleadings that respondents needed the suit premises for his own use. The sole ground advanced by them for vacant possession is their claim that appellants are not their tenants. D Hence the learned trial magistrate's finding that defendants have not "attempted to diligently look for an alternative accommodation" is, to be mild, quite extravagant.

In conclusion this appeal succeeds with costs. As per prayers, appellants are declared to be the lawful tenants in the E suit premises and respondents are hereby permanently restrained from harassing them.

The respondent presented his cheque to the appellant bank for collection. The bank credited the customer's account on 18.6.1982. More than a year later the appellant informed the respondent that the cheque was lost in transit and B required it to get a fresh cheque from the drawer. It was not possible to get another cheque from the drawer since he had left the country. The respondent sued the appellant claiming damages for loss of the cheque and compensation for depreciation in value of the shilling due to devaluation of the Tanzania shilling. The High Court C decided in favour of the respondent allowing damages and compensation.

On appeal, the appellant challenged the decision of the High Court arguing that the bank had no duty of care towards the customer in respect of the cheque presented for collection. The amount of compensation in the sum of D shs. 50,000/= for depreciation was attacked as being excessive.

Held: (i) Where a customer deposits a country cheque with a collecting bank and the cheque gets lost, the bank E owes a duty of care to the customer to inform him promptly of such loss so that the customer may take such appropriate steps that might be open to him to avert any or further consequences resulting from such loss;

(ii) that duty exists whether the cheque was lost by the bank itself or by a third party having possession thereof on behalf of the bank; F

(iii) the imposition of such a duty of care will not throw the banking system into disorder or prove socially hazardous;

(iv) the trial judge made the compensation award on a correct principle. He was entitled to take into account G the changes in the purchasing power of money due to depreciation and devaluation of the shilling.

[zJDz]Judgment

Kisanga, Makame and Omar, JJ.A.: This appeal arises from the decision of the High Court (Mwalusanya, J.) allowing a claim for damages by the respondent company against the appellant I

KISANGA JJA, MAKAME JJA AND OMAR JJA

A bank for the loss of a cheque drawn in favour of the respondent company. The High Court awarded shs. 34,500/- being the amount stated on the lost cheque, and a further shs. 50,000/- being compensation for the depreciation in value of the former sum due to devaluation of the Tanzania Shilling.

B The facts of the case were scant, but as far as could be ascertained from the record they may be stated as follows: The Kashozi branch of the appellant bank at Bukoba accepted a country cheque for shs. 34,500/= deposited by the respondent company and credited the respondent's account with the amount of the cheque. The C bank claimed that in the meantime it sent the cheque to its branch upcountry at Ngara, in the same region of Kagera, to be debited against the drawer who maintained an account there. After some 461 days the bank notified the respondent that the cheque was lost while in transit with the post office, and required the respondent to ask the D drawer to issue a fresh cheque of an equal amount. The respondent on the other hand claimed that upon making enquiries, it could not trace the drawer, adding that in any case it was not obliged to look for the drawer but rather it was the obligation of the bank to do so. Whereupon the bank proceeded to debit the respondent's account with the E amount of the cheque, and hence the filing of the suit by the respondent. The High Court found that the bank had been guilty of negligence in failing to notify the respondent promptly of the loss of the cheque.

In this appeal the bank is represented by Mr. J.K. Rutabingwa while the respondent is represented by Mr. J.S. F Rweyemamu. The same advocates had represented the respective parties at the trial in the High Court. In arguing the appeal, Mr. Rutabingwa criticised the trial judge for finding negligence on the part of the bank. He contended that on the evidence the cheque was lost not by the bank but by the post office while in transit from Bukoba to G Ngara, and that in law the bank owed no duty of care to the respondent to promptly report to it the loss of the cheque. On the first limb of counsel's submission, it seems plain in the circumstances of this case that the onus is on H the bank to prove that the cheque was lost not through its own negligence but by the post office. But the only evidence adduced on that point was that of D.W.1, the Kashozi branch manager, to the effect that the cheque was sent to Ngara by registered post No. 936 and that it was lost while in transit. Quite clearly such a bare assertion was I not at all sufficient to prove loss by the post office. No certificate of posting from the post office was produced to support the assertion that the cheque was sent to Ngara by registered mail No. 936, nor did anyone from the post office at Bukoba come to confirm the posting of the A alleged register. On the other hand it could well be that the alleged register containing the cheque was, in fact, posted as alleged and reached Ngara, but no one was called from the Ngara branch to say that the cheque was not duly received there. In the circumstances, therefore, it has not been established that the cheque was lost by the post B office, and in the absence of any other explanation, the bank was rightly found to have lost the cheque through negligence.

Submitting on the second limb on the issue of negligence, learned counsel contended that a collecting banker's C liability in negligence is limited to two situations only, namely: (1) At the time of opening a customer's account when the bank has to exercise care in order to be satisfied as to the character of the customer, and (2) At the time of paying the proceeds of the cheque when the bank must ensure that it does not pay the same to strangers. He D strongly maintained that the liability in negligence of a collecting banker, which is what his client was, has not been extended beyond these limits. The trial judge addressing himself at great length to this aspect of the case, had held that the bank owed a duty of care to the respondent to promptly report to it the loss of the cheque, and that the E bank was in breach of that duty. In coming to that conclusion, the learned judge reviewed a number of decisions from various jurisdictions of the Commonwealth. He cited, among others, the decision of the House of Lords in Anns v Morton London Borough Council [1978] A.C. 728, restating the test to be applied when deciding F whether or not a duty of care arises in a particular situation, and the judgment of the Supreme Court of Nigeria in Agbonmagbe Bank Ltd. v C.F.A.O. [1966] I ALR Comm. 238; (Alan Milner and Susan Abrahams - Modern African Banking Cases 1973 Ed. p. 190) in which it was held that the bank owed its customer a duty of promptly sending him notice of dishonouring of cheques drawn in his favour. The learned judge also stated that he saw no G policy considerations which required that the scope of the duty so imposed on the collecting bank ought to be limited or qualified. For, in his view, such a duty will not throw the banking system into disorder or prove socially hazardous. We think that, the learned judge properly directed himself in the matter. We cannot agree with Mr. H Rutabingwa that the collecting banker's liability in negligence is limited only to the two situations as set out in his submission. We are firmly of the view that where, as in this case, a customer deposits a country cheque with a collecting bank and the cheque gets lost, I

KISANGA JJA, MAKAME JJA AND OMAR JJA

A the bank owes a duty of care to the customer to inform him promptly of such loss so that the customer may take the appropriate steps that might be open to him to avert any or further consequences resulting from such loss. That duty we think, exists whether the cheque was lost by the bank itself or by a third party having possession thereof on B behalf of the bank. Like the trial judge, we are also of the view that the imposition of such a duty of care will not throw the banking system into disorder or prove socially hazardous. On the contrary we think that the imposition of that duty will serve to re-affirm and enhance the confidence of the public in the banking system in as much as it seeks C to ensure a greater degree of security for the customer's money at the bank.

Mr. Rutabingwa further contended that even if the bank had a duty to promptly notify the respondent of the loss of the cheque, the bank was not in breach of that duty. It will be recalled that the bank notified the loss after 461 days D of the issue of the cheque. Counsel claimed that the loss of the cheque was detected only after what he described as the routing slip had travelled all the way from the Bukoba branch to the Central Clearing House in Dar es Salaam, to the Ngara branch, back to the Central Clearing House in Dar es Salaam and then back to the Bukoba branch. He E stated that this long journey took a long time because of the communication problems with Ngara which existed at the time. However, there was not a shred of evidence adduced of any communication problems with Ngara existing at the time. Nor was evidence given of any routing slip showing when it was dispatched from the collecting bank at F Bukoba and when it was received back there. In those circumstances the period of 461 days was clearly an inordinate delay in reporting the loss of the cheque, and the trial judge was perfectly justified to hold the bank liable in negligence.

G In another dimension counsel for the appellant bank took the view that the respondent company was itself to blame in the matter for having neglected to require the drawer of the cheque to issue a fresh cheque in place of the H lost one as provided for under section 69 of the Bills of Exchange Ordinance (Cap. 215). That section provides:

> 69. Where a bill has been lost before it is overdue, the person who was the holder of it may apply to the drawer to give him another bill of the same tenor, giving security to the drawer if required to indemnify him against all persons whatever in case I the bill alleged to have been lost shall be found again.

KISANGA JJA, MAKAME JJA AND OMAR JJA

> If the drawer on request as aforesaid refuses to give such duplicate bill he may be compelled to do so. A Learned counsel contended that at the time the cheque was lost the respondent was the holder of the cheque and that the cheque itself was not overdue. As such, therefore, the respondent was in a position to take the necessary B step in terms of the section to put the situation right. Mr. Rweyemamu for the respondent, however, submitted that at the time the cheque was lost the bank, not the respondent, was the holder of the cheque, and that the cheque itself was long overdue, in which case his client could not validly be expected or be called upon to take any steps in terms C of the section in order to rectify the matter.

The trial judge in his judgment had dealt with the question who was the holder of the cheque, and he came to the conclusion that it was the bank. In the course of dealing with that issue he considered, first, the provisions of section D 27(2) of the Bills of Exchange Ordinance (Cap. 215) which provides that:

(2) Where value has at any time been given for a bill the holder is deemed to be a holder for value as regards the acceptor and all parties to the bill who became parties prior to such time. E

Applying that provision to the facts before him, the learned judge found that the bank had given value for the cheque first by crediting the respondent's account with the amount of the cheque and second by impliedly agreeing that the F respondent could draw against the cheque before the proceeds thereof were received. Mr. Rutabingwa submitted that mere crediting of the respondent's account with the amount of the cheque did not amount to giving value for the cheque. In this respect he referred, inter alia, to the English case of A.L. Underwood Ltd. v Bank of Liverpool G and Martins [1924] 1 K.B. at page 805 where it was held that:

... the mere fact that the bank in their books enter the value of the cheques on the credit side of the account on the day on which they receive the cheques for collection does not without more constitute the bank a holder for value. To constitute value H there must be in such a case a contract between banker and customer, express or implied, that the bank will before receipt of the proceeds honour cheques of the customer drawn against the cheques. Such contract can be established by I course of

A business and may be established by entry in the customers pass book, communicated to the customer and acted upon by him.

B But the point is that in the instant case the trial judge found that the bank did more than just crediting the respondent's account and the question is whether that finding was justified.

It was common ground that the bank had discretion whether or not to credit the respondent's account with the C amount of the uncleared cheque. Then there was the evidence of the branch manager of the appellant bank (D.W.1) to the effect that for a good customer the bank credits the account straightaway on depositing the cheque, but for a bad customer it does not. In this particular case, the witness said, the respondent was a good customer with no problems and so the bank credited its account straightaway with the amount of the cheque. Indeed, the witness D added, the bank had recently given the respondent a loan to develop its business. Such evidence clearly suggests that the bank considered the respondent to be a reliable and creditworthy customer to whom credit facility could be extended without difficulty. Again it was undisputed that after crediting the respondent's account, the bank kept E silent for a whole year while the respondent continued to operate its account. For all that period there was no evidence of any restriction or limitation imposed by the bank on the respondent to make withdrawals against its account to the extent of the uncleared cheque. By keeping silent for so long the bank clearly led the respondent to F believe that all was well and that it could proceed to draw on its account to the extent of the cheque. The view that the bank had given credit to the respondent as aforesaid appears to be confirmed by a letter (Ex.B) which the bank G wrote to the respondent in the course of this matter. The relevant part of that letter reads:

CHEQUE NO. G.027808 OF SHS. 34,500/= DEPOSITED INTO YOUR ACCOUNT 18.6.1982

H On 18.6.1982 you deposited cheque No. 027808 of Shs. 34,500/=. The cheque was drawn by one of your clients from Ngara. It has come to our attention that the cheque got lost on transit. We cannot recover our money from the drawer of the cheque because it is not debited to his account with our Ngara branch. We are intending to debit your account with Shs. 34,500/= on I 1st October, 1983. You are required to obtain a fresh cheque from the drawer and ask him to place stop-payment order with his bankers in Ngara for the lost cheque. A

It would seem to us that the expression "We cannot recover our money from the drawer" is a clear admission that the bank had parted with its money in favour of the respondent, and it was now facing a difficulty in recovering the same. For, it is not possible to talk of recovering something when that thing was not lost or was not parted with in B the first instance.

As stated earlier the trial judge in effect found that the bank had impliedly allowed the respondent to draw against the uncleared cheque in anticipation of the proceeds thereof being received. To that extent the bank had given value C for the cheque, thereby entitling it to have a lien on the cheque. Then he went further and considered the provisions of section 27 (3) of Cap. 215 which says that:

(3) Where the holder of a bill has a lien on it arising either from contract or by implication of law, he is deemed to be a holder D for value to the extent of the sum for which he has a lien.

He found that since the bank had a lien on the cheque to the full amount thereof, then the bank was accordingly E deemed to be the holder for value of the cheque. We think that his reasoning and conclusions were sound. It therefore follows that Mr. Rutabingwa's submission that the respondent was to blame for failing or neglecting to F require the drawer to issue a fresh cheque in terms of section 69 of Cap. 215 must fail because the respondent was not the holder of the cheque at the material time, and so it could not rightly be asked to take the steps as contemplated by that section.

Mr. Rweyemamu's second limb of this submission was that even assuming that the respondent was the holder of the G cheque at the material time, the respondent was not in a position to do anything in terms of section 69 to secure the issuing of a fresh cheque because the drawer of the cheque could no longer be traced, and the cheque itself was long overdue. We find some merit in this submission. P.W.1 in his evidence stated that he tried by letter to contact H the drawer of the cheque but was told that he was out of the country to Arabia. That evidence stood unchallenged. The defence never adduced any evidence to show that the drawer of the cheque never left the country or that he left but returned afterwards. In the circumstances the bank cannot validly complain that the respondent I

KISANGA JJA, MAKAME JJA AND OMAR JJA

A failed or neglected to require the drawer to issue a fresh cheque when it is not established that the drawer himself was available.

On the submission that the cheque was overdue, Mr. Rweyemamu relied on the provisions of section 40 (1) and (3) and section 45 of Cap. 215. Section 40 (1) and (3) provides that:

B 40. (1) Subject to the provisions of this ordinance, when a bill payable after sight is negotiated, the holder must either present it for acceptance or negotiate it within a reasonable time.

(2) ....

C (3) In determining what is a reasonable time within the meaning of this section, regard shall be had to the nature of the bill, the usage of trade with respect to similar bills, and the facts of the particular case. And the relevant part of section D 45 says:

45. Subject to the provisions of this Ordinace a bill must be duly presented for payment if it be not so presented the drawer and endorsers shall be discharged.

E Mr. Rweyemamu submitted that according to these provisions the cheque in the present case ought to have been presented for payment within reasonable time. This, however, was not done and consequently the drawer was thereby discharged. So that even if the respondent was the holder of the cheque at the material time, that would be F of no avail in as much as the cheque was stale then. The difficulty we are facing here is that no evidence whatever was adduced as to what is reasonable time for pesenting the cheque for payment according to the banking practice in Tanzania. Mr. Rweyemamu was of the view that a cheque becomes stale after six months from the date of its G issue. Mr. Rutabingwa, on the other hand, asserted that once a cheque is duly stamped by the collecting bank, it can never became overdue or stale. We do not feel justified to decide this issue purely on the basis of the statements H made from the Bar. We are rather inclined to defer our decision in the matter to a future date when a suitable case comes up in which the necessary evidence shall have been adduced. It should be noted, however, that our decision on this point was not essential for the determination of this appeal. It is clear from the preceding pages of this I judgment that the appeal is disposable on other grounds.

We are therefore unable to uphold Mr. Rutabingwa's submission that the respondent was to blame for failing or A neglecting to take steps under section 69 to require the drawer of the cheque to issue a new cheque. Like the trial judge we find that the bank, and not the respondent, was the holder of the cheque at the time the cheque was reported lost. As such the respondent could not, in terms of section 69, require the drawer of the cheque to issue a B fresh cheque. We also agree with Mr. Rweyemamu's submission that the taking of steps by the respondent under section 69, as submitted by counsel for the appellant bank, appears to have been rendered impracticable by the fact that the drawer of the cheque could no longer be traced as he was said to be away in Arabia. The learned judge, C therefore, was justified in finding against the appellant bank on the basis of negligence, and we can see no reason to interfere.

Mr. Rutabingwa also complained about the part of the award relating to Shs. 50,000.00 and said that there was not D ground on which it was based. In awarding that sum the trial judge took into account the element of depreciation of money due to the devaluation of our shilling. The respondent had been deprived of the use of his money for a period of four years from 1983. At the end of that period his money would fetch less goods because of its E diminished purchasing power. The learned judge, therefore, made the award in order to compensate the respondent such that as far as possible it could be in a position to buy the same amount of goods as it would have bought has it not been deprived of its money. We think that the learned judge made the award on a correct principle. He was F entitled to take into account the changes in the pruchasing power of money due to depreciation and devaluation of the shilling. That was a practical aspect of life which we think it would have been unrealistic to ignore. Although he did not set out any mathematical formula on which he computed the award, we think that the sum of Shs. 50,000.00 was not excessive so as to warrant interference. G

After a careful consideration of the issues involved in this appeal and the engaging arguments by counsel for both sides, we are satisfied that the learned judge properly directed himself on the issues before him and came to the right conclusions. Admittedly the facts as adduced at the trial were most scanty. In the whole case only two witnesses H gave evidence, one for the plaintiff and one for the defendant. Their evidence was very brief, hardly a page each. That was not fair for a case involving issues of this magnitude. However, the trial judge did his very best in the circumstances and, on the evidence before him, his decision cannot be faulted. In the I

A result the appeal fails and it is dismissed with costs.

D The appellant and the complainant were allocated plot numbers 234A and 235A respectively. Both started to develop plot number 235A. That triggered off a serious dispute and each of them referred the matter to the authorities claiming to be declared the true owner of plot no. 235A. The appellant thereafter pulled down the gate to E plot no. 235A which was erected by the complainant.

Chipeta, J.: The appellant, John Chize alias Bahinganyi, was jointly charged with another, who was acquitted, with I the offence of malicious damage to property c/s 326(1) of the Penal Code. The appellant was convicted as charged and sentenced to pay a fine of

CHIPETA J

Shs. 17,000/= or seven months imprisonment. He now appeals. A

The prosecution's evidence is to the following effect, one Taiba alawi Shariff (P.W.6) applied for a plot to construct a building in Kigoma-Ujiji Township. At about the same time, the appellant also applied for one. It would appear that each of them preferred to be allocated a plot in a particular area, that is, the parcel of land lying between B Kigoma Post Office and Kigoma Community Centre where there are two plots.

The Urban Planning Committee of the Town Council approved the two applications. The appellant was then allocated Plot No. 234A following the normal routine of allocating plots seriatim. That was on 20th October, 1987, C (See Exhibit P.3). Next day the appellant paid land rent and other charges for Plot No. 234A.

On 3rd November, 1987, P.W. 6 was allocated the next plot, that is Plot No. 235A, and on 6th November, 1987, she paid land rent and other charges for that Plot. The only difference between the two plots is that Plot No. 234A D faced Kigoma Primary School while Plot No. 235A faces Railways Quarters.

Thereafter it would appear that both P.W.6 and the appellant started developing the same plot, namely, Plot No. 235A, for no apparent reason. E

On his part, the appellant started clearing Plot No. 235A while P.W. 6 fenced off that same plot and fixed a gate at the entrance to the plot. That triggered off a serious dispute between the parties and each of them referred the matter to the authorities claiming to be declared the true owner of Plot No. 235A. F

While this dispute raged on, on 25th April, 1988 the appellant went to the site and found a servant of P.w.6 on Plot No. 235A arranging bricks. After looking around briefly, and without saying a word to that servant the appellant left. Soon thereafter, the appellant returned with a lorry loaded with sand. The appellant and the turnboy then pulled G down the gate to Plot No. 295A and the lorry offloaded the sand onto that plot. That done, the appellant ordered the driver of the lorry to smash the remaining part of the gate. The driver obeyed; he drove the vehicle in reverse gear and smashed the remaining part of the gate using the rear end of the lorry. H

The matter was then reported to police and the appellant was arrested and later charged accordingly. The appellant did not dispute most of these facts. All he said was that he was allocated a plot and later he heard that that plot had been allocated to P.W.6. So he wrote a letter to the authorities to complain. I

The learned trial resident magistrate carefully examined the

CHIPETA J

A evidence and considered the legal issues involved. In the end, he was satisfied that the prosecution had proved its case beyond reasonable doubt in that the defence of bona fide claim of right was not available to the appellant in the circumstances.

B During the hearing of this appeal, Mr. Tendwa, learned senior state attorney, declined to support the conviction. In his submission, the appellant had a bona fide claim of right which was a defence to the charge.

It is certainly the law that if a man, genuinely believing that he has a right to damage the property of another on the C ground that he has a bona fide claim of right, so damages such property, then such person has a defence to a charge of malicious damage to property. It matters not that such belief was unfounded in law. (See Kandege vR., [1968] H.C.D. 398, and Athumani v R. [1967] H.C.D. 147). In order to prove a charge of malicious damage to property, D therefore, it must be proved that the accused wilfully and unlawfully caused the damage. (See Yusufu Hussein v R. [1969] H.C.D. 16)

However, this defence of bona fide claim of right is not available in every conceivable case. This defence, which is embodied in section 9 of the Penal Code, is only available where the claim of right is fairly, honestly and reasonably E held having regard to all the facts and circumstances. |t is, therefore, a question of fact. As Onyiuke, J. stated in the case of D.P.P. v Henry Rwegashamiza, [1973] LRT n.15, at page 63:

F A person who asserts a claim of right must be acting honestly, that is to say, that he honestly believes in the right he asserts. If however, the claim is merely a colourable pretext for a fraudulent act then the alleged claim of right cannot avail him. That is a question of fact.

G With respect, I entirely agree with that statement of principle. In cases of malicious damage to property, therefore, if the alleged claim of right is merely a colourable pretext for a wilful and unlawful act of damaging property, the defence of bona fide claim of right will not be available to such accused person.

H In the instant case, the appellant knew very well that Plot No. 235A was seriously in dispute. He himself took up the matter with as high up as the Minister for Lands, Natural Resources and Tourism. He was also aware that he had been allocated Plot No. 234A while P.W.6 had been allocated Plot No. 235A - the one in dispute, and by his I own admission, he was aware that the gate had been erected by P.W.6. Then there was the conduct of the appellant. Having removed part of the gate to gain ingress, he went on A to smash the remaining part of the gate.

On the facts and circumstances revealed in this case, and with unfeigned respect to the learned senior state attorney, I am of the view that the appellant's alleged claim of right was no more than a colourable pretext for a wilful and B unlawfl act. The defence of bona fide claim of right was not, therefore, available to the appellant.

Accordingly, I hold that the appellant's conviction was rightly deserved.

With regard to the sentence, it was by no means excessive, for the offence attracts a maximum sentence of seven C years imprisonment. In my view the appellant was treated with some leniency in that he was given the option of a fine. The learned magistrate was entitled to give that option by virtue of the provisions of section 97(3) of the Penal Code. Since the sentence of fine requires confirmation by this court under the provisions of section 170(2) (c) of the D Criminal Procedure Act, 1985, the same is hereby confirmed.

In fine this appeal fails and is accordingly dismissed in its entirety. E

The plaintiff was an employee of the Mbeya Regional Trading Co. (R.T.C.) on permanent and pensionable terms. His services were terminated when he was 45 years old. He challenged the termination and the Minister responsible I for Labour ordered his reinstatement.

MROSO J

A The employer refused to reinstate him and chose to pay him statutory compensation. In this suit the plaintiff argued, inter alia, that since he was employed on permanent and pensionable terms termination of services at 45 years of age was premature and he was entitled to damages.

B Held: (i) For an employee to be able to sue successfully for damages for premature termination of employment he has to prove either that he was employed for life or for a period terminating on reaching the age of compulsory retirement. Such terms cannot be implied but must be express;

C (ii) section 73 of the law of Contract Ordinance, Cap. 433 does not import into his contract of employment an implied term that he would be employed until he reached the age of compulsory retirement at 55 years.

2. McClelland v Northern Ireland General Health Services Board [1957] 2 All. E.R. 129

F Mroso, J.: The plaintiff was employed by the Regional Trading Company, Mbeya as an asssitant accountant, with effect from 13th May, 1977 according to a letter of appointment which was tendered by him in evidence. He was confirmed in his employment on permanent and pensionable terms with effect from 14th November, 1977 (See Exhibit P2 dated 21/5/78), and not on 31st May, 1978 as stated by him in his evidence. His services were G terminated on 20th August, 1985 in terms of section 40A of the Security of Employment Act, No. 62 of 1964, as amended by Act No. 1 of 1975. I assume it was meant that he was terminated under the provisions of section 40A H (5) of the Security of Employment Act, 1964. This was after the minister responsible for Labour had earlier ordered his reinstatement under section 40A(3) of the same Act.

He was paid the net salary for 12 months, the statutory compensation, one month's salary in lieu of notice, cash I payment in lieu of arrears of leave - 14 days for 1983, 28 days for 1984 and 28 days for 1985. He was also paid railway bus fare for him and his family to his home district in Kyela and transportation of his personal baggage not exceeding 1500 kgs. Despite those payments he has filed a suit in this court against his former A employers claiming:

"(a)The sum equivalent to the amount of salary that would have accrued to (him) until the expiry of the contract at the compulsory retirement after attaining 55 years of age for the next 10 years which is shs. 316,800/=. B

(c)Salary changes and errears from 20/8/85 upto date interest and costs of the suit.

Two issues arise. The first is whether there existed a contract of service between the plaintiff and the defendant for D the defendant to continue to employ the plaintiff until he reached the age of compulsory retirement at 55 years. Second, whether the plaintiff was entitled to be paid 10 years anticipated employer's contribution towards the Parastatal Pension Fund. E

It is not disputed that the letter of appointment - Exhibit P1 - stipulates some of the terms of the contract of employment. I say "some of the terms of service including leave and medical attention will be in accordance with the Company's regulations, as amended from time to time by circular instructions. I may add that since the defendant F company is a parastatal organisation, the parties were also subject to relevant SCOPO Directives as well as any relevant statutory provisions.

One of the terms of employment stipulated in the letter of appointment is that after confirmation of appointment either G side was entitled to terminate the appointment by giving the other side three months notice, or payment of one month's salary in lieu of notice. In terminating the plaintiff's employment the defendant paid the plaintiff one month's salary in lieu of three month's notice, in confirmity to one of the terms of the contract of employment. Furthermore, H although the Minister responsible for Labour ordered the reinstatement of the plaintiff, the defendant company exercised an option allowed it by Statute - section 40A(5) of the Security of Employment Act, 1964 as amended by Act No. 1 of 1975, to refuse to take back the plaintiff, and paid the statutory compensation. I

A The plaintiff urges that there must be read into his contract of employment with the defendant company an implied term that he was to be employed until he reached the age of 55 years. He cited section 73 of the Law of Contract Ordinance as authority that he is entitled to payment of anticipated salaries for ten years. This is the period between B the age at which he was terminated, which was 45 years, and the age of 55 years at which he would have been compulsorily retired. Let me now discuss briefly whether, in fact, the defendant company had contracted expressly or impliedly, to employ the plaintiff until he attained the age of 55 years.

C I have already referred to the express term of employment in the letter of appointment in which it was stated that either party to the contract could terminate the appointment by giving requisite notice or payment in lieu. I have also referred to section 40A(5) of the Security of Employment Act, 1964, as amended by Act No. 1 of 1975, which D imposes certain onerous obligations on an employer who, despite a ministerial order to reinstate an employee who has been dismissed or terminated, refuses to comply with the order. Those two situations give the employer valid means of effectively terminating the employment of an employee.

E For an employee to be able to sue successfully for damages for premature termination of employment he has to prove either that he was employed for life or for a period terminating on reaching the age of compulsory retirement. Such terms cannot be implied but must be express. As I did in the case of Mbeya Regional Trading Company Ltd F v Byamungu F. Matoka ((DC) CIVIL APPEAL NO. 11 OF 1987) unreported, let me quote from Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd Edition, Vol. 25 at page 520 the following words which I think are also relevant in the case at hand.

G To entitle a servant to sue for damages two conditions must be fulfilled namely:

(1) unless the contract of service is to be construed as a contract of life employment, or as excluding any general power of dismissal on notice the servant must have been engaged for a period fixed or H determinable upon notice, and dismissed before the expiration of the period if fixed, or without requisite notice, as the case may be;

(2) his dismissal must have been wrongful, that is to say, without just cause or excuse on the part of the I master.

MROSO J

In this case I was not referred to any term of the contract of the plaintiff's employment until he reached the age of 55 A years. Also, although the termination might have been wrongful initially, subsequently the defendant company utilised a statutory option in refusing to reinstate him and it had to fulfil near punitive conditions such as the statutory compensation. B

Secton 73 of the law of Contract Ordinance, Cap. 433 relied on by the plaintiff does not import into his contract of employment an implied term that he would be employed until he reached the age of compulsory retirement at 55 years. The section relates to compensation for loss or damage caused by breach of contract. The compensation is C payable for loss or damage which arises naturally "in the usual course of things from such breach, or which the parties knew, when they made the contract, to be likely to result from the breach of it". As already mentioned, the contract of employment between the parties anticipated that at any time either side may terminate the contract by D giving three months notice or payment of one month's salary in place of notice. The plaintiff too could also have left his employment by giving requisite notice or payment in lieu. The defendant would not be entitled to sue him for damages because he had not been working for it up the age of compulsory retirement. E

The second issue is based on the assumption rejected above that there was an implied term in the contract of employment that the plaintiff would be employed by the defendant company until he reached the age of compulsory retirement. Since the plaintiff is not entitled to 10 (ten) years anticipated salaries up to the age of 55 years, equally he F cannot be entitled to the employer's anticipated contribution to the Parastatal Pension Fund, as claimed.

Before I end this judgment let me comment in passing on the implications of the plaintiff having been offered G permanent and pensionable employment by the defendant company.

There is sometimes a misconception that where a person is offered employment on permanent and pensionable terms then that he must be employed for life and must be paid a pension.

Employment is permanent only in the sense that it is not on temporary terms. In saying this I recall the words of Lord H Goddard in the case of McClelland v Northern Ireland General Health Services Board [1957] 2 All E.R. 129

That an advertisement offers a permanent employment does not in my opinion, mean thereby that employment for life is I

MROSO J

A offered. It is an offer, I think, of general as distinct from merely temporary employment, that is, that the person employed would be on the general staff with an expectation that apart from misconduct or inability to perform the duties of his office the employment would continue for an indefinite period. But apart from a special condition, in my opinion, a general employment B is always liable to be determined by reasonable notice.

Nor do I think that because a person is offered pensionable emloyment the employer thereby necessarily engages to retain C the employee in his service long enough to enable him earn a pension.

I am unable, therefore, to follow the ex-parte decision of Mapigano, J. cited to me: Elikana P. Makene v D TAZARA, High Court (Dsm) Civil Case No. 38/1983 (Unreported). In that case the learned judge held that because the employment was permanent and pensionable and the plaintiff had been terminated from his employment eight years "before the expiry of the maximum period stipulated in the contract" there had been a breach of contract E entitling the plaintiff to damages in the form of monthly salary for all the eight years which he would have worked, had he not been prematurely terminated in his employment. Apparently, according to the plaintiff's contract of employment in that case he was to remain in the employment of the defendant company until he attained the age of F sixty years when he would retire with full pension benefits. The case which is before me is different because there was no such term in the contract of servicce. Besides, the case before Mapigano, J. wa, as already mentioned, heard and decided ex-parte.

G For the above reasons, I find that the plaintiff had failed to prove his claims which must be dismissed with costs.

Claims dismissed.

The appellant and respondent were partners. Their partnership was duly registered. The first partnership venture failed to take off. Another venture was agreed and resorted to. This change of venture was not registered as C required by section 11 of the Business Names Ordinance, Cap. 213. When a dispute arose between the partners assistance of the Court was sought. The High Court tried the case. On appeal the Court considered the effect of failure to comply with statutory requirements. D

Nyalali, C.J., Makame and Omar, JJ.A.: The appellant, Florent Rugarabamu, instituted a suit in the High Court at Mwanza for breach of partnership agreement and seeking various reliefs, including dissolution and winding up of the partnership, restitution of partnership assets, the taking of partnership accounts, the appointment of a receiver H and manager and declaratory orders. The appellant was unsuccessful for much of his claim but was awarded a sum of shs. 500,000/- as damages. He was aggrieved by the decision of the High Court, Mwalusanya, J. hence this I appeal to this court. Mr. Rutabingwa, learned counsel from the Tanzania Legal

NYALALI CJ, MAKAME JJA AND OMAR JJA

A Corporation, appeared for the appellant before us, whereas Mr. Rweyemamu, learned advocate, represented the respondent. Eight grounds of appeal were submitted in the memorandum of appeal.

From the proceedings both in this Court and the trial court, the following primary matters are not in dispute between B the parties. Sometime in the first quarter of 1982 a partnership business firm was established under the business name of H. & F. Enterprises. The firm was duly registered under the Business Names (Registration) Ordinance Cap. 213. The Respondent was one of the partners.

C The registered business or venture was that of grain milling. It is common ground that this business or venture failed to take off and a new business or venture was launched, concerning the purchase and sale of foodstuffs. This latter venture proved very successful. Overdraft bank facilities were extended to the partnership and a tipper lorry D was hire-purchased by the partnership.

It is apparent from the proceedings both in this Court and the court below that the following primary matters are in dispute between the parties. It is the appellant's case that he was the other partner in the firm and that the E respondent was a managing partner. It is part of the appellant's case, that after the collapse of the grain milling venture, the partnership launched a new venture, that is, the business for the purchase and sale of foodstuffs. The respondent, however, subsequently mismanaged the firm by, inter alia, misappropriating and fraudulently converting F to his personal use some money and assets of the partnership. The respondent's case on the other hand is that the appellant has never been a partner in the firm ad that it was the appellant's father, namely, Fabian S. Mwebesa (P.W.4) who joined the respondent in establishing the firm. It is part of the respondent's case that after the grain milling business had failed to take off the respondent alone launched the foodstuffs business with liberty to Mr. G Mwebesa to join later if he so wished. The said Mwebesa however never joined in the new venture.

H The first important point for consideration and decision in this case is what effect in law did the collapse of the first venture have on the partnership? The learned trial judge specifically considered the point and held that the failure of the grain milling business terminated the partnership by virtue of the provisions of section 212(11)(b) of the Law of I Contract Ordinance, Cap. 433 which states:

NYALALI CJ, MAKAME JJA AND OMAR JJA

(1) Subject to any agreement between the partners, a partnership is dissolved: A

(a) (Not relavant)

(b) If entered into for a single adventure of undertaking, by the termination of that venture or undertaking;

(c) ... (Not relevant). B

Mr. Rutabingwa has challenged the finding of the trial court on this point basically on two fronts: Firstly, he has C submitted that even if the partnership was for a single venture, the partnership could not have terminated since there was an agreement by the partners to start a new venture under the partnership. Secondly, the partnership was multi-business, right from the beginning.

Let us examine each of these submissions on merits. Since the partnership in question was registered under the D Business Names Ordinance, it is obvious that any agreement to change its venture had the effect of altering the particulars registered under section 6 of the Ordinance and would, for that reason fall within the scope of section 11 of the Ordinance which requires such changes to be registered. The consequences of failure to register such changes are stipulated under section 13 and 15 of the same Ordinance. Section 13 provides for penalties, whereas section E 15 provides for disability to enforce "by action or other legal proceedings whether in the business name or otherwise". We shall have to consider the effect of section 15 to this case at the end of this judgment. For the moment, we turn to the second from of Mr. Rutabingwa's submission concerning the firm being multi-business. F

With due respect to learned Counsel for the appellant, we do not think that a firm which registers itself for a single venture under the Business Names Ordinance can lawfully exist and operate in respect of more than the registered single venture. If that was possible, the ordinance would be meaningless. The question however arises whether the G learned trial judge was correct in finding that the partnership terminated upon the failure of their milling business. With due respect to the learned judge, we think that he failed to appreciate the evidence which showed beyond H doubt that the respondent continued to act as a partner and in furtherance of the criminal partnership of H. & F. Enterprises in the foodstuff business right up to the time when this case was instituted. For instance, he continued to operate the partnership bank account, he obtained bank overdraft facilities on behalf of the partnership firm and he I hire-purchased the tipper lorry for and on behalf of the same firm. The

A other party reciprocated by taking no action to close the partnership bank account. This conduct on the part of the partners shows that there was at least an implied agreement or understanding by the partners to launch the foodstuff venture under the partnership. But since the partnership was registered, this change effected by agreement B of the partners required compliance with the provisions of section 11 as already mentioned.

The next important point for consideration and decision concerns the consequences stated under section 15. In short that section disables a defaulter from getting assistance from the courts. This disability is a restatement of the C common law doctrine expressed in the Latin maxim, "Ex Turpi Causa Non Oritur Actio". The partnership has been tainted by the illegality arising from the failure to comply with the requirements of section 11. No one therefore, who claims to be a partner, can enforce a right under this tainted partnership. Since this contract of partnership is D thus unenforceable, we have found it unnecessary to decide the other issues that have been canvassed in this case.

In the final analysis, we agree with Mr. Rweyemamu that the trial court was wrong in awarding damages to the E appellant, since to do so is to act contrary to section 15 above mentioned. It follows therefore, but for different reasons from those used by the trial court, that this appeal must be dismissed in its entirety and the order awarding damages be set aside with costs and we order accordingly.

F Appeal dismissed.

Lyimo for the respondent

[zJDz]Judgment

Nyalali, C.J., Makame and Omar, JJ.A.: The appellant Athumani Hussein, was jointly charged in the Economic Crimes Court, at Shinyanga, with one Halfani s/o Luziga, alias Makambi Luziga alisa Masanja s/o Mahona, for the F offence of Cattle theft, contrary to sections 56(1) and 59(2) of the Economic Crimes Control Act, 1984, read together with paragraph 12 of the First Schedule to the same Act. The other person was acquitted but the appellant was convicted as charged and was sentenced to the maximum term of imprisonment prescibed for the offence, that is, fifteen (15) years. He was aggrieved by the conviction and sentence, hence this appeal to this Court. He G appeared in person to argue his appeal, whereas the respondent Republic was represented by Mr. Lyimo, learned Principal State Attorney. Six grounds of appeal were submitted by the appellant but they all boil down to one H essential ground to the effect that the evidence adduced by the prosecution did not establish the guilt of the appellant beyond reasonable doubt.

From the proceedings both in this Court and the court below the following primary matters are not at all in dispute I between the parties:

NYALALI CJ, MAKAME JJA AND OMAR JJA

A On the 25th February, 1985, twenty right head of cattle belonging to Everist Lubangula (P.W.1) and Mtawazi Mbaya (F.W.4) were stolen at gun point at Kipalapala, Tabora District, while being looked after on pasture by P.W.4's son, that is, Simon Mtawazi (P.W.3). Two days later, that is, on the 27th February, 1986, a stock B movement permit was issued in the name of Masanja s/o Mahona of Mabama village. It is common ground that both the appellant and the person who was acquitted were at the material time residents of Mabama village. The latter was known by the name of Masanja s/o Mahona. Five days later after the theft of the cattle, that is, on the 2nd C March, 1986, the stolen cattle were sold to Mashauri Shoroma (P.W.2) at Urambo, Urambo District in Tabora

Region. Thereafter, P.W.2 assisted by one Charles Buyunge, drove the cattle to Nguruka in Kigoma district, where they arrived on 9th March, 1986. There the cattle were resold to Joseph Msumbi (P.W.5) and one Iddi Kukobela. D Thereafter on the 3rd April, 1986, the cattle owners, that is, P.W.1 and P.W.4 found 10 of the stolen cattle in the cattle-kraal of Iddi Kukobela. While they were in the process of alerting the police, five of them were slaughtered in the course of the former's butchery business at Nguruka. The remaining 5 head of cattle were in so poor a state that they were not worth recovering by the owners. It is common ground that on 15th April, 1986, the appellant was E spotted near a bus stand in Tabora township and was apprehended by the police. It is undisputed that he was apprehended after being pointed out by P.W.2 who had been searching for him ever since the stolen cattle were traced to Nguruka. Furthermore, it is common ground that after his arrest, the appellant made a statement to the F police in which he admitted being in possession of the stolen cattle on 26th February, 1986, later disposing them to P.W.2. He promised to refund the stolen cattle and for that purpose he took the police to his parents' homestand in Mabama village in Tabora district. His parents refused to oblige. On the 19th April, 1986, appellant was taken G before a Primary Court magistrate, that is, Ashura Hamis (P.W. 7) to whom he made an extra-judicial statement reiterating what he had stated to the police. Subsequently, he was taken to court and charged.

H It is apparent from the proceedings, both in this Court and the court below, that the following matters are in dispute between the parties: It is the prosecution case that the appellant was one of the three persons who stole the cattle at gun-point and he later fraudulently obtained a stock theft movement permit to enable him take the cattle I away from the district where he had stolen them. On the other hand, the defence case of the appellant is a general denial of the prosecution case and an assertion that A after his arrest he was assaulted by the police into making an incriminating statement which he later reiterated before the Primary Court magistrate.

The basic issue in this case is whether the appellant was involved in stealing the cattle in question. The prosecution B relies on three pieces of evidence. Firstly, there is the testimony of the herdsboy (P.W.3) who was looking after the cattle. It was in broad daylight and he was certain that it was the appellant who held the gun and held him in restraint while his accomplices drove away the cattle to a safe distance before he released the boy and followed his accomplices. The appellant claims that the evidence of P.W.3 cannot be relied upon as he was too young. We do C not agree with him. P.W.3 was 13 years at the time and was sufficiently mature to be trusted by his parents to take out cattle to pasture and guard them. We are satisfied that we can also rely on him to tell the truth. D

The second piece of evidence is that of P.W.2 to whom the appellant sold the cattle. We are aware that his evidence has to be treated with caution, since it is apparent that he has an interest to serve on account of being one of the suspects. The evidence of P.W.3 however corroborates that of P.W.2. E

The third piece of evidence is the extra-judicial statement made by the appellant to the Primary Court magistrate (P.W.7). Although the appellant submits that his was just a reiteration of the admission allegedly exterted from him at police station, Tabora, we are satisfied that, even if there was such prior extertion, P.W.7 succeeded to reassure F the appellant that he was a free agent at the time he made this later statement. In that statement, the appellant admitted being in possession of the stolen cattle a day after they were stolen. That admission alone would suffice to convict him under the well known doctrine of recent possession. When that admission is taken together with the evidence of P.W.2 and P.W.3, no reasonable tribunal can come to any other conclusion except that the appellant G took part in theft of the cattle concerned. He was thus properly convicted.

As to the sentence of 15 years' imprisonment, we agree with the appellant that it is a severe sentence since it is the maximum prescribed by law for the offence. We have, however, to ask ourselves whether it is not merited in the H present case. In answering this question, we take into account the factors considered by the trial court - that is - the appellant used a gun in committing the offence. The use of a gun raises the presumption that the appellant and his I colleagues were prepared to kill in order to steal the cattle.

A The other consideration is the prevalence of cattle rustling in the area involved. We take judicial notice of the fact that such prevalence has made the inhabitants of Tabora district feel so insecure that they have resorted to vigilante activity known as 'Sungusungu' for their own protection. By imposing severe sentences, whenever the occasion B arises, the courts will re-assure those inhabitants that the State is prepared and willing to protect them provided witnesses come forth and testify.

The last consideration is the fact that so many cattle were stolen by the appellant and his accomplices. None has C really been recovered and the appellant ought to be deprived of the opportunity to enjoy the money, totalling shs. 88,000/- which he got by selling the cattle to P.W.2. This deprivation is better achieved by keeping the appellant in jail for many years to come. For all these reasons we cannot interfere with the sentence.

D In the final analysis therefore, this appeal must be dismissed in its entirety and we order accordingly.

Appeal dismissed.

Tarimo, for the Appellant.
[zJDz]Judgment
Maina, J.: The respondent, Ali Ramadhani Kunyamale, successfully sued the appellant, H.J. Stanley & Sons C Limited, at the Bagamoyo
District Court, for a piece of land. The appellant was dissatisfied and he has appealed to this court. D
At the commencement of the hearing of the appeal, the appellant raised one point and that is that as the memorandum of appeal was not accompanied by a copy of the decree the appeal should be dismissed. Apparently, the appellant made the submission under Order 39 Rule I(1) of the Civil Procedure Code which provides as follows: E
Every appeal shall be preferred in the form of memorandum signed by the appellant or his advocate and presented to the High Court (hereinafter in this Order referred to as "the Court") or to such officer as it appoints in this behalf. The F memorandum of appeal shall be accompanied by a copy of the decree appealed from and (unless the Court dispenses therewith) of the judgment on which it is founded. G
The requirement that a memorandum of appeal be accompanied by a copy of the decree is mandatory. That is clear from the above provision of the law. Mr. Tarimo said that he did not get the copy of the decree and so he thought he would have to wait for too long to obtain a copy of the decree. So he filed the apeal without attaching a copy of the H decree with the memorandum of appeal. As I have said, it is mandatory that a memorandum of appeal be accompanied by a copy of the decree. In the case of Stanley Kalawa Mariki v Chihiyo Kwisiya w/o Nderingo Ngomuo [1981] TLR 143 the Court of Appeal cited the above provision of the Civil Procedure Code and said as follows: I
A The combined effect of these provisions, in so far as is applicable to the present case is that on appeal from an order of the Court, the memorandum of appeal shall be accompanied by a copy of the order appealed from. But the memorandum of appeal in the instant case was not so accompanied. The established practice of our courts has been that where a B memorandum of appeal is not accompanied by a copy of the order appealed from, this renders the appeal incompetent. On that ground, the purported appeal in the present case ought to have been dismissed accordingly.

C This court is bound to follow the decision of the Court of Appeal. In the present case, like in the Stanley Kalawa case, no copy of decree accompanied the memorandum of appeal. That is a clear non-compliance with Order 39 Rule 1(1) of the Civil Procedure Code. Those provisions are mandatory as the court of Appeal said. As this court D said in Konak Ltd v Kooverji [1967] EA 348 where a memorandum of appeal is not accompanied by a copy of the decree, there is no legal presentation of the appeal at all and so the appeal is incompetent and should be dismissed.

E Having found that the appeal is incompetent, I do not find it necessary to go into the grounds of appeal raised by Mr. Tarimo for the appellant.

Appeal dismissed.

The court reserved its decision until 22nd June, 1988 when it granted the petition on certain conditions of bail. The Director of Public Prosecutions was aggrieved by the decision of the High Court hence this appeal to this Court. Mr. Teemba, learned Principal State Attorney, appeared for the appellant, H whereas Mr. D'Souza, learned advocate represented the respondents in the appeal.

Four grounds of appeal were submitted on behalf of the D.P.P. but they all raise one basic question, that is, whether the High Court, Mwakibete, J. was correct in entertaining and granting the petition. There are two aspects of this I question, the first concerns the competency of the application heard by Mwakibete, J. and the other relates to the correctness of the decision on A that application. We start with the second aspect.

As already mentioned, the Director of Public Prosecutions had filed a Certificate objecting to bail under the provisions of section 148(4) of the Criminal Procedure Act 1985. Undoubtedly, the Criminal Procedure Act applies B to bail applications in the High Court in economic and organized crime cases by virtue of the provisions of section 28 of the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act, 1984 except to the extent that it is provided to the contrary under the latter Act. On that basis, the Director of Public Prosecutions hereinafter called the D.P.P. is entitled under C section 148(4) of the Criminal Procedure Act to file a certificate of objection against the release on bail of an adduced person by the High Court. In the present case the D.P.P did exactly that. Section 148(4) states: D

> Notwithstanding anything in this section contained no person shall, for such period as the court shall consider necessary in the circumstances of the case concerned, be admitted to bail, either pending trial or pending appeal, if the Director of Public E Prosecutions certifies in writing that it is likely that the safety or interests of the Republic would thereby be prejudiced.

Mwakibete, J. specifically considered the effect of the certificate filed by the D.P.P. under the circumstances of this case, the respondents had not yet been committed for trial by the Economic Crimes Court under the provisions of F section 30 fo the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act, and their case was still under investigation and inquiry in the District Court as provided under section 29 of the same Act. The learned trial judge stated in the relevant parts of his ruling as follows: G

> Yet the case against the applications appears not ready for trial, for the applicants/accused have not even been committed for trial by the Court - which means that the question of the applicants awaiting trial or appeal in terms of section 148(4) H C.P.A. does not arise.... But until committed for trial, or until the filing of the information, there can be no question of the applicants in matter awaiting trial.

I suspect that the D.P.P. was under the impression that the applicants/accused had already been committed for trial or I

NYALALI CJ

A that by the time the certificate reached Arusha from Dar es Salaam, committal process would have been completed otherwise I can not see how the applicants could be said to be awaiting trial or appeal when the matter is still at its preliminary stages with the R/M's Court. Accordingly I find myself unable to see the relevance/significance of the certificate B vis-a-vis this application.

The learned judge continued towards the end of his ruling by stating:

C ... and if I were to treat the certificate by the D.P.P. as properly filed I would have pointed out that - there was need on the part of the prosecution to spell out, to the satisfaction of the Court, precisely what interests of the United Republic would thereby be prejudiced if the applicants in this matter were to be released on bail - to enable the court to determine a reasonable D period in terms of section 148(4) C.P.A., in the circumstances of this case.

Mr. Teemba has vigorously challenged these views and findings of law by the learned trial judge. He submitted in E effect that a trial is construed to be pending against an accused person whenever that person appears in court and the appropriate charges are put to him. He was however unable to cite to us any authority in support of his stand. As to the other limb of the learned judge's views on the contents of the certificate, Mr. Teemba submitted in effect that F the words used in the relevant statute are so clear that there is no room for requiring the D.P.P. to specify in the certificate the nature of the interests of the United Republic that are liable to be prejudiced by granting bail. He G based his submission on the established rules of construction of statutes.

Mr. D'Souza for the respondents supported the views and findings of the court below. Let us start with the last limb of the submissions. We agree with Mr. Teemba's contention. The words of section 148(4) given their ordinary H meaning according to the established rules of construction are so clear that they do not require the D.P.P. to specify or disclose the nature of the interest concerned. In our considered opinion, it is sufficient if the D.P.P. "certifies in writing that it is likely that the safety or interests of the United Republic would thereby be prejudiced". The learned I trial judge was of the view that specifity in the nature of interest or safety concerned is necessary to enable the Court to determine the reasonable period within which bail is to be denied. With due respect to the learned judge he appears to have confused two issues A which ought to be treated and decided separately. Firstly, there is the issue of validity of the D.P.P.'s certificate. This is governed by the following conditions:

(i) The D.P.P. must certify in writing and B

(ii) The certificate must be to the effect that the safety or interests of the United Republic are likely to be prejudiced by granting bail in the case; and

(iii) The certificate must relate to a criminal case either pending trial or pending appeal. C

Secondly, there is the issue of the period during which an accused person is not to be released on bail. In the terms of section 148(4) the period is determined by the court upon the criteria stated therein, that is, "such period as the D court shall consider necessary in the circumstances of the case concerned". It is wrong in our view to construe these provisions narrowly so as to limit the circumstance of a case to the interests or safety of the United Republic referred to in the D.P.P.'s certificate. Such interests or safety may often be relevant circumstances, in which case details of it E will be given to the court in the course of determining the period necessary for denial of bail, but they are not supposed to be the only circumstances which the court has to consider.

Let us now turn to the first limb of the submissions - that is concerning the timing of the D.P.P.'s certificate. We start F by asking ourselves "what do the expressions 'pending trial' or 'pending appeal' mean in terms of section 148(4) of the Criminal Procedure Act?" Mr. Teemba cited similar provisions under section 35(2) of the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act, 1984 and section 19 of the National Security Act, 1970. Unfortunately none of these G Acts defines what a pending trial or pending appeal is. We had to do our own research after hearing the appeal on the 15th November, 1988 and this explains the delay in delivering this judgment.

Our research has shown that the expressions "pending trial" or "pending appeal" have a special legal meaning which H is different from their ordinary meaning. These expressions do not mean 'awaiting trial' or 'awaiting appeal' as used by the learned trial judge. According to ... (2nd Edition, Vol. 2, page 1344): "An action, arbitration or other I proceeding is said to be pendent after it has been commenced and before the final judgment or award has been

A given. Pendency is the state of being pendent". This definition is similar to that used in India where our procedural law has its precursor. In the case of Asgarali Nazarali State of Bombay (1957) ATR S . P.503, it was stated, ... a legal proceeding is pending as soon as commenced and until it is concluded i.e. so long as the court having original B cognizance of it can make an order on the matters in issue, or to be dealt with therein".

On the basis of this authority which we accept as correct, we thus find that a trial or appeal is pending in terms of section 148(4) of the Criminal Procedure Act as soon as the trial or the appeal has commenced according to law. C But then the question arises - when does a trial or appeal commence according to law? In our considered opinion, a trial commences when an accused person appears before a court or tribunal competent to convict or acquit him and after he has been put on trial by informing him of the charge and requiring him to plead. We are supported by D authority for this view. According to Somoni's Code of Criminal Procedure 13th Edition at p.22-23 it is stated:

In a case exclusively triable by a court of Session, the trial begins only when after the commitment and the charge is framed E and the accused appears at the session.

In our view a trial does not commence when an accused person appears before a tribunal or court which is not F competent to try him or when he appears before a competent tribunal or court but is not called upon to plead to the charge facing him.

In the case of an appeal, the position is slightly different from a trial, because under our procedural law, the physical G participation of an accused person is fundamental to a trial, whereas in an appeal his physical participation is not a basic element of the appellate process which relies heavily on the record of the proceedings of the lower court. That is why there is provision for summary disposal of an appeal without appearance by either party to the appeal (see section 364 of the Criminal Procedure Act). So in the case of an appeal, it commences, and therefore becomes H pending after the filing of prescribed documents, usually the Notice of Appeal and the Petition of Appeal (see sections 361 and 362 of the Criminal Procedure Act).

In the present case therefore, where the respondents appeared before the District Court of Arusha District, which I was not competent to try the economic crime case in terms of section 29 and 30 of the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act, 1984, the trial had not commenced at the time the A D.P.P. filed his certificate objecting to bail. In otherwords, the certificate was premature.

To that extent we concur with the conclusion of the learned trial judge on this point. If the Legislature wishes to enable the D.P.P. to file such certificate even before the commencement of a trial, a suitable amendment of the B relevant law is necessary.

We now come to the issue of the competency of the High Court, Mwakibete, J. to entertain the second bail application. There are two aspects of this issue, the first one concerns the proper forum for deciding the bail C application, and the second one, relates to the principle of functus officio.

We start with the first aspect. Mr. Teemba has submitted that the High Court was not the proper forum to hear the bail application in terms of section 29(4) of the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act as amended by Act No. 12 of 1987. That section states: D

> After the accused has been addressed as required by sub-section (3) the magistrate shall, before ordering that he be held in remand prison where bail is not petitioned for or is not granted, explain and, for the purposes of this section the power to E hear bail applications and grant bail-
> (a) between the arrest and the committal of an accused person for trial by the Court, is hereby vested in the district court F and the court of a resident magistrate if the value of any of the property involved in the offence charged is less than ten million shillings;
>
> (b) after committal of the accused for trial but before commencement of the trial before the Court, is hereby vested in the High Court; G
> (c) after the trial has commenced before the Court, is hereby vested in the Court;

(d) in all cases where the value of any property involved in the offence charged in ten million shillings or more at any stage before commencement of the trial before the Court is hereby vested in the High Court. H

Mr. Teemba has submitted that according to the citation in the title of the proceedings and the subsequent ruling of Mwakibete, J., the application was filed in the economic crimes jurisdiction of the High Court and not in the ordinary I jurisdiction of the High Court.

NYALALI CJ

A That being the position, the matter which concerned property valued at shs. 18,000,000/= was filed and decided in the wrong forum.

Undoubtedly, the relevant caption reads as follows:

IN THE HIGH COURT OF TANZANIA AT ARUSHA

B ECONOMIC CRIMES JURISDICTION

MISC. CAUSE NO. 101 OF 1988

ORIGINAL ARUSHA DISTRICT COURT

CRIMINAL CASE NO. 29 OF 1988.

C Admittedly, this caption suggests, when account is taken of the provisions of Rules 4 and 8 of the High Court Rules, 1984, Cap. 453 (GN. 23 of 25/1/85) that the bail application was filed in the wrong section of the High Court registry. The record of the proceedings however shows that when the application came up for hearing, it was D heard by the High Court exercising its ordinary jurisdiction. The earlier formal irregularity was therefore cured by the High Court properly constituting itself. We are satisfied therefore that the bail application was entertained by the proper forum.

E As to the other aspect of the issue - that is the question concerning the High Court being functus officio after the decision of Chua, J., we are satisfied that the second bail application before Mwakibete, J. was incompetent for the following reasons. In the earlier ruling by Chua, J., the High Court, concluded with the following words:

F In this case I rule that the release of the applicant on bail in the face of the objections raised is not in the best interests of justice in the case.

G We have asked ourselves, what were those objections raised and upheld by Chua, J.? Mwakibete, J. was aware of them and he reproduced them as under:

1. That the charge being a serious one involving ivory great monetary value is likely to attract a severe H punishment in the event of the applicant being found guilty. That being the case the applicant is likely to find means to avoiding justice, including absconding.

I 2. That the applicant being non-Tanzanian may be tempted to flee even if his passport is impounded.

NYALALI CJ

3. That the release of the applicant at this stage when investigation is not completed may mean that the A police will be hampered in their efforts to not other persons who are alleged to have participated in the commission of the offence.

Looked at in their essence, they boil down to two grounds upon which Chua, J. rejected the application for bail - B that is - firstly, that the applicants were likely to abscond because of the severity of the possible sentence and because they were foreigners; secondly that the applicants were likely to interfere with the investigations at that early stage of the case. In law, either one of these grounds is a sufficient cause for refusing bail. The first ground, as it was C conceded by Mr. D'Souza, is a static one - it could not change with the passing of time. The other one is variable and open to change of circumstances as time passed. If the latter ground was the only ground for refusing the D application, the High Court's jurisdiction would not have been exhausted by the decision of Chua, J. But in the light of the other static ground which by itself provides a sufficient barrier to a subsequent grant of bail, unless overturned by a higher court, it is obvious that the High Court was not competent to do what Mwakibete, J. did on the 22nd E June, 1988. For this reason, we are bound to allow the appeal by the D.P.P.

Before we do so however, we must deal briefly with two other related matters. First, we would like to emphasise for the avoidance of doubt and for guidance of the courts below, that where a bail application is rejected by a judge F or magistrate and a subsequent application is made to the same court, the proper practice is to bring the subsequent application before the same judge or magistrate, unless it is impracticable so to do. This will help such court to keep within its competency. Second, we note that Mwakibete, J. in granting bail in this case, took also into G account the health condition of one of the applicants, who was said to be an asthmatic case. We do not think that it is correct in principle to grant bail on that basis, since a disease like asthma can be cared for even when the patient is under remand custody in accordance with the normal remand prison regulations. H

Having said this, we now hereby allow the appeal, quash the decision of Mwakibete, J. and restore the decision of Chua, J.

Appeal allowed. I

[zJDz]Judgment

H Kisanga, Mustafa and Makame, JJ.A.: The first appellant Wayani Langoi is the husband of the second appellant. The first appellant entered into a written agreement with the respondent for the sale of land, with a building thereon, which is held under a Right of Occupancy by the second appellant. Pursuant to the agreement, the I respondent duly paid the purchase price, but the first appellant failed to hand over the property to him, hence the filing of this suit. The first appellant claimed that A he had concluded the agreement in the hope that his wife, the second appellant, would ratify it, but then she did not. The second appellant, on the other hand, asserted that she was never aware of the agreement to sell her land, nor was she ever consulted, by the first appellant about it. The trial judge found that the first appellant concluded the sale agreement as an agent for the second appellant and that the second appellant was well aware of the sale. B Accordingly he decreed specific performance in the following terms:

KISANGA JJA, MUSTAFA JJA AND MAKAME JJA

The state of affairs demand that the defendants (present appellants) do all acts, on their part, to transfer ownership of the C property in question to the plaintiff (present respondent), in terms of para 4 of the sale agreement. They are so ordered.

There was also an order of compensation for Shs. 10,000/= against the appellants for withholding the certificate of D occupany i.e. for failing to transfer the property to the respondent. The appellants have now appealed through their advocate, Mr. J.C. D'Souza, while Mr. F.B. Mahatane for the respondent resisted the appeal.

Mr. D'Souza filed a total of eight grounds of appeal. Ground No. 5 of his memorandum of appeal reads: E

5. The High Court erred in law in ordering specific performance of an agreement inoperative for want of requisite writing and consent under Reg. 3 Land Regulations 1948 (G.N. 232 of 1948) as amended by the Land (Amendment) F Regulations 1960.

The question of consent had also been raised at the trial as one of the issues framed, but the learned judge in his G judgment disposed of it simply by stating that matters of consent by the Commissioner for Lands became relevant only after the appellants had discharged their obligation under the agreement. The relevant parts of Regulation 3 of H the 1948 Regulations cited by Mr. D'Souza provide as follows:

3-(1) A disposition of right of occupancy shall not be operative unless it is in writing and unless and until it is approved by I the President.

KISANGA JJA, MUSTAFA JJA AND MAKAME JJA

A (2) ...

(3) In this regulation "disposition" means-

(a) a conveyance or assignment other than by way of mortgage

(b) ....

B (c) a deed or agreement or declaration of trust binding any party thereto to make any such disposition as aforesaid, including a deed or agreement entitling a party thereto to require any such disposition to be made.

C It is quite clear that the purported sale of the right of occupancy in the instant case was subject to the provisions of this Regulation. Admittedly the agreement complied with the Regulation only to the extent that it was in writing, but there was no consent by the Commissioner for Lands to whom the President has delegated his powers under the D provision. As stated before, the learned judge took the view that the issue of such consent would arise only after the appellants had discharged their obligation under the agreement. With due respect, however, we think that that was a wrong interpretation of the Regulation. What the provision really means is that unless and until such consent E was obtained, the agreement could not be enforced by suing on it. It remained a gentlemen's agreement, if you wish, but it could not form the basis of a suit in a court of law. Since the trial judge's decision was based wholly on an F agreement which was inoperative at law, the judgment itself was thereby vitiated and it would not stand.

Mr. Mahatane referred us to the decision of the High Court in the case of Sylveri Mushunga v Theonastina G Rwakanika [1974] L.R.T. No. 30 in which Mfalila, J. held a different view. When dealing with that case, the learned judge had been referred to previous decisions in which it was consistently held that the courts would not enforce a claim which could only be established by relying upon a transaction declared by law to be inoperative for H lack of approval under the Regulation. He specifically considered the cases of Patterson and Another v Kanji [1956] 23 E.A.C.A. 106, Patel v Lawrenson and Another [1957] E.A.C.A. 249 and Kassam v Kassam and Another [1960] E.A. 1042, but took the view that those cases were distinguishable from the one he was dealing I with. With respect to the learned judge, however, this is not so.

We have looked at those cases ourselves but could find no basis for the distinction. In those cases, like in the one under consideration by the learned judge, the issue was raised whether an agreement which had received no approval or consent as A required by the Regulation was inoperative, and hence underforceable at law, and the answer was yes.

KISANGA JJA, MUSTAFA JJA AND MAKAME JJA

In yet another dimension the learned judge took the view that consent under the Regulation applied only to B dispositions as defined under the Regulations to mean conveyance or assignment but did not include a contract of sale of a right of occupancy. Once again this was wrong. Regulation 3(3)(c) as reproduced above makes it clear that an agreement to sell a right of occupancy is a disposition within the meaning of the Regulation. C

On these two grounds, therefore, we are satisfied that the case of Sylveri Mushunga v Theonastina Rwakanika was wrongly decided. The view that an agreement to sell a right of occupancy, which agreement has received no consent under the Regulation, is inoperative, and hence unenforceable at law, was re-affirmed by this Court in the D more recent cases of Patel v Marealle and Another C.A. 5 of 1984 and Nitin Coffee Estate Ltd. and Four Others v United Engineering Works Ltd. and Another C.A. 15 of 1988 (both unreported).

We also heard arguments on whether the first appellant concluded the agreement as an agent for the second E appellant, and whether the second appellant subsequently ratified the agreement. On the evidence we are satisfied that both contentions cannot be maintained. It is clear that the first appellant concluded the agreement as a principal and the respondent accepted him as such, and there is nothing to indicate or suggest that the second appellant ever F ratified the transaction.

It therefore follows that the judgment of the High Court, based as it was wholly on an agreement which was inoperative at law, cannot be sustained and it must be set aside. G

It is further ordered that the first appellant shall refund to the respondent the purchase price plus the money spent on the property which according to the evidence comes to Shs. 232,240.00; the property to remain vested in the H second appellant. The first appellant is also to refund the respondent the money paid for rates and services which he is shown to have been paying since 1979 or 1981. On the other hand the respondent is to refund to the first appellant the amount of money received as rent from tenants in three rooms which on the evidence is shown to be Shs. 200.00 per room per month, i.e. Shs. 600.00 per month, from the date of possession of the property by the I respondent until the property is handed back to the second

A appellant. The property is to be handed back within 30 days of the date of this judgment. There will be no order as to costs.

Nyalali, C.J., Makame and Omar, JJ.A.: When this appeal came up for hearing this morning, Mr. Maira, H learned advocate for the respondent applied for adjournment of the hearing on the grounds stated in the affidavit filed on 1st November, 1988. These grounds are substantially to the effect that there is an application by the respondent pending in the High Court in which the respondent seeks two things. Firstly, he is applying for extension I of time to apply to the High Court for leave to appeal to this Court; and secondly he is applying to be allowed by The High Court to appeal to this Court against the Order of the High Court Maina, J. which granted the present appellant an extension of time to give notice of appeal against the judgment of the High Court Mapigano, J. A given on 24th November, 1987 and the Bill of Costs taxed by the High Court in subsequent execution proceedings. Mr. Kesaria learned advocate for the appellant has vigorously opposed this application for adjournment. Our own examination of the original record of the High Court confirms the fact there is indeed such as application by the respondent pending in the High Court. Undoubtedly, if the application is granted by the High B Court and if the respondent successfully appeals to the Court against the Order of Maina, J. which enables the current appeal to come before this Court as Civil Appeal No. 19 of 1988, the consequence would be to render this C current appeal incompetence.

However, Mr. Kessaria has submitted to the effect that the intended appeal by the respondent, which is the subject of the application pending in the High Court is already time-barred by the provisions of Rule 83 of the Tanzania D Court of Appeal Rules, 1979. We find this submission pertinent, but we are of the considered opinion that the proper place and time for making this submission is in the course of the hearing of the application pending in the High Court. It will be open and appropriate for the High court to reject the application on the ground that the intended E appeal, is inter alia, already time-barred under the provisions fo Rule 83. If that happens, the current appeal before us will proceed to be heard and decided as expected. But if the application is granted, the current appeal will have to await a decision by this Court on the intended appeal since it concerns the competency of the current appeal. F

In the final analysis therefore, since the Court as a matter of judicial policy and practice will not adjourn the hearing of an appeal except under special circumstances, and since the intended appeal amounts to such special G circumstance, we hereby grant the application for adjournment with the following directions.

1. This appeal be fixed for hearing by the Registrar as soon as possible after the High Court has given decision on the pending application; and H

2. The High Court to proceed to hear and decide the pending application, as soon as its diary of court business permits.

3. Costs to follow the event.

Order accordingly. I

Biron, J.: By Rule 29(2) of the Law of Marriage (Matrimonial Proceedings) Rules 1971, "The court shall proceed to try a petition in the same manner as if it were a suit under the Civil Procedure Code 1966." And by Order XV Part 1 of the Civil Procedure Code 1966: F
Where at the first hearing of the suit it is apparent that the parties are not at issue on sufficient questions of law or of fact, the court may at once pronounce judgement. G

In this matrimonial suit, both parties have by their counsel agreed on more than sufficient issues of fact and of law raised in their pleadings. The Petitioner in his petition, and the Respondent in her answer, establish that the marriage has irreparably broken down, as H both assert it has, and each spouse is praying for a divorce. Consequently I have not the slightest hesitation in formally finding that the marriage has in fact and in law irreparably broken down. Accordingly it is hereby ordered that a decree absolute dissolving the marriage is to issue. I

The second issue, that of the custody of the only child of the marriage which each party is claiming in his and her pleadings respectively, presents no difficulty at all, as the Respondent realising that the child, A Gladys, who is now sixteen years of age and will be more than eighteen years old and therefore sui juris and not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court in respect of a custody order, by the time she returns to this country from the United States of America, has withdrawn her claim for the custody of Gladys. And as I have a penchant for consensual B orders, it is hereby ordered that by consent the custody of the only child of the marriage, Gladys, is awarded to her father, the Petitioner.

We now come to the third and last issue, that is the division of the matrimonial assets, which so very often presents considerable difficulty. C

Therefore both parties are agreed that such issue cannot be determined in the absence of the Respondent but should await her return to this country. Consequently, this issue as to the division of the matrimonial assets is by consent deferred until the return of the D Respondent to this country, when it is hoped it will be amicably resolved.

E Order accordingly.

Mwalusanya, J.: The respondents Emiliana d/o Kalugala and Nassoro s/o Rutaihwa filed a Bill of Costs in the sum of Shs. 30,948/= for taxation by the District Magistrate of Bukoba District Court in his capacity as a Taxing Master. The Taxing Master taxed it at Shs. 29,548/=. The aggrieved party Maximilian s/o Rwabulala (appellant) has now D appealed to this court against that order.
In my view the decision of the Taxing Master is a nullity as he had no jurisdiction to adjudicate this matter. According to the Advocates Remuneration and Taxation of E Costs (amendment) Rules GN. 89 and 159 of 1962 (Cap. 9 of the Applied Laws), when the case terminates at the subordinate court, Taxing Master is the District Magistrate or Resident Magistrate. The case at hand terminated at the High Court and therefore perforce the Taxing Master must be the District Registrar. Therefore the learned District Magistrate was wrong to have conducted the taxation of costs in a F matter which he had no jurisdiction. And likewise the Bill of Costs was filed at the wrong forum.
And for general information, I wish to point out that according to the aforesaid Taxation of Costs Rules, any complaint against the decision of any Taxing Master, goes to the G High Court by way of Reference and not by way of appeal. Therefore the purported appeal before me is equally misconceived.
Be that as it may, the decision of the District Court is declared void and it is hereby set aside. The purported appeal is struck off the Register. I make no order as to costs. H

Peter Roland was claimed by the Federal Republic of Germany where he was required to carry out a custodial penalty following his conviction on a charge of rape. A formal requisition for his surrender was made by a competent representative of the Federal Republic of Germany and the Minister responsible for legal affairs signified to the lower D court accordingly. The Minister requested the court to declare whether or not the Tanzanian Executive could, under the provisions of Part II of the Extradition Act, 1965, Cap. 585, authorise the claimed person to be extradited from the territory of Tanzania. Case Information

Appeal dismissed. A

Phillip and Shio, for the appellant.

Maira for the respondent.

[zJDz]Judgment

Mapigano, J.: Peter Roland Vogel is being claimed by the Federal Republic of B Germany. It is said that he is wanted there in order that he may carry out a custodial penalty following his conviction on a charge of rape. However, the questions whether he was so convicted and so sentenced have yet to be determined by the lower court and they are not my concern in this appeal. C

It is no longer in dispute that a formal requisition for his surrender has been made by the competent representative of the Federal Republic of Germany and that the Minister responsible for legal affairs has signified to the lower court accordingly. In effect, the D said Minister wanted the lower court to declare whether or not the Tanzania Executive is, under the provisions of Part II of the Extradition Act, 1965, Cap. 585 of the Revised Laws, authorized to extradite the claimed person from the territory of Tanzania. In his Ruling dated 10th inst. the learned principal magistrate held that the said Executive E enjoyed no such authority. The Minister is dissatisfied and has post-haste come to this court on appeal. The question is whether the learned magistrate was at fault and whether the proceedings can properly be remanded to him for him to continue to adjudicate upon the other issues and deal with the other matters as prescribed by the provisions of the Extradition Act, 1965. F

The appeal is dual-pronged. The decision of the learned magistrate that on the material before him no agreement between Tanzania and the Federal Republic of Germany in regard to the surrender of fugitive criminals exists is being challenged. G

In the alternative it is contended that the learned magistrate erred in not affording the Minister sufficient opportunity to adduce further evidence on the issue of existence or otherwise of such an agreement. Let me deal with this allegation of unfairness first.

It is trite to observe that any person who is charged with the duty of adjudicating upon H disputes or the rights of others is enjoined to act fairly, in good faith and in a judicial temper. He is obliged to give each part the opportunity of adequately stating his case, and correcting or contradicting any relevant statement prejudicial to his case. And Mr. Mwanyika, counsel for the Minister, is right in pointing out that this is a matter of great I moment, in that it touches on inter-state relations', which therefore, calls for due seriousness, anxiety and patience. But can it be candidly said that the learned magistrate did not live A up to his duty?

I have gone through the record of the proceedings. I have noticed that on 6.3.1987 Mr. Marando, counsel for the claimed persons, made it abundantly clear that a preliminary point was being taken with regard to the existence of any legal extradition arrangements B between Tanzania and the Federal Republic of Germany, and he made a reference to the provisions of section B of the Extradition Act, 1965.

The learned magistrate adjourned the proceedings to 9.3.87 and he told the two counsel who appeared for the Minister that he expected them to assemble their evidence on that C point and furnish it on that day. In theses circumstances, if some evidence was not tendered on 9.3.87 by the Minister, it cannot be true that the learned magistrate exercised his discretion improperly in refusing to grant a further adjournment to enable D the Minister to produce the evidence which was not then at hand. But sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. A sense of seriousness about which Mr. Mwanyika has addressed this court must, in my opinion, be equally shown by the bar. Quite clearly the point raised by Mr. Marando was a very vital one. It is a point that should have been E anticipated by the Minister right from the very start. After all what was actually the heart of the matter? What was the whole idea of going to the learned magistrate? Was it not to establish that extradition arrangements exists between Tanzania and the Federal Republic of Germany and to ask him to operate those arrangements in accordance with F our Municipal Law? On the facts demonstrated by the record I am not satisfied that the learned magistrate exercised his discretion improperly. In the event I dismiss the contention that the Minister was unfairly deprived of sufficient opportunity of being heard.

I turn to the other point, to wit, as stated, whether on the materials before him the G learned magistrate was wrong in holding that there is no agreement to surrender fugitive criminals between Tanzania and the Federal Republic of Germany. The materials which the learned magistrate referred to are certain provisions of the Extradition Act, 1965, G.N 125/62 made under section 3 of the Fugitive Criminal Surrender Ordinance, 1922, H Cap. 22, the Agreement between the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany and the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland for the extradition of fugitive criminals, which was concluded in Bonn on 30.8.1960 (hereinafter called "the I Agreement of 1960"), and the declaration of the Prime Minister of Tanganyika of A 9.12.1961.

I pause to deal with the point raised by Mr. Maira, counsel for the claimed person, in regard to the construction of extradition enactments. Relying on a certain passage which B appears at p. 1939 of the Fifty Years Digest by Chitabey and Ramaratham, counsel has asked me to construe the provisions of the Extradition Act strictly. That passage reads as follows:

> Extradition Act and Criminal Procedure Code both being penal enactments their terms must C be strictly construed in favour of accused persons wherever such construction can be reasonably justified.

On the other hand we have section 4 of the Penal Code to consider. That section D provides thus:

> Subject to the provisions of the Interpretation Act, 1972, and the expression specifically defined in this Code, the Code shall be construed according to the principles of construction which E may be applied to any written law, with regard to Tanzania conditions and without applying any principle of strict construction relating to penal legislation.

I put the question, and I think it is a pertinent question, whether a strict construction of F the terms of the Extradition Act can be justified in Tanzania in view of the above section of the Penal Code. I put the question in other words, whether it is desirable to have two rules of construction in relation to penal matters, one being applicable to the provisions of the Penal Code and the other to the provisions of the other penal G enactments. In my opinion I think not.

By Article 1 of the Agreement of 1960 the provision of Treaty of 1872 relating to the mutual surrender of fugitive criminals concluded by the erstwhile State of Germany and the United Kingdom were re-applied, as between the territory of the Federal Republic H of Germany, on one hand, and the territories of the United Kingdom and other countries, including Tanganyika, for international relations of which the Government of the United Kingdom was then responsible, on the other hand. The question that poses is whether I that Agreement is valid in the court of Tanzania today. Counsel of the appellant says "yes" and his authority is section 28 (1) (b) of the Extradition Act, 1965. But counsel for the respondent says A "no" and he has drawn my attention to the provision of Article 7 of the agreement of 1960, to the absence of any Order in Council in that regard and to the declaration made in 1961 by the Prime Minister of Tanganyika.

In my respectful opinion counsel for the respondent is right. Article, 7 of that Agreement B stipulates, in language clear and plain, that the date on which the Agreement shall come into force shall be agreed upon by the exchange of notes. There is no evidence that such an exchange has ever taken place. What's more, as counsel for the respondent pointed out, citing para. 1186 of Archbold, 38th edition, extradition C agreements in the United Kingdom are brought into force, by Orders in Council. That is consistent with the constitutional law of that state. There the power of main treaties, languages and alliances with foreign states is vested in the Crown as part of its prerogative. There is nothing here to show that an Order in council in respect of that D Agreement has ever been made. What all this comes down to is that there was no evidence before the learned magistrate that the agreement of 1960 has ever come into operation in the United Kingdom, let alone in the other territories listed in that Agreement. E
Counsel for the respondent has taken the point a step further. He has argued that even if there was an exchange of notes, as stipulated in the Agreement, and an Order in Council, as required by the law of the United Kingdom, the Agreement would still be invalid in Tanzania today. When this argument was first put forth before the learned F magistrate counsel for the Minister sought to counter it by the production of what was described as a "Verbal Note", whatever that means. The said verbal note was ruled inadmissible on the ground that it lacked authentication, and in my view rightly so. G
There is force in the argument of counsel for the respondent. Two factors are notable in this connection. The first factor is that Tanganyika did not enter into any devolution agreement with the United Kingdom, upon attaining its independence in 1961, in regard to treaties that had been validly concluded by the United Kingdom on behalf of the H territory of Tanganyika or validly applied or extended by the former to the latter. The second factor is the declaration of the Prime Minister of 9.12.1961, the day Tangayika emerged into independence. That declaration was transmitted to Secretary General of I the United Nations who was requested to arrange for the circulation of its text to all Members of that Organization. The relevant part of that declaration, for the purpose of this case, reads as A follows:

As regards bilateral treaties validly concluded by the United Kingdom on behalf of the territory of Tanganyika, revalidly applied or extended by the former to the territory of the latter, the B Government of Tanganyika is willingly to continue to apply within its territory, on a period of two years from the date of independence (i.e.. until December, 1963) unless abrogated or modified earlier by mutual consent. At the expiry of that period, the Government of Tanganyika C will regard such of these treaties which could not by the application of the rules of customary international law be regarded as otherwise surviving, as having terminated.

It is the earnest hope of the Government of Tanganyika that during the aforementioned period D of two years, the normal processes of diplomatic negotiations will enable it to read satisfactory accord with the states concerned upon the possibility of the continuance or modification of such treaties.

Other countries including Uganda, Kenya, Zambia, Malawi, Trinidad and Burundi E subsequently adapted the same attitude. That stand has come to be called "the Nyerere Doctrine of State Succession" that is quite probable that the Prime Minister took a cut from Mr De Valera the First Prime Minister of the Irish Free State. As back as July, 11, F 1933, Mr. De Valera had declared, in his country's attainment of independence, as follows:

The present position of the Irish Free State with regard to treaties and conventions concluded G between the late United Kingdom and other countries is based upon the general international law practice in the matter when a new state is established. When a new state comes into existence which formerly formed part of another state, its acceptance or otherwise H of the treaty relationship of the older state is a matter for the new state to determine by express declaration or conduct (in the case of each individual treaty) as consideration of policy may require.

That is a quotation which appears in the text-book International Law and the New I Africa States by Felix chuks Okoye, at page 50. That is by the way. And be the matter what it may, it appears that the A doctrine in question is now an established component of the law of state succession.

It is overly clear that the declaration of the Prime Minister of Tanganyika made an exception of treaties which then bound Tanganyika in accordance with the rules of B customary international law imposes no obligation upon a state to surrender criminals to other states and that it thus permits a state to protect them at its discretion. Indeed, as a number of text-writers on the subject have pointed out, the systematic surrender of such persons has essentially been either a matter of courtesy or a matter of subservience on C the part of one state towards another.

Now the position in this case, at the end of the day, is that there was no tangible material before the learned magistrate to show that the earnest hope of the Government of Tanganyika was at all realized. We do not know, assuming that the Agreement of 1960 D was in operation in Tanganyika at the time of independence, that the said normal processes of negotiation for its continuance did actually take place within the stipulated period, and if they did take place whether or not they ever resulted into the continuance of that Agreement. It seems to me, therefore, that the learned magistrate was right in E saying that if that Agreement was in force in Tanganyika immediately prior to independence it lapsed when the stipulated period expired on 8.12.1963.

As we have seen the suggestion has been made that the Agreement of 1960 has been F revised or adopted by the exchange of notes between the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany and the Government of Tanganyika, which allegedly took place between 11.12.1963, i.e after the expiration of the stipulated period, and 14.4.1964. True it is that the two states had legal capacity to adopt the said Agreement. True it is G also that a defunct agreement can be reactivated by mutual consent. That is a transaction which some test-writers like Oppenheim have termed "Reconfirmation" or "Redentergration". However, the question that arises is whether there was any exchange of notes as alleged, I am sorry to say that there was, at the end of the day, only a bald H assertion by counsel for the Minister about it and, with respect, I cannot help but get amazed.

I now proceed to consider whether the surrender of the person claimed can be effected under the terms of section 28 (1) (b) of the Extradition Act, 1965, as contended by counsel for the appellant. That Act repealed the Fugitive Criminal surrender Ordinance, I Cap. 22, among other laws. By section 3 of that Ordinance read together with G.N 125 of 1932 made thereunder (the only statutory instrument relevant), A Tanganyika and Germany had reciprocal obligation to surrender to each other all persons against whom the competent authorities of the requesting part were proceeding for certain offences, inclusive of rape, or who were wanted by the said authorities for suffering punishment for those offences. B Section 28 of the Extradition Act, 1965 bears the marginal rubric "Transitional" and I confess, incidentally, that I do not understand why. By sub-section (1) (b) of that section, part II of the Act, which pertain to the surrender of fugitive criminals in pursuance of an existing agreement between Tanzania and another state, was made to C apply to all the countries to which the Ordinance applied immediately before the commencement of that Act. And by sub-section (2)(b), the application of that part was made to have effect as if the terms of the relevant agreement and the conditions, D exceptions and qualifications specified in any order made under the Ordinance and in force immediately before the commencement of the Act, had been specified by Order made under the Act. The question that is thrown up is whether Part II is applicable to the Federal Republic of Germany, or, in fine, whether it is open and valid for a court to E automatically substitute the old state of Germany, which appear in GN 125/32, with the state of Federal Republic of Germany, which came into being years after the making of GN 125/32. With due respect, I regret the answer must be "no".

The fact of the matter is that the state of Germany now exists only in history. It is no F longer a legal entity. It is no longer a subject of international law. It was vanquished by the allied Forces in World War II and underwent the agony of dismemberment in the forties, with the result that the country formed separate states which came to be known as, respectively, the Federal Republic of Germany and the German Democratic G Republic, with distinct political systems and espousing differing ideologies. All this is a matter of public knowledge and a fact of history of which a court is entitled to take judicial notice.

It is well that it has not been directly contended that there was a transmission of the rights H and obligations of the old state of Germany to the new state of the Federal Republic of Germany. It would not accord with the general international law practice if it were so. As Casteen has written as quoted in Max Sorensen's Manual of Public International Law, 1963 edit. at p. 295: I

When a state is dismembered into new independent states, its treat is as a rule become full A and void without descending to the new states. Treaties are generally personal in so far as they presuppose, in addition to territory, also the existence of a certain sovereign over the territory. To the succeeding states the treaties concluded by the former state are res B internalios acta.

Indeed, that is probably why the Government of the United Kingdom came to enter into the Agreement of 1960 with the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany. Like C the learned magistrate, I hold, that there is no room to operate the provision of section 28(1)(b) of the Extradition Act, 1965, in this case, on the materials that are available before the court.

In the final result, I hold that the decision of the learned magistrate that there are no legal arrangements between Tanzania and the Federal Republic of Germany, in relation to D extradition of fugitive criminals, cannot be upset, given the material that were adduced or referred to. And I find that the learned magistrate exercised his discretion properly when he refused to grant the application for adjournment of the hearing on 9.3.87. I fully E appreciate, as I have already observed, that this is a matter of considerable moment. But in the final analysis the new law of this country must be allowed to take its course. Accordingly, this appeal fails and is dismissed in its entirety.

F Appeal dismissed.

This was an appeal by the appellant company challenging the decision of the trial High A Court on the ownership of goods. Kampuni ya Usafiri Sumbawanga, KAUSU, sold a bus to the defendant for Shs. 200,000/=. On failure of the defendant to pay the price KAUSU recovered possession of the bus from the defendant and invited tenders from B the public to purchase the bus. The appellant's tender was accepted. Payment of the price was effected and KAUSU delivered the bus to the appellant. A month later KAUSU delivered to the appellant the registration card of the bus. Sometime after the appellant had taken possession of the bus, the police, in compliance with an order made C by the High Court, seized the bus and kept it in safe custody pending directions by the Court.

On the question of ownership of the bus the High Court decided that notwithstanding breach of payment condition property in the bus passed to the first buyer, the D respondent, when the contract was made, i.e. on May 3, 1980, and therefore KAUSU had no title to pass to the second buyer, the appellant.

The appellant argued on appeal that they were buyers from a seller in possession of the goods already sold and were thus protected by section 27(1) of the Sale of Goods Ordinance, Cap. 214. Further the appellant prayed for special damages for loss of E business due to seizure and, therefore, non-use of the bus.

Mustafa, Ag. C.J., Makame and Omar, JJ.A.: The appellant Company (hereafter called the Company) had purchased a bus TZ 38992 from Kampuni ya Usafiri I Sumbawanga (hereafter called KAUSU) for shs.305,000/= during August/September 1980. A

It appeared that the respondent Martin (hereafter called Martin) had earlier on, in May 1980 purchased the same bus from KAUSU for Shs. 200,000/= and had paid for the said purchase by four cheques, three of them post-dated, dated 3rd May 1980, 31st May 1980, 30th June 1980 and 30th July 1980 respectively. B

The first cheque for Shs. 100,000/- dated 3rd May 1980, when presented for payment at the bank was returned unpaid with the remarks endorsed thereon "Refer to drawer". Obviously Martin had no money in the bank to meet the said cheque. Although the said cheque was presented for payment later than 3rd May (it was in fact presented for C payment on June 2, 1980) that did not alter the situation that the cheque was dishonoured.

However KAUSU managed to arrange for the seizure of the bus with the help of the Police, and the bus was out of the possession of Martin after Martin's failure to pay. It D also appeared that KAUSU was in possession of the registration card of the said bus, and KAUSU still remained registered as the owner of the bus.

On or about 6th August, 1980, by advertisement in the Daily News and the Uhuru Newspapers, KAUSU invited the public to tender for the purchase of the said bus. The E company tendered for the purchase of the bus and on 9th September 1980 its tender was approved by KAUSU. The Company paid the price of 305,000/= for the bus, and KAUSU handed over possession of the bus and the registration card to the Company on 20th September 1980. The Company used that bus from 20th September 1980 to 10th October 1980 when it was seized by the Police, in action apparently initiated by F Martin, who had claimed the bus as his property.

The Company filed a plaint in the High Court seeking a declaration that it was the rightful owner of motor vehicle No. TZ 38992, and for the said vehicle to be returned to it. It G also claimed damages for loss of business due to the seizure of the vehicle.

The trial judge (Samatta, J) held that KAUSU had sold the bus to Martin when KAUSU accepted the cheques drawn by Martin as payment. He held that on the sale, the property in the bus had passed to Martin, and KAUSU's only remedy for the cheque or H cheques being dishonoured was to sue and claim for the purchase price from Martin.

With respect we think that the trial judge was correct in his conclusion concerning the transaction between KAUSU and Martin.

In its claim before the High Court, the Company inter alia I relied on the provisions of section 27(1) of the Sale of Goods Ordinance. Section 27 A (1) reads:

> When a person having sold goods continues or is in possession of the goods, or of the documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer by that person, or by a mercantile agent B acting for him, of the goods or documents of title, under any sale pledge or other disposition therefor, to any person receiving the same in good faith and without notice of the previous sale, shall have the same effect as if the person making delivery or transfer were expressly C authorized by the owner of the goods to make the same.

The trial judge found in effect that the Company had purchased the vehicle from KAUSU in good faith, and without notice of a previous sale. However the judge held D that section 27(1) was entirely irrelevant to the case before him. He was of the view that at the time the bus was sold to Martin, KAUSU had divested itself of possession of the vehicle and deliver possession of it to Martin. He held that the registration card of the vehicle was not a document of title to the goods. E

The judge was correct in holding that a motor registration card is not a document of title to the motor vehicle. However, as pointed out by Mr. Bateyunga for the Company, one who is registered as owner of the card is presumed to be the vehicle owner until the F contrary is proved. And as stated by Denning L.J. (as he then was) in Bishopsgate Motor Finance Corp. v Transport Brakes Ltd [1949] 1 KB 322 at 338:

The registration book of a car or the log book as it is called, may not itself be a document of G title, but it is the best evidence of title.

Be that as it may, we think that the trial judge erred in not finding that at the time of the sale by KAUSU to the Company, KAUSU was in possession of the vehicle. The H vehicle might have been in the possession of Martin at the time he purchased it, but it was clear that KAUSU had recovered possession of it when it sold it to the Company.

At the trial PWI, the manager of the appellant Company testified. He stated inter alia: I

MUSTAFA Ag CJ, MAKAME JJA AND OMAR JJA

Mr Sadala (the General Manager of KAUSU) physically handed over the motor vehicle TZ A 38992 to me at Sumbawanga Police Station.. on 20.9.1980.... My driver drove the vehicle to Mpanda. A month later we received the registration card in respect of the vehicle.

Mr Sadala also gave evidence. He said: B

This Company (i.e. appellant) paid Shs 305,000/- for the purchase of the motor vehicle. This was on 20.9.1980. I received the money on behalf of the Company. I physically handed over C the motor vehicle to Harith Saidi & Brothers Company.

This testimony regarding the handing over of the vehicle by KAUSU to the Company was not challenged and it was clear that KAUSU had possession of the vehicle when it D sold it to the Company.

The trial judge appeared to have held that the motor vehicle was out of the possession of KAUSU and in the possession of Martin at the time of the sale transaction of the vehicle by KAUSU to the Company. In this he was clearly in error. E

As KAUSU was in possession of the motor vehicle at the time of the sale, we are satisfied that the provisions of section 27(1) of the Sale of Goods Ordinance were applicable, as all the other conditions had been complied with. F

We may also mention that here the sale was certainly open and advertised to the public. It was effected by public tender. There was evidence which strongly suggested that Martin knew of the advertisements for the sale of the motor vehicle which were published in the newspaper, but took no action. KAUSU had the registration card of G the vehicle in its possession, as well as the physical possession of the vehicle. This was as near the sale in market over conditions as it is possible in certain parts of Tanzania.

Mr Bateyunga also submitted that Martin should be stopped from challenging the sale by KAUSU to the Company. We do not think it is necessary to deal with that issue as we H are satisfied that the Company must succeed under the provision of section 27(1) of the Sale of Goods Ordinance.

The trial judge dealt with the claim for special damages by the Company but came to the conclusion that no special damages had been satisfactorily proved. We concur with that I view.

We allow the appeal of the Company and set aside the order and decree of the High A Court. We substitute therefore an order declaring that the appellant company is the rightful owner of motor vehicle TZ 38992.
We also order that if the said vehicle is with the respondent Martin, he must forthwith B return it to the appellant Company in the condition in which the respondent took it.
We award costs to the appellant Company both here and below.
C Appeal allowed.

He resisted the decision to retire him and refused to receive his terminal dues. When the appellant was served with a quit order to vacate the premises allocated to him by his employer he sought judicial redress. The quit order was served by the District Commissioner. The judicial redress took the form of instituting H legal proceedings in the Resident Magistrates Court claiming perpetual restrictive injunction restraining the General Manager and his servants or agents from evicting him from the premises pending his labour dispute. The only basis of the said labour dispute I was a letter written by the Secretary-General of Juwata to the Regional Secretary instructing the latter to pursue the appellant's complaint.

Before the expiry of the quit notice period the appellant applied to the court for A interlocutory injunction under Order XXXVII of the Civil Procedure Code to restrain the respondents from ejecting him from the premises pending the suit.

The Resident Magistrate turned down the application. On appeal the appellate Court B considered, inter alia, whether a pending labour dispute existed and principles governing power to grant interlocutory orders.

Held: (i) The letter of the Secretary - General of Juwata to the Regional Secretary of Juwata instructing the latter to pursue the appellant's complaint, by itself, is not enough to C constitute a labour dispute, especially in view of the fact that there was nothing to show that the addressee had complied with the instruction and taken up the matter;

(ii) before granting a discretionary interlocutory injunction the court should D consider:

(a) Whether there is a bonafide contest in between the parties.

(b) On which side, in the event of the plaintiff's success will be the balance of inconvenience if the injunction does not issue, bearing in mind the principle of E retaining immovable property in status quo.

(c) Whether there is an occasion to protect either of the parties from injury known as "irreparable" before his right can be established. "Irreparable Injury" means that the injury will be material i.e one that could not be F adequately remedied by damages.

Mapigano J.: I heard this appeal on the 6th inst. The respondent was absent though he had been duly served with a notice of hearing. I allowed the appeal and reserved the reasons. I will now state the reasons. H

The appellant Timothy Marwa Kaare was once a civil servant. On 5th June, 1979 he joined the Mara Industrial Company Ltd. on secondment and held the post of Industrial Economist. He was allocated one of the residential houses that had been let to his employer by the Tanzania Housing Bank situated at Makoko in Musoma Township. In I May, 1980 he was promoted to the post of

MAPIGANO J

"Economist, Production and Marketing Manager". That was after he had opted to A remain with the company as a permanent employee. In due course things went awry for him. For certain reasons the Executive Board of the company terminated his employment with effect from the 22nd, 1983. Feeling aggrieved, he made several protestations and called to some higher authorities. His strenuous and sustained B exertions attained success of sorts. They resulted into convening of the company's Board of Directors to review the termination on the 21st June, 1984. After some deliberations the said Board resolved to vacate the termination and to reinstate him in his C former employment. What happened, however, is that by then the appellant had already attained the age of 55 years and the Board directed that he be retired, on the grounds that the retiring age, according to the terms of his employment, was 55 years. On being so notified the appellant resisted the decision of the Board, contending that the D retiring age was not 55 years and declining to receive the proposed terminal dues. It was all for naught.

At the instance of the Union the District Commissioner of Musoma served the appellant with a written notice to quit the premises that had been allocated to him by the Union by E the 28th August, 1986. The appellant reacted by seeking judicial redress : On the 24th August, 1986 he instituted legal proceedings in the Court of Resident Magistrate at Musoma to challenge the said notice, and the only relief he claimed and still claims is a perpetual restrictive injunction restraining the General Manager of the Union, the F respondent herein, or his servants or agents, from evicting him from the premises on the grounds, inter alia, that there was a labour dispute still pending between him and the respondent in respect of his being retired from the employment. The respondent contested the action and presented a written statement of defence on the 19th August, 1986. G

Next, on 25th August, 1986, i.e, before the expiry period of the quit notice, the appellant made an application for interlocutory injunction under the relevant provisions of Order 37 of the Civil Procedure Code to restrain the respondent from ejecting him from the premises during the pendency of the suit. The application was heard on the 27th H August, 1986 and the learned resident magistrate started by framing and recording two issues, to wit : (a) whether or not the plaintiff is still entitled to remain in possession and occupation of the premises; and (2) what remedies are the parties entitled to. After I recording and considering some evidence the learned magistrate turned down the application. The learned magistrate's reasons for the decision are three fold : First, the applicant was properly A retired from the employment because, he said, the appellant was employed as a civil servant and by virtue of statutory provisions, which were not specified, the retiring age was 55 years; secondly, there was no evidence to support the appellant's contention that there was a labour dispute pending between the parties; and thirdly, the appellant had B displayed unmeritorious conduct in that, he stated, the appellant refused to fetch his retirement benefits. The decision of the learned magistrate was delivered on the 3rd September, 1986, and being dissatisfied with it, the appellant brought the present appeal to this court. C

The first ground is that the learned magistrate erred in law in purporting to determine the principal matters in the main suit. It is quite true that the learned magistrate dealt with such matters and quite at length at that. Indeed, the recording of the issues and the way they were formulated, the content and tenor as well as the drift of the Ruling, and the fact D that the findings on the issues have an air of finality, leads one to reasonably apprehend that the learned magistrate went out of his way and purported to decide the main suit. Lest I am misunderstood, let me be quick enough to point out that I am not saying that the learned magistrate was not obliged to consider the point whether or not E there was a substantial question to be tried by court. Nor am I suggesting as the appellant would have me do, that the learned magistrate was not entitled to assess the materials before him in regard to the question of retirement. But in my opinion the scope of that exercise should have been limited to the question of the bonafides or otherwise of F the suit and its entertainability by the court. For the real point to which the learned magistrate should have applied his judicial mind is not whether the suit holds forth bright prospects of success or how the suit ought to be decided at the hearing of the case but whether there is substantial question to be inquired into and whether matters should not G be preserved in status quo until the final determination of the suit. There is thus some merit in the first ground.

The second ground is that the learned magistrate erred in holding that there was no pending labour dispute between the parties. The appellant relied on a letter of the H Secretary - General of JUWATA dated the 23rd June, 1986, which he addressed to the Mara Regional Secretary of JUWATA instructing him to pursue the appellant's complaint. I confess it is a fine point whether that letter is by itself enough to constitute a labour dispute, especially in view of the fact that there was nothing to show that the I addressee had complied with the instruction and taken up the matter. In my view, therefore, the A learned magistrate cannot be faulted for holding as he did.

The third ground of appeal is that the learned magistrate was not justified to hold that the appellant's conduct was unmeritorious. I respectful agree. Surely the mere fact that the B appellant has declined to collect the retirement dues cannot be fairly described as an unmeritorious conduct under the circumstances. The collection of those dues would have appeared to be inconsistent with his contention that his retirement was unwarranted, though of course it would not at law have prejudiced his case. Still, I am unable to go C further and say that the findings of the learned magistrate was born of prejudice, as the appellant has charged in the memorandum of appeal. The fourth ground is that the learned magistrate erred in overlooking the illegality of the eviction notice. This is a strong point. Quite evidently what precipitated this action was the quit notice of the D Musoma District Commissioner. That notice is, in legal parlance, the cause of action, and as I see it the action stands or falls on the lawfulness or otherwise of that notice, because if the notice in question is unlawful, then it is ipso facto inoperative. One has to consider E and decide the question whether the District Commissioner was vested with authority to give such notice in order that one may decide whether matter which eminently commends the suit to serious investigation by the court of trial, which as already indicated, is one of the circumstances that has to be considered on an application for an interim injunction. F

The last ground is that the learned magistrate erred in that he did not apprehend that the ends of justice required the granting of the temporary injunction. Properly, so. However, the appellant should rather have put it differently, like this: the learned magistrate did not appreciate the true nature and parameters of the application and, in G consequence, he non - directed himself to the law applicable.

As we have seen, the appellant was suing for a permanent injuction and during the course of and before the suit was called on for hearing he brought the application with a H view to remaining in possession of the suit - premises pending the conclusive disposal of the proceedings. The power to grant such an application has always been discretionary, to be exercised judicially by the application of certain well - settled principles. The first such governing principle, as indicated supra, is that the court should I consider whether there is a bona fide contest in between the parties. Secondly, it should consider on which side, in the event of the plaintiff's success, will be the balance of inconvenience if the injunction does not issue, A bearing in mind the principle of retaining immovable property in status quo. Thirdly, the court should consider whether there is an occasion to protect either of the parties from the species of injury known as "irreparable" before his right can be established, keeping it in mind that by "irreparable injury" it is not meant that there must be no physical B possibility of repairing the injury but merely that the injury would be material, i.e., one that could not be adequately remedied by damages. With due respect, let it be said that the learned magistrate did not pause to address his mind to these points, let alone C pronounce on them, and I am disposed to think that if he had done so he would most probably have granted the application.

Mapigano, J.: There was sufficient evidence to establish that the appellant Mafuru Magabanya induced the wife of the respondent Joseph Mulya to desert him. There was E believable evidence that he kept the woman at his home for several days. He was found in her company on a journey. He was carrying her on his bicycle. The militiaman who had been tipped about the affair apprehended both of them. In the circumstances, the learned district magistrate was justified to conclude that this was not only a case of F enticement but one of adultery as well. It is difficult to imagine that the two were living together without the context of sexual intercourse. More so in this case in view of the fact that the two had previously been found committing adultery, in consequence of which the respondent was brought to court and adjudged to pay damages to the G appellant in Civil Case No. 124/84 of the primary court of Bunda. The appeal is dismissed to the extent that it concerns the appellant's liability to pay damages to the respondent.

The appeal from the quantum of damages assessed by the learned district magistrate - has some merit. Under the law damages for adultery or enticement is in the discretion of H the court, and in the exercise of its discretion the court is obliged to pay due regard to any relevant custom of the community to which the parties belong, and in the question of adultery, to the question whether the husband and the adulterous wife were living together or apart at the time of the commission of the adultery. The parties in this case I do not belong to one community. One is a Msukuma and the other is a

Mruri and there was nothing to show that the relevant custom of the Wasukuma A correspond with that of the Waruri. It is true that this was a serious case. As pointed out, it was both a case of enticement and adultery and in my view that is a circumstance which the court can properly take into account when assessing the damages, still, I think that the damages that were awarded in this case, namely twelve head of cattle, were too B expensive. Though the learned magistrate did not expressly say so, one gets the impression that his award contained an element of punishment, which is not permissible at law. In my view an award of five head of cattle should have met the justice of this case. C

Accordingly, the appeal succeeds in part in that damages are reduced to five head of cattle. Each part is to bear his costs of this appeal.

D Order accordingly.

[zJDz]Judgment

Maina, J.: This is an application by Jumuiya ya Wafanyakazi Tanzania (JUWATA) on H behalf of its ninety-four members for order of certiorari and mandamus, to bring to this court and quash the decision of the Permanent Labour Tribunal and to direct the Permanent Labour Tribunal to hear and determine the trade dispute between JUWATA and the employer, Kiwanda cha Uchapishaji cha Taifa (KIUTA).The facts are briefly as I follows:

MAINA J

The ninety-four employees of KIUTA were declared redundant on 1 April 1985. They A complained to JUWATA. On 25 June 1985 the JUWATA Regional Secretary requested the Secretary General to declare a trade dispute between the Union and the Respondents. The dispute was then referred to the Labour Commissioner, and on 2nd B May 1986 the Minister for Labour referred the dispute to the Permanent Labour Tribunal. In its decision dated 3rd September 1986, the Permanent Labour Tribunal refused to hear the application on the ground that the matter had not been referred to the Conciliation Board under section 40A of the Security of Employment Act, Cap 574. The Tribunal held that it was bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Civil C Appeal No. 9 of 1982, Zambia Tanzania Road Services Limited v J.K. Pallangyo.

It was Prof. Shivji's submission on behalf of the applicants, that the Tribunal erred in refusing to hear the dispute because, Prof. Shivji said, the relevant decision in the Pallangyo case was given per incuriam. In the Pallangyo case, the Court of Appeal D held, inter alia, that because the employee had not referred the dispute to the Conciliation Board within fourteen days, as required by the Security o f Employment Act, the ruling of the Tribunal that the employee's dismissal was wrongful, "was invalid E and hence ineffectual in as much as it proceeded upon the Tribunal's wrong assumption of jurisdiction." Professor Shivji submitted that the Court of Appeal's decision on the matter in the Pallangyo case was delivered per incuriam. He said that the decision was given in ignorance or forgetfulness of inconsistent statutory provisions and it was F demonstrably wrong, and therefore not binding on the Tribunal.

He cited the English case of Morelle Ltd v Wakeling [1955] 1 All E.R 708 in which the Court said as follows: G

> As a general rule, the only case in which decisions should be held to have been given per incuriam are those decisions given in ignorance or forgetfulness or some inconsistent statutory provision or of some authority binding on the court concerned: so that in such cases H some part of the decision or some step in the reasoning on which it is based is found on that basis to be demonstrably wrong ...

The decision in the Morelle case was followed in Kiriri Cotton Co. v D.R Dewani I [1985] EA 239. Mr Rutagatina and Mrs Ndosi who appeared on behalf of the Respondents submitted, on the other hand, that the Court of Appeal considered the Pallangyo case properly and the A decision was not, in their opinion, given per incuriam.
The inconsistency which Professor Shivji referred to is in sections 4(1) of the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act and 40A of the Security of Employment Act. He said these two B provisions are inconsistent and the Court of Appeal did not consider that. Section 4(1) of the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act provides as under:

4(1) any trade dispute whether existing or apprehended, if not otherwise determined may be reported to the Labour Commissioner by notice in writing given either by or on behalf of the C employer, or on behalf of the employees by the general secretary of a registered trade union of which the employees are members.

Section 40A of the Securty of Employment Act Cap. 574 as amended by Act No. 1 of D 1975 provides as follows:

4(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, or of any written law, where an employer terminates the employment of any employee or summarily dismisses any employee, and the E employee is aggrieved by such termination or dismissal, the employee may at any time before the expiration of fourteen days from the date on which such termination or dismissal F takes effect refer such termination or dismissal to the Board....

It is true, in my view, that the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act deals with collective disputes. The Security of Employment Act deals mainly with individual disputes. Section G 4(1) of the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act does not specifically provide the period within which disputes may be referred to the Labour Commissioner, while section 40A of the Security of Employment Act specifically provides that an aggrieved employee H must refer the matter to a Board within fourteen days. But, in my opinion, that aspect of the matter, that is, the period within which a dispute may be referred to the Board was decided by the Court of Appeal in the Pallangyo case. The Court said:

Admittedly there are no provisions under the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act relating to I limitation of actions. But the view that claims brought under that Act are not subject to limitation seems untenable. If that A view were to be upheld the implication of it, is that where an employee thinks that the termination of his services is wrongful, he may delay lodging his grievances for ten or twenty years or even for an indefinite period. We think that is undesirable and would be objectionable B on policy grounds. Such employee must act promptly in seeking to vindicate his rights.

Their Lordships went on to hold that section 40A of the Security of Employment Act applies. So, in the Pallangyo case the Court of Appeal specifically addressed its mind C on the issue of limitation and decided that the aggrieved employee should have referred the matter to a Conciliation Board within fourteen days.

I do not agree with Professor Shivji that the Court of Appeal in the Pallangyo case was D legislating on limitation. The Court of Appeal made an interpretation of the relevant provisions of the law and came to a conclusion that disputes under the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act must be referred to a Board within the period specified before they can be heard by the Tribunal. It is therefore not correct that the Court of Appeal made E the relevant decision in ignorance or forgetfulness of the relevant statutory provisions.

It was also Professor Shivji's submission that the Court of Appeal ignored section 27 of the Security of Employment Act. It provides, inter alia, that the decision of a Board shall be final and conclusive. In his submission, that provision makes section 4(1) of the F Permanent Labour Tribunal Act defunct. With respect, I do not agree with the learned counsel. Section 27 of the Security of Employment deals with a situation where an employee has been dismissed, which was not the case in the Pallangyo case. Section 27 (1) (a) reads in part as follows: G

> The decision of the Minister on a reference to him under Section 26, and subject to any decision on a reference to the Minister therefrom, the decision of a Board on a reference to it under this Part....
> (a) Shall be final and conclusive; and H
> (b) ....

Section 26 of the Security of Employment Act, as I mentioned earlier, is on summary I dismissal, whereby the aggrieved employee whose dismissal has been confirmed by a Board may refer the matter to the Minister A after giving fourteen days' notice. In my view, the Court of Appeal did not have to consider section 27 of the Security of Employment Act in the Pallangyo case because that was irrelevant. The Court of Appeal did not therefore ignore section 27 as submitted by Professor Shivji. B

I have already said that I agree that the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act deals with collective disputes while the Security of Employment Act deals with individual disputes arising out of decisions made. However, I do not agree that the Court of Appeal in the Pallangyo case in forgetfulness failed to comply with the notion of collectiveness. In the C Pallangyo case the Court of Appeal considered both the Acts mentioned above and clearly held that an aggrieved employee even under the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act must refer the dispute to a Conciliation Board within fourteen days as provided in Section 40A of the Security of Employment Act. That is condition precedent. Where an D aggrieved employee does not refer the dispute to the Conciliation Board within the period specified, then the Permanent Labour Tribunal shall not have jurisdiction to hear the dispute. That applies whether it is an individual dispute under the Security of E Employment Act or a collective dispute under the Labour Tribunal Act. That was what the Court of Appeal said in the Pallangyo case. The Tribunal was bound to follow that decision.

The Court of Appeal considered the relevant provisions of the two Acts and came to F that decision. Section 40A of the Security of Employment Act applies in so far as limitation of actions is concerned in disputes under the Permanent Labour Tribunal Act. The relevant decision of the Court of Appeal in the Pallangyo case was not given in ignorance or forgetfulness of inconsistent statutory provisions of the law as submitted. G The Tribunal was therefore bound by that decision and quite properly, in my view, refused to hear the dispute by the applicants.

H Application dismissed.

Chipeta J.: On 17th February, 1987, I quashed the accused's conviction set aside the H sentence and ordered that the fine paid be refunded to him forthwith. I reserved my reasons for doing so, which I now give.

The accused, Joseph Mbolole, was charged in Nzega District Court with the offence of I neglect of official duty. c/s 121 of the Penal Code.

When the charge was read over and explained to the accused, he stated: A

> It is true. I neglect (sic) my official duty.

In the facts given by the prosecution, it was stated that the accused, as ward secretary at B Ndekeli village, failed to perform his official duty under section 7(1) (a) (i) and (ii) of the Cotton Ordinance Cap 362 of the Revised laws in that he failed to instruct the farmers at that village to remove refuse of cotton plants in their farms as ordered by the District Commissioner. C

Unhappily, as the learned state attorney pointed out, the Cotton Ordinance was repealed by section 62 of Act No. 3 of 1973 - itself repealed by the Cotton Marketing Board Act, 1984. The current law contains no provisions similar to those in section 7(1) (a) (i) (ii) of the repealed Cotton Ordinance. D

An offence under section 121 of the Penal Code can be said to have been committed only if there is a specific law imposing a specific duty on the person charged. In the absence of any such law, as was the case here, a conviction under section 121 of the Penal Code cannot be had. E

In other words, whatever order was made by the District Commissioner does not appear to have had the backing of any law.

It was for these reasons that I quashed the accused's conviction which, incidentally the Republic declined to support, and set aside the sentence. F Conviction quashed.

This was a suit filed by appellant, one Zacharia s/o Lugendo against the respondent one Shadrack s/o Lumilang'omba at Magu Primary Court claiming five head of cattle as B damages for adultery.
The appellant succeeded at the trial but was unsuccessful at the District Court on the basis that there was no proof of marriage between him and his concubine one Thabita d/o Yakobo.
Held: (i) Where a man and woman live as husband and wife under the belief that they C are legally married, their cohabitation amounts to concubinage;

(ii) marriage unlike concubining is a solemn and serious institution. There ought to be evidence of customary law marriage to constitute marriage, such as handing over D ceremony by parents of the girl to the boy, or evidence of certain rites recognized by the relevant customary law of that tribe like a festival of pombe or other like ritual - Sec. s. 25 (1) (d) of Law of Marriage Act No. 5 of 1971;

Mwalusanya, J.: This was a suit filed by the appellant Zacharia s/o Lugendo against the G respondent Shadrack s/o Lumilang'omba at Magu Primary Court for a claim of five head of cattle as damages for adultery. The appellant succeeded at the trial but was unsuccessful at the District Court and hence this appeal.
I agree with the District Court that there was no proof of marriage between the appellant and the woman Thabitha d/o Yakobo and therefore the suit for damages for adultery H could not stand. The parties were just staying in concubinage. For the benefit of the trial court, marriage is a solemn and serious institution more than mere concubinage. Although s. 41 (a) of the Law of Marriage Act No. 5 of 1971 says that payment of I dowry is not necessary to validate marriage, yet there ought to be evidence of customary law marriage to constitute marriage. For example there ought to be evidence of certain rites A recognized by the relevant customary law of that tribe like a festival of pombe or any other ritual - see s. 25(1)(d) of the Law of Marriage Act No. 5 of 1971. But I cannot agree that mere act of enticing a girl to your home and staying with her in concubinage, B could constitute marriage. Something more is required for sure!!
The trial court was of the view that s.160 (1) of the Law of Marriage Act created a marriage where a man and woman had cohabited as husband and wife for over two years. He was wrong. Since 1978 this court has clarified as to the meaning of that C section, for which see the case of

Francis s/o Leo v Paschal Simon Magana: [1978] L.R.T. n. 22 (Mfalila, J.). It was held therein that, the presumption of marriage may be rebutted if it can be proved that the parties had never gone through a ceremony of marriage recognized under the law. In the case at hand the appellant concedes that he D never went through any ceremony of marriage with the woman Thabitha d/o Yakobo, and therefore there cannot be any marriage even if they have stayed over two years. It is not the law that staying with a woman for over two years creates a marriage where there was none. E

Rubama, J: Mohamedi Antoni was convicted of two offences: first failing to display third party insurance certificate c/s 114(1) of the Road Traffic Act No. 30 of 1973 and secondly, failing to carry registration card in the motor vehicle c/s 13(1) and (2) of the Traffic Act, 1973. D

The learned trial magistrate in sentencing the accused used the following words:

Accused is condemned to a fine of shs. 200/= for each count or 4 months imprisonment in default. E

The imposed sentence is illegal - and on two grounds. Firstly it breaches s.29(iv) of the Penal Code. The prison sentence in default of payment of shs. 200/= fine should have been two months and not four months. Secondly, prison terms in default of fines are not F served concurrently. They are served consecutively. The trial magistrate should thus have stated in passing sentence that the four months imprisonment in default of fine was in respect of fine imposed for each offence. G

As the prison sentence imposed in default of payment of fines was illegal, it is hereby set aside.

It is ordered that the sentence be amended to read:

Accused is fined Shs 200/= fine in respect of each count or suffer two months imprisonment in H default in respect of each count.

Urban Primary Court. The appeal to the Magu District Court was equally unsuccessful hence this appeal.

Like the two courts below I find that this appeal is bankrupt of merit. First as held by the trial court there was no evidence of customary law marriage. According to the H testimony of the appellant himself after he had paid bride price of Shs. 10,000/= he waited to contract the marriage when he returned from Geita. However when he returned from Geita he found the woman already married to the respondent. The payment of Shs. 10,000/- as brideprice by the appellant for sure did not constitute I marriage. Marriage would have taken place only if appellant was handed over the woman as wife according to the Sukuma Customary Law rites as stipulated under s.25 (5) (d) of the A Law of Marriage Act No. 5 of 1971. Otherwise as things stand, no marriage of any kind whatsoever was contracted.

Secondly as the District Court held, the respondent had a powerful defence provided under s.72(2) of the Law of Marriage Act because when he married the woman he did not know nor could he have known even by exercise of reasonable diligence that the B woman in question was married. The parents of the woman he wanted to marry said she was unmarried. What else could he have done?

Malamsha, for the state

Moshi, J.: This is an appeal against sentence. The first and second appellants, who were the driver and owner of a motor vehicle respectively, were arraigned at Musoma E District Court on an indictment containing two counts under the Road Traffic Act, 1973 - Driving a motor vehicle on a Public road with defect c/o 39 (1) (a) and 5 of the Act (1st appellant), and Permitting the motor vehicle to be driven on the Public Road o/s F 39(1) and 6 of the Act (2nd Appellant). Upon being convicted on their own plea of guilty, the first appellant was sentenced to a fine of shs. 10,000/= or 9 months imprisonment in default, whereas the second appellant were to pay a fine of shs. 15,000/= or 9 months imprisonment in default. They were dissatisfied with the sentence, which appeared to them to be unduly harsh, and hence this appeal. G

Both the learned advocate for the appellants, Mr. Butambala, and the learned state attorney for the Republic, Mr Malamsha, are of the view that the sentences were, in all the circumstances, on the high side. With respect, I am, on my part, firmly of the same view. The record tells us that the learned trial magistrate did not inquire into the H appellant's power to pay the fine. Yet it is one of the most cherished principles of punishment that a fine must bear reasonable relation to accused's power to pay - see R. v Samon [1971] H.C.D 224. A fine that will prove impossible for the offender to pay, having regard to this income and financial commitments, will take away the right already I given to the offender by the law, for good reason, to escape incarceration since he will automatically have to go to jail as an A alternative for his inability to pay the fine. It would be unjudicious and highly unfair for a court to impose such a fine as was imposed on the first appellant, a mere driver, without inquiring into his power to pay. No previous conviction was proved against any of the appellants. They were both first offenders. The defects pertaining to the vehicles were B trivial, and they both readily pleaded guilty to the charge. All these factors ought to have earned them some leniency. There can hardly be a doubt that the sentences passed were, in all the circumstances, too severe. Going by what Gorges, C.J. (as he then was) C said in G. Avel & A. Hocken v R. [1970] H.C.D 159, in deciding whether or not it should interfere with a sentence, an appellate tribunal must consider whether the magistrate has in fact misdirected himself in any particular, or whether the sentence is so manifestly excessive that it is clear that there must have been a misdirection even though not explicity. In this case the trial magistrate did not comment on anything before passing D the sentence. He said nothing. He simply pronounced the sentence. The principles upon which he acted in sentencing the appellants were therefore not explicit. However, for the reasons already stated, I am satisfied that the sentence was so manifestly E excessive that it is clear that there must have been a misdirection on the part of the trial magistrate even though not explicity.

I therefore allow the appeal, and hereby reduce the sentence to a fine of shs. 2,000/= or three months imprisonment for the first appellant, and shs 4,000/= or six months F imprisonment for the second appellant. Since it is noted that the fines imposed by the trial court were paid, it is ordered that the appellants should each be paid a refund of the amount paid in excess.

Bahati, J.: This is an application for bail pending the determination of the appeal filed by the applicant. The reasons for this application are that the appeal has overwhelming chances of success. H

The Republic opposed this application arguing that there were no overwhelming chances of success.

Mr. Mkamanga, learned State Attorney, for the Republic cited authorities to show that it is very rare for bail to be granted pending appeal (See Rex v A. BITLR 118 and I Hassanali v Rep. [1968] H C D 174).

After perusing the record, I am not convinced that there are overwhelming chances of A success in the appeal preferred by the applicant. The evidence consists of eye witnesses supported by documents. There may be chances of the appeal succeeding in this case but not overwhelming chances of success.

There is nothing on the record of the lower court which indicates that the appeal is B bound to succeed. The reason advanced for the release of the appellant on bail pending appeal is that the appeal has overwhelming chances of success. But this reason advanced for the bail application is not present in this case where there is both oral and C documentary evidence connecting the appellant with the offences charged. Consequently this application cannot succeed and it is dismissed.

Kisanga, Makame and Omar, JJ.A: This appeal arises from the judgement of the High Court (Mtenga, J.) finding for the respondent in an action for libel and awarding C him damages to the tune of shs. 200,000/-. The appeal is only against the quantum of damages, too excessive but the respondent has, at the same time cross-appealed on the in-adequacy of the award.
The trial judge found that the respondent was entitled to recover substantial damages in respect of a libel published by the second appellant in a newspaper owned by the first D appellant. Arguing the appeal before us Mrs. Mneney for the appellants complained that the award was excessive. However, we could find no merit in that contention. In arriving at the award the High Court took into account a number of factors including the wide circulation of the newspaper in which the libel was published, the refusal by the E appellants to tender an apology despite repeated invitations to do so, the loss of a prospective charcoal business overseas, the respondent's various sources of income before the publication of the libel - making allowance for possible exaggeration - and the F failure by the respondent to show the loss in his income as a result of the publication. We think that all these were pertinent and relevant considerations. The respondent had asked for one million shillings general damages but the High Court assessed it at shs. 200,000/-. Bearing in mind the factors as set above, we think that the award was quite G justified, and counsel has advanced no grounds for alleging that it was excessive.
The respondent was represented in this appeal by Mr. E. Mbuya the learned advocate who had also appeared for him in the High Court. Mr. Mbuya's main contention in the cross-appeal was that in assessing the award, the learned trial judge failed to take into H account the aspect of inflation which had caused a fall in the value of the shilling from 1979 when the plaint was filed to 1986 when the award was made. In our view this complaint is equally without merit. We think that in the absence of ruling to the contrary an award in a judgement is deemed to be based on the value of the shilling as at the date I of the award. When making the award in the present case in 1986 the learned judge did not say that he was basing the award on the A value of the shilling in 1979, and indeed there is nothing in the judgement to suggest so. In the circumstances, therefore, he must properly be taken to have based on the award of Shs. 200,000/= on the value of the shilling as at the time he was making the award in B 1986. We can find no ground at all for Mr. Mbuya's suggestion to the contrary.

In the result we are satisfied that both the appeal and the cross-appeal are without substance, and are accordingly dismissed. As neither the appeal nor the cross-appeal was successful, it is further ordered that each party shall bear his or its own costs.

Mr. Lakha prayed for his costs which Mr. Mkatte resisted, submitting that under Rule 95(4) of the Court of Appeal Rules no costs are payable. We rather think that the intention was to say that the costs are not payable except under sub-rule (4).

Withdrawal of appeals in civil matters is governed by Rule 95. Mr. Mkate duly C complied with Rule 95(1) when, on 10th June 1987, he lodged his written Notice indicating his client's intention not to prosecute the appeal. On the Written Notice Mr. Mkate indicated that M/s Lakha & Company would be served with a copy of the D Notice. We are not told whether or not they were in fact served. What we are told is that Mr. Lakha orally consented to the withdrawal. It is clear that Mr. Lakha's written consent, in terms of subrule (3), was not obtained. If Mr. Mkate had so obtained Mr. Lakha's consent, the appeal would have been struck out of the list of pending appeals. E This would have been without costs, or, as is often the case, upon terms agreed upon by the parties as to costs, as contained in the consent document.

In the present matter the situation is therefore governed by sub-rule (4), so that the appeal shall stand dismissed with costs unless we order otherwise. We could only order F otherwise if the appellant had applied to us within fourteen days after the lodging of the notice of the withdrawal, in this case any time between 10th June and the day appointed for the hearing of the appeal. This was not done, and in any event we are not inclined to deny the respondent his costs.

OMAR JA

Balonzi, for respondents A

[zJDz]Judgment

Omar, J.A.: This is an appeal by Mechanical Installations and Engineering Company Limited against the winding up order of the High Court dated 4th November, 1986. Before this appeal was heard, Mr Balonzi, learned Counsel for the respondents (Mr. B Maporo the Creditor and Mr. Lwiza the Liquidator) raised a preliminary objection. Firstly that the company is incompetent to appeal because with the winding up the directors of the company are dismissed. He quoted Palmer's Company Law, twenty third edition - page 1138 para 85/28: C

The winding up order has the further effect of terminating the employment of servants and other agents of the company. The directors are similarly dismissed and their powers to act on behalf of the company ceases.

Three cases were cited by Palmer to illustrate the meaning of the ceasure of the powers D of directors. They are:

1. In re Union Accident Insurance Co. [1972] 1 WLR 640
2. Re Mawcon Ltd [1969] 1 WLR 72
3. Fowler v Bread Patent Night Light Co. [1983] E

In re Union Insurance it was held that, notwithstanding the appointment of a provisional liquidator, on a winding up, the Board of Directors of a Company retained the residual powers to instruct solicitor and Counsel to oppose the petition and to appeal against the F order and also to act in interlocutory proceedings including a motion to discharge the provisional liquidator.

In Re Mawcon Ltd. [1969] 1 WLR 72 it was held that the order of the court which the provisional liquidator had obtained, authorising the directors to continue the company's G business was an effective appointment. The appointment was for some definite duration and subject to the directors making some undertakings.

Mr. Rutashobya, learned counsel for the appellant, in reply to Mr. Balonzi's submission that directors' functions and powers cease with the winding up order, quoted the H following case from Palmer's Company Law - Re Diamond Fuel (1979) 13 Ch.D 400 C.A in which it was held that although a liquidator had been appointed, the company was not precluded from appealing. Where a Company also appeals from a winding up order without joining any person responsible for costs, an application for I security for costs will be entertained.

OMAR JA

This was very effective reply to Mr Balonzi's assertion that in the circumstances of this A case under which the winding up order was made, the company is incompetent to appeal. We are satisfied the company can appeal, provided security for costs is given.

The second was that as this suit was instituted under the Companies Ordinance, the appellant would have to obtain leave of the High Court, which was not obtained, under B section 5(1)(c) of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act and rule 44 of the Court of Appeal Rules.

Thirdly, the Notice of Appeal was irregular as it was directed at Mr. Lwiza, the liquidator. Later Mr. Balonzi conceded that he received this notice as the advocate of C the Creditor, Mr. Maporo, and he was also defending the liquidator by the way of safeguarding the interests of his client Mr. Maporo. But he added, the notice of appeal was filed very late, three months after the order of winding up, and there is no indication that extension of time to file it was applied for. D

Mr. Rutashobya in his reply stated that Mr. Balonzi must make an application for objection to the filing of appeal, supported by affidavit according to the first schedule of the Rules. He quoted rules 46(1), 82 and 100 of the Court of Appeal Rules. Therefore, E Mr Rutashobya continued, Mr Balonzi's application for the appeal to be stuck out should not be entertained, and rule 3(1) and rule 106 of the Court of Appeal Rules which Mr. Balonzi sought to rely on came too late in the day. Mr Rutashobya further explained that he did not seek leave of the Court to lodge the appeal because he did not F know that he has to send that the previous advocate who handles this case had applied to the court to have the expert winding up order set aside instead of seeking leave to appeal against the said order.

It is apparent that both Counsel have not proceeded with due diligence in the G presentation of this matter. Mr. Rutashobya was late in filing the notice of appeal and did not apply for extension of time to file the notice, nor has he made any application to the High Court to raise the preliminary objection. Mr. Balonzi failed to give reasonable notice of the objection to the court and to the other party in compliance with Rule 100 H and Rule 46 of the Rules. Although under rules 3(1) and 100 of the Rules we have discretion to adjourn the matter to enable Mr. Balonzi to file the appropriate notice in respect of the preliminary objection, we consider that is not a fit case for the exercise of that discretion. The delay in the filing of notice of appeal and the absence of any I application to extend the time for filing of the notice of appeal and the absence of any application to extend the A time of filing of the notice, and , worse still, the absence of leave to appeal by the High court in the cause are matters which clearly render the intended appeal incompetent.

In which case it would be futile to adjourn to accommodate Mr. Balonzi. B
These flaws were so fundamental that even if they were not raised by Mr. Balonzi we would have taken cognizance of them and strike out the appeal as being incompetent, which we hereby do. Costs to the respondent.
In perusing the proceedings, we could not help noticing certain features which appear to C us to be irregular. The application to have Mr. Lwiza appointed a provisional liquidator had been dismissed by Kazimoto, J. and, going by the record, there was no subsequent application for the appointment of a liquidator. More so in view of Mr. Balonzi's concession that the winding up order could have been made without necessary D at the same time appointing a liquidator, in which event the official receiver would have stepped in.
Another startling feature is that Mr. Balonzi is shown to be counsel for both respondents, the liquidator and the creditor, whose interests are not necessarily identical. Furthermore, a liquidator is also duty- bound to look after the interests of the company E ordered to be wound up. It is unusual for counsel to act for both a Creditor and the Liquidator. In our view, therefore, Mr. Balonzi's involvement with both respondents was quite improper; to say the least.
F Appeal dismissed.

Mahatane, for appellant A

Lobulu, for first respondent

Ihema for the second respondent

Mapigano, Ag. J.A.,Mustafa and Omar, JJ.A. : This is an appeal from the B judgement of the High court at Arusha (Chua, J) dated 31.5.86, dismissing the petition of Emmanuel Abrahamu Nanyaro, the appellant herein, and awarding costs to the respondents i.e Peniel Ole Saitabau (hereinafter referred to as the first respondent) and the Hon. the Attorney General of Tanzania. The appellant and the first respondent were C candidates in the parliamentary election for the Arumeru constituency that was held on 27.10.85. Upon the conclusion of the counting of the votes and after the result of the election had been ascertained the first respondent, who was the incumbent, was declared re-elected. The first respondent polled 41,022 votes against the appellant's 36,217. D

The appellant was dissatisfied and he brought a petition in the High Court seeking the nullification of the election. He included the Attorney General as a second respondent. In the High Court the appellant was represented by Messrs Jonathan Shayo and Mahatane, Messrs Lobulu and Ojare appeared for the first respondent; and Messrs E Mlawa and Kimongoro appeared for the Attorney General. Mr. Mahatane and Mr. Lobulu have been retained by the appellant and the first respondent, respectively, to argue this appeal. The Attorney General is represented by Mr. Ihema.

The appellant challenged the victory of the first respondent on several grounds, some of F which he expressly or impliedly abandoned in the course of the proceedings in the High Court. Those grounds can suitably be classified into and discussed under three categories i.e illegal campaigns on the part of the first respondent at certain rallies; illegal G campaigns and corrupt practices on the part of the first respondent carried out in his office; and what was termed as disenfranchisement as well as irregularities at certain polling stations. In his judgement the learned trial judge held that the allegations of illegal campaign and corrupt practices were not established to his satisfaction. He found that H only 60 voters were deprived of their right to vote due to the non-availability of ballot papers. He held, however, that this shortcoming did not affect the results of the election in view of the fact that the margin of victory was 4,805 votes.

This appeal has been brought on eleven grounds. But Mr. Mahatane has found it I convenient to argue it generally and not ground by ground, and properly so in our view, as some of the grounds are intimately A intertwined.

Mr. Mahatane has attacked the findings of the High Court in respect of the alleged illegal campaigns at the rallies. In the petition the appellant set out four such allegations. The first is that "the first respondent throughout the period of the official campaign made unsolicited false and/or B exaggerated claims with respect to development projects started in the constituency during his previous tenure of office". The second allegation is that "the first respondent throughout the period of official campaign corruptly promised his audiences that if re-elected he would continue to raise funds and to direct all his efforts to complete the C said projects". The third allegation is that "the first respondent throughout the period of the official campaign wrongfully induced the electorate by making false and/or exaggerated claims that he had been instrumental in getting His Excellency the President of the United Republic to revoke leases of nine farms previously owned by public and D private companies and to regrant those farms to people living within the constituency". And the fourth allegation is that "the first respondent in reference to the farms referred to above corruptly promised that if re-elected he would see to it that the farms were E reallocated to individuals living within the constituency." Four corresponding issues were framed and recorded by the court and basically the question posed in each issue was whether the first respondent had actually made such claims and promises.

According to the evidence adduced by the appellant himself, the first respondent made F such claims and promises at three campaign rallies, namely at Makuyuni Oljoro and at Olasiti on 20.10.85, and at Karangai Maweni on 23.10.85. The appellant alleged that at Mbuyuni the first respondent, at the beginning of his speech, made reference to the Oljoro dispensary and to nine farms situated at Oljoro that were previously held by G public and private companies and whose rights or leases had been revoked by the President. He stated that the first respondent told the gathering that he had looked for 220,000/- for the completion of the dispensary and that he and his colleagues had seen the President and prompted him to revoke the leases, and that he promised that the nine H farms would be regranted to some of the residents of Oljoro. The testimony of his witness P.W.10 Edward Msangi was similar except that he did not mention the President in regard to the nine farms.

The first respondent denied the allegations. He stated that the only occasion when he I talked about the dispensary was when he was answering a question from the audience. He had been asked what he had done, A as a Member of Parliament, to have the construction of the dispensary completed. He said that his answer was that there were plans to have the construction completed. He denied that he went further to say that he had obtained a sum of shs. 220,000/- for that B project. D.W. 21 Saidi Tillya, the Chairman of Oljoro, gave evidence on his side, lending him support.

The appellant alleged that the first respondent made similar remarks about the dispensary and the nine farms at the Olasiti rally. He called P.W.9 Azizi Abdallah who backed him C up. But like P.W.10 Edward Msangi's, the evidence of P.W.9 was silent on the role the President had played in making the nine farms available to the residents of Oljoro.

The first respondent's version was different. He told the court that the only occasion on which he made mention of the nine farms at that rally was when he was again responding D to a question about a certain list of landless people that had been forwarded to the District Headquarters. He recalled telling the crowd that the Government had agreed, upon certain conditions being satisfied, to revoke the leases in respect of those nine farms and that upon the satisfaction of the conditions the farms would be apportioned to E those listed. He denied that he mentioned the sum of 220,000/- in connection with the dispensary. Again D.W. 21 Saidi Tillya, who attended that meeting, gave evidence that substantially supported the version of the first respondent. F

The campaign meeting at Karangai Maweni was held on 23.10.85. If we go by the evidence of the appellant and his witness P.W. 12 David Urassa, there, as at Mbuyuni and Olasiti, the first respondent disclosed to the rally, in the course of his main address, that he had secured a sum of Shs. 100,000/= for the construction of a cattle dip and a G clinic, and that he asked the crowd to re-elect him so that he may complete the projects he had started. He produced P.W. 14 Msee Kipanga whose testimony was parallel except that he did not mention a cattle dip.

The first respondent admitted that he said something about a cattle dip at that rally, but H denied having said anything about a clinic, pointing out that there was already one at that place.

He said that he had been asked a question by one person relating to the project of converting a certain trench into a cattle dip, which project still remained on the drawing board. He said that was the occasion he referred to the sum of shs. 100,000/= I that had been allocated to the project by the appropriate district authorities. His account found support in the testimony of D.W.9 william Moringe, whose power of recollection A favourably impressed the trial judge.
MAPIGANO Ag JA, MUSTAFA JJA AND OMAR JJA
The first respondent also tendered the minutes of the review meetings, exhibit D.15 in answer to the allegations levelled against him. These were minutes of the meetings of the District Political Committee of the Party that were held almost every morning during the period of the B official campaign. As is now well-known, the District Political Committee of the Party is the organ that is legally charged with the organization and conduct of the election campaign. Ordinarily meetings of that committee are held on a daily basis during the period of campaign to discuss the business of the campaign in the constituency and C review what has taken place. In the discharge of these functions the Committee listens to any misgivings, grievances and comments of any of those who are officially concerned, including the two candidates. This, incidentally, is one of the distinct features D that characterize the Tanzanian Parliamentary electoral process.
It is to be observed again that the campaign meetings at Mbuyuni and Olasiti took place on 20.10.85. According to exhibit D.15, whose accuracy was not challenged, there was such a review meeting on 21.10.85 in the morning. Nothing was said by the E appellant about the false and/or exaggerated claims and promised which the first respondent allegedly made at those two rallies. It is to be observed also, as the trial judge did, that the Karangai rally was held on 23.10.85 as was the rally at a place called Makiba. Now in the review meeting that was held in the morning of 24.10.85 the F appellant did not, likewise, raise any complaint in respect of the Karangai rally, though he is on record as having raised a complaint of that nature in regard to the rally at Makiba, which complaint, however, was not a subject of any of the particulars set forth in the petition. G
The learned judge reviewed and appraised the evidence. In his vantage position the judge was not satisfied by the veracity of the witnesses called by the appellant. He noticed some discrepancies in their evidence. He pointed out, for instance, that with regard to the Mbuyuni and Olasiti rallies, P.W.9 Azizi Abdallah and P.W.10 Edward H Msangi had, unlike the appellant, not mentioned the President. The judge considered D.W. 21 Saidi Tillya to be a reliable witness. And with regard to the Karangai rally, the judge preferred the version of the first respondent which as observed found support in the evidence of D.W 9 William Moringe. The judge also adverted to exhibit D.15 and I then took the view that the absence of any complaint in those minutes about what was allegedly spoken by the first respondent at A those rallies cast a real reasonable doubt in the case of the appellant.

The judge concluded by saying, in effect, that statements like "I have seen the President in connection with the nine farms at Oljoro and the President has in consequence B revoked the leases in respect of those farms and the farms will be granted to the residents of the area... were not objectionable and did not in the least offend the provision of section 97(a) of the Elections Act, 1985, as it was a true statement and not made with any intention to induce any voter to vote and so on. C

The gravamen of the appeal in regard to the alleged illegal campaigns at the rallies is against the learned judge's finding on the credibility of the witnesses. Indeed, Mr. Mahatane has put in the forefront of his argument the submission that the judge erred in D disbelieving the witnesses called by the appellant generally, and that the reasons given by the judge for doing so were bad. He has argued that if the words attributed to the first respondent by the appellant and his witnesses are true, then they constituted illegal campaigns and practices on the part of the first respondent and that they sufficed to void E the election under section 97(a) and 108 (3)(a) of the Elections Act, 1985.

In fact Mr. Lobulu had taken a preliminary point in the High Court before the hearing started. He submitted at some length that the allegations in questions were what he described as "innocuous" and that they did not afford the appellant a reasonable ground F of complaint under the Election Act. Mr. Mlawa who, as shown, represented the Attorney General expressed a similar view. The judge was not persuaded and in his ruling dated 3.4.86 he stated that he was not prepared at that stage to say that the acts complained of were harmless. G

We have considered the judgment of the High Court. In principle we are unable to fault the decision of the learned judge. The judge believed the evidence produced by the first respondent. Some of the reasons that he gave for believing that evidence seem to us to H be sound. The failure by P.W. 9 Azizi Abdallah and P.W.10 Edward Msangi to make any reference to the President in respect of what the first respondent had told the meetings at Mbuyuni and Olasiti about the nine farms was clearly a material detracting circumstances. We are disposed to think that a statement to such meetings and at such I places to the effect that the President had at the instance of a candidate revoked the leases of the farms is doubtless the kind of statement that would have made a great impact and impression in A the mind of any attentive listener. It is not the sort of thing which would have been easily forgotten. Land appears to have been an exciting subject. The appellant himself told the court that the problem of scarcity of land in that area was a vexing one and of long-standing. As stated earlier, the appellant did not complain to the B Committee at the review meetings and the absence of any complaint by the appellant in exhibit D.15 also detracted from the credence of the appellant's case.

We have had a look at section 97(a) of the Election Act. We share the view of the learned judge that all that the first respondent said at the three rallies, as recounted by the C first respondent and his witnesses, was fair and square and did not offend the provision of that section. We have also had a look at section 51(A) of that Act, which enjoins the organizers of the election campaign to accord a fair and equal opportunity to each of the candidates. We are unable to read into the terms of that sub-section any D allusion to a requirement that a candidate should not address the rallies about his real achievements. We put the questions: What is an election campaign all about. Is it not true that the whole object of such a campaign is to enable the electorate to intelligibly assess and rate the competence of the candidates? And can it be sensibly denied the E past performance or non-performance is one of the usual and vital factors that the ordinary voter would invariably take into consideration in such an exercise?

Before we leave this part of the appeal we will say a few words in regard to Mr. F Lobulu's submission about the pleadings. We are unable to agree with Mr. Lobulu's contention that the pleadings in respect of those allegations should have been struck out at the beginning.

As we have already pointed out, a preliminary point was taken in that regard before the G start of the hearing. It is elementary that at that stage the judge could only look at the pleadings in the petition and nothing else. In principle he had to decide the point on the footing that the allegations of the appellant in the petition were true in manner and form. The appellant used the words "corruptly" or "wrongfully" in those pleadings and we feel H that he thereby sufficiently disclosed causes of complaint. In our view, therefore, the judge was right in overruling the preliminary objection.

But that is not to say that the petition is perfect in every respect. As we have had occasion to remark at the hearing of this appeal, the petition can, in form, hardly lay I claim to elegance, and it could have been better drafted and should have contained details of the campaign meetings in A which the words were spoken as well as the dates on which those meetings took place.

We turn to the allegations of the illegal campaigns and corrupt practices committed by the first respondent in his office. The allegations were that "the first respondent B throughout the period between the dissolution of the National Assembly in the month of July and the polling day used the office normally used by the Member of Parliament for the constituency as a base for conducting illegal campaigns and corrupt practices by distributing and/or purportedly selling scarce commodities to prospective voters. The C first respondent, apparently ex abundanti cautela, denied the allegations in a Written Answer (there is no requirement at law to file such an Answer), stating that during the period in question he occasionally visited that office to collect mail and "for like bonafide D pursuits" and that he disclosed the same to the appropriate authorities. The point, which apparently remains unresolved and which is not the concern of the court, is whether a former Member of Parliament can use the office that had been allocated to him during the tenure of office after Parliament has been dissolved.

The principal witnesses for the appellant were P.W.2 Ataiwa Luka, P.W.4 Afrael E Reuben Kaaya, P.W.5 Edward Mbise and P.W.6 Akyoo Joseph Anael. All these resided at a place called Kingori and that might mean something. The learned judge felt that it was unsafe to act on the evidence of these witnesses and he stated his reasons. F What may be observed straightaway is that none of the witnesses claimed to have obtained such goods from the first respondent without giving adequate money value in exchange.

P.W.2 Ataiwa testified that he bought 10 iron sheets and 5 ridges from the first respondent for a sum of Shs.1,700/=, the transaction taking place in the office in G question, which was situated in the District Party Building, at the beginning of October, 1985. That was after he had given an undertaking to campaign for the first respondent. Ataiwa was a complete stranger to the first respondent and he said that the transaction took about five minutes. By his own repeated and explicit admission, Ataiwa would not H hesitate to tell a lie when it suits him.

The testimony of P.w.4 Afrael showed that he called at the office of the first respondent in mid-October, 1985, upon being informed by Ataiwa of the availability of the iron sheets at that office. He found the first respondent in there and he told him that he was in I need of iron sheets. The first respondent replied and said that he could sell the iron sheets to him if and when he procured five people each A prepared to buy 10 sheets and to campaign for him. He went back to Kingori and looked for the five people. He only succeeded to get one, that is P.W.5 Edward. The two went to see the first respondent in his office. According to them, the first respondent refused to sell the sheets to them, telling Afrael that he had not fully met his condition. B

The trial judge found the accounts of Afrael and Edward contradictory on the point whether there was any further talking in that office after the first respondent had declined to sell the sheets to the two men. What also happened is that under cross-examination C Afrael misdescribed the location of the District Party Building and the judge was apparently left in serious doubt as to whether Afrael had ever visited that place. And the judge took into consideration the testimony of D.W.16 Isaac Mathias to the effect that round that time P.W.5 Edward was undergoing treatment in the hospital after sustaining D a leg fracture.

The other witness, i .e P.W.6. Akyoo, told the court that he bought 16 iron sheets and 4 ridges from the first respondent in the latter's office in early October 1985. He claimed that he paid a price of Shs. 2,500/=. Like P.W.4 Afrael, this witness did not come off E well under cross-examination. His story that the sheets he purchased were meant for roofing his wattle house that had been daubed long before he bought the sheets made little sense to the learned judge. The judge remarked in the following lines: F

> The court takes judicial notice of the fact that a house daubed with mud unless roofed would have by October 1985 been so badly damaged by rains in this part of the world that no person in his proper frame of mind would do that P.W.6 allegedly did. P.W.6 did not even thatch the G alleged house with grass and wanted this court to believe that he did what he asserted.

The first respondent denied that he had sold any iron sheets to any of the witnesses. Indeed, he denied ever meeting any of them before. The judge found for him. H

The question that arises on this appeal is whether the learned judge was wrong in his refusal to accept the evidence of the four witnesses called by the appellant. The issue involved was a factual one and as a matter of elementary principle we have to make due allowance for the fact that the judge had seen and heard the witnesses while we have not. I

MAPIGANO Ag JA, MUSTAFA JJA AND OMAR JJA
Obviously P.W.2 Ataiwa was an unreliable witness. What fell from his own mouth A portrayed him as an unprincipled character. There were conflicts and inconsistencies in the evidence of P.W.4 Afrael and P.W.5 Edward. The court was asked to believe the story that the first respondent, who readily sold some sheets to two complete strangers, B P.W.2 Ataiwa and P.W.6 Akyoo, without attaching any condition, would almost at the same period put a condition on the sale of the same kind of goods to P.W.4 Afrael. The learned judge was entitled to reject the evidence of these witnesses and he did so.
As pointed out already, the petition charged the first respondent with corruptly C distributing and/or purportedly selling scarce goods between July, 1985 and polling day i.e 27.10.85. The first respondent admitted that during that period he had helped certain people by procuring iron sheets and ridges from M/S GALCO of Dar es Salaam which, D we are given to understand, is a subsidiary of M/s Aluminium Africa Ltd. It seemed that iron sheets were very difficult to come by and the appellant's help was needed. He said that he had the goods conveyed to Moshi by rail and that he subsequently handed over the same to certain individuals whom he named. That took place in October, E 1985. He happened to be a Director of the Tanzania Railways Corporation and by reasons of such office, he said, the goods were transported free of charge. He was candid enough to disclose that was the first time for him to do such a thing.
The lot he brought from GALCO went to D.W.3 Esther Melami, a widow of his F personal friend who had paid GALCO for them in February, 1985, D.W.6 Helena Francis, his niece who was also a widow, who had paid for them in October, 1984; D.W.8 John Lyimo an acquaintance, who had paid for them in July, 1985, and D.W.18 G Amina Laizer, a sickly woman, who had paid for them in May, 1985. Some of these people had been looking for the goods since 1983 or 1984. The first respondent also forthrightly admitted that he had the sheets of D.W.3 Esther and D.W.6 Helena delivered to their homes free. Oral and documentary evidence that was adduced by H those four people supported the first respondent's testimony.
The first respondent's evidence went on to show that in August, 1985 he procured 90 ridges for the Sura Lutheran Church and had them sent free to Arusha from Dar es Salaam by a lorry belonging to M/s Tanzania Dairies Ltd. of which company he was also I a Director. The ridges had been purchased by the Church months back and they were collected from his office by the clergyman D.W.2 Isaac A Mbise who, incidentally, refused to take the oath in the witnesses-box, citing the Biblical Second Commandment.
MAPIGANO Ag JA, MUSTAFA JJA AND OMAR JJA
There was no evidence that the first respondent ever solicited for votes at the time he was handing over the sheets in question. And there was clear evidence that all those B people who received the sheets and the ridges from or through the first respondent had actually paid the manufacturers M/S GALCO the price for the goods.

The learned judge appreciated the fact that those individuals and the Sura Lutheran Church derived some benefit by way of service rendered by the first respondent and the C waiver of the freight charges. He took the view, however, that the services were gratuitous and he found no evidence that the first respondent's conduct was calculated to induce those beneficiaries to vote for him at the election. In reaching that finding the judge took into consideration the fact that the first respondent had agreed to help them D long before Parliament was dissolved, the fact that some of them were related to him and the fact that he enjoyed the privilege of transporting his goods free by virtue of being a Director of the Railway Corporation and the Tanzania Dairies. E

The learned judge was referred to the observation of this court in the case of Chrisant Majiyatanga Mzindakaya v Gilbert Louis Ngua, civil Appeal No. 22/81 (unreported), that there is nothing objectionable in a Member of Parliament assisting his constituents in their social development. F

We are satisfied, as was the learned judge, that the services the first respondent rendered constituted valuable consideration within the meaning of paragraphs (a) and (f) of section 97 of the Election Act. However the vital question is whether the first respondent was actuated by corrupt or illegal motive, namely a desire to induce those G beneficiaries to vote for him at the election. This point was forcefully canvassed before the High Court and the learned judge went into the matter at considerable length in his judgment. The judge was satisfied that there was no corrupt or illegal motive.

Mr. Mahatane has submitted that a corrupt motive was inferable from the circumstances H that attended the procurement and the deliveries of the goods. The question is whether that inference is irresistible. Mr. Mahatane has laid some stress on the fact that the free transport was unsolicited and the fact that the deliveries almost coincided with I the beginning of the official election campaign. There is some force in that argument. We are of the view that the judge had considered all the relevant factors and circumstances relating to A this matter and that he was justified in arriving at the conclusion he did. It was possible to infer a corrupt motive, as Mr. Mahatane contended, but we are far from being persuaded that the circumstances pointed irresistibly and inevitably to a corrupt motive. B Indeed the circumstances, in the context of the situation, were equally, if not more, consistent with innocence.

Understandably we were not addressed on the issue of disenfranchisement. We have read the evidence pertaining to this point and we may briefly say this. We entirely agree C with the finding of the trial judge that only 60 people were unable to exercise their right to vote, on account of the shortage of ballot papers at Olkungwedo and Ambaroni polling stations. This did not affect the results of the election, given the margin of victory.

For the reasons we have stated above, this appeal is dismissed with costs. D

Maina, J.: This is an appeal by Nicholaus Alfred Kiyabo against conviction on nineteen counts of obtaining credit by false pretences for which he was sentenced to five years imprisonment on each count, to be served concurrently.
The appellant was an office manager employed by the National Housing Corporation. F Among his duties was to make hotel reservations for expatriate staff and other officers. In 1984, the appellant reserved a room in the New Africa Hotel for some expatriate G officers who were working under the National Housing Corporation. The appellant sent the visitor to the New Africa Hotel where they were allocated Room No. 527. He introduced them to P.W.7 Mshindo Salum, a receptionist at the hotel. The appellant used to go to the hotel to see the guests he had sent there.

On various dates in January 1985, the appellant obtained drinks and he signed for them in the invoices debiting Room. No. 527. The waiters at the hotel, PW3 Simon Mgaya, H PW4 Ramadhani Manga, PW5 Alois Sema and PW7 Ali Ramadhani said that they served the appellant with the drinks. The appellant instructed them to write the invoices on each occasion, in the presence of the bar attendants. Later, PW1 Mshindo who had moved to the credit I control section of the hotel, found that the bill for drinks for occupier of the room was A becoming very high.

The National Housing Corporation was responsible to pay for the room and breakfast only. There were no arrangements for the occupier to have drinks on credit. When Mshindo contacted them, they denied that they ordered the drinks. They also denied to B have signed the invoices. The Kisarawe Bricks Factory General Manager PW8 Samwel Nkwabi Ngwano and the National Housing Corporation Deputy General Manager, PW9 Andrew Shitindi, said that the appellant, as an office manager, had no authority to order drinks on credit for anyone in the hotel. All that the expatriate officers C were entitled to get was accommodation and breakfast paid for by the National Housing Corporation and later by the Kisarawe Brick Factory which became a subsidiary company after 1984. The bills allegedly signed by the appellant have not been paid for. In other words the New Africa Hotel remain unpaid up to now. The D invoices were tendered in the trial court as exhibits.

The appellant denied the charge by alleging that he did not order or receive the drinks. He denied that he signed the invoices, and claims that it is the responsibility of the bar attendants.

I think the conviction was based on credibility of the witnesses and on the documentary E evidence. Mr. Mwakasungula, learned counsel for the appellant, argued that the bar attendants should not be believed and that there was no sufficient evidence to prove the appellant's signature. On the bar attendants, I have this to say. The trial magistrate saw F them, was impressed they were witnesses of truth and he believed them. They are the persons who supplied the drinks to the appellant on different dates in January, 1985. They knew the appellant, as they had seen him on various occasions when he sent guests to the hotel. The witnesses received the orders from the appellant and they supplied him G with the drinks. I can see no reason to disbelieve them.

As regards the signatures on the invoices which were tendered as exhibits, the witnesses saw the appellant signing on every occasion the drinks were supplied to him. PW3 Simon Mganga, for example, said that on 1.1.1985 the appellant went to the bar with his H guests, not the expatriate officers, and he ordered drinks and the appellant signed in the presence of the witnesses. Similarly, PW4 Ramadhani said that the appellant signed the invoices on 14.1.85 and on each of the subsequent dates when the witness gave the appellant drinks as ordered. So the evidence established that the appellant signed the I invoices in the presence of the bar attendants who supplied him with the drinks. It was therefore not necessary to call for handwriting A expert or someone acquainted with the appellant's signature. Section 49 of the Evidence Act is not relevant. What I think is relevant is section 69 of the Evidence Act, 1967 which provides as follows:

If a document is alleged to be signed or to have been written wholly or in part by any person, B the signature or the handwriting of the document as is alleged to be in that person's handwriting must be proved to be in his hand-writing.

In my opinion, the trial magistrate was perfectly right in holding that the oral evidence of C the bar attendants or waiters who supplied the appellant with the drinks on the various dates and who saw him sign the invoices, proved that the signature was that of the appellant. The appellant's mere denial did not cast any doubt on the prosecution evidence. D

The conviction is supported by the evidence and the sentence is not by any means excessive. The total sum stolen in all counts amount to Shs. 100,453/=. The sentence was proper. E

Kazimoto, J.: Mohamed Abdallah and Omari Issa whom I will refer to as the first and second accused respectively pleaded guilty to two counts under the Transport Licencing E Act No. 1 of 1973 and two counts under the Motor Vehicle Insurance Ordinance Cap 169 of the Laws. The first accused was the driver and the second accused the owner of the motor vehicle. In the counts under the Transport Licencing Act the first accused was sentenced to a fine of Shs 1,000/= or 4 months imprisonment in default and F second accused was fined to pay shs 1,500/= or 4 months jail in default. They were also sentenced to pay shs 500.- and shs. 600/- respectively or three months jail each for the offences falling under Cap. 169. The first accused was disqualified from holding or obtaining a driving licence for 12 months and the second accused was exempted from G such disqualification as it was found that he had advanced special reasons. The record has been called up for revision of sentence in respect of the counts under the Motor Vehicle Insurance Ordinance, Cap. 169 of the Laws.

The learned State Attorney has urged that the sentences imposed in the counts in H question were inadequate taking into account the seriousness of the offence. Both accused have stated, as they did in the court below, that they are first offenders and have families to support. I agree with the learned State Attorney. An offence of driving a I motor vehicle without third part insurance risks is more dangerous than driving a motor vehicle without TLB. The dangers involved in the event of an accident occurring are far too great. I have taken A into account the fact that accused are first offenders. I will therefore set aside the sentence imposed in respect of counts 2 and 4 and instead substitute a sentence of a fine of shs. 1,500/= or six months jail in default for first accused on count two and as for the second accused he is sentenced to a fine of shs. 2,000/= or six months imprisonment on B count four. Needless to say that as they have already paid the fines imposed by the District Court, they are now to pay the difference between the present sentence and that imposed by the District Court.

Another point which calls for decision in whether the learned Principal District C Magistrate was right in exempting the second accused from disqualification. In mitigation against disqualification the second accused stated that he was not driving the motor vehicle, that the motor vehicle was being driven to a garage and that his family depend on driving the said motor vehicle. The learned State Attorney submitted that these are D not special reasons.

First it must be pointed out that the learned Principal District Magistrate was quite aware of the mandatory provisions of section 4(2) of the Motor Vehicle Insurance Ordinance. Next it should be added that the obligation to take out third part insurance cover rests on E the owner of the motor vehicle and not the driver. Therefore the fact that the second accused was not driving the motor vehicle does not afford special reasons. In this respect the learned Principal District Magistrate has erred in finding special reasons.
The second accused has stated that he had a family which depend on his licence as a F means of livelihood. The learned State Attorney has submitted that this is not a special reason as much as it does not relate to the offence. In other words he is stating that special reasons must be special to the offence and not to the accused person. He referred the court to the case of Whittal v Kirby [1964] 2 All ER 552 and Angelo G Muyagi v R. [1970] HCD No. 60.
There is a rich authority on whether special reasons must be special to the offence only or whether it must be special also to the offender. In Kingombe v R. [1969] EA 532 Bramble, J. held that testing a vehicle after effecting repairs does not constitute special H reasons. In that case the appellant was convicted of driving a motor vehicle on the public road without third part insurance c/s 4(1) and (2) of the Motor Vehicle Insurance Ordinance. On appeal against disqualification order the appellant contended that the vehicle was being tested after undergoing repairs and that this constituted I
KAMIZOTO J
"special reasons". In dealing with the issue before him the learned judge stated: A

I can do no better than refer to an English case Gardner v James [1948] 2 ALL ER 1069 in which the defendant was anxious to test a motor cycle which he had just bought and B assembled himself. It has no insurance and the defendant pleaded guilty to a charge of using a motor vehicle without third part insurance. On appeal it was held that testing a vehicle in those circumstances did not constitute "special reasons" entitling the justices to refuse to suspend the licence. C
Then he went on to observe that the offence was a serious one exposing users of the road to great risks in that if they were injured they would get no compensation. In the present case the accused has pleaded that he was taking the motor vehicle to a garage. D The learned trial magistrate wrongly found this as amounting to special reasons.
Then comes the case of Lawrence Maliki v R. [1973] LRT No. 12. In this case the appellant was charged, among other offences, with causing death by dangerous driving E c/ss 44 (A) and 70 of the Traffic Ordinance Cap. 168 as amended by Act 41 of 1964. He was convicted and disqualified from holding or obtaining a driving licence for 18 months. The appellant appealed against the disqualification order on the ground that he depended on his licence for his livelihood. Onyiuke, J, stated that "the fact that he F depends on driving for his livelihood is not a special reason for not making the order of disqualification."

Lugakingira Ag. J. (as he then was) stated the matter more decisively that special reasons must be reasons connected with the offence itself and not with the offender. In G Joachim Gregory v R. [1975] LRT 44 the appellant was charged with and convicted of causing death by reckless and dangerous driving c/ss 44 A(1)(a) and 70 of the Traffic Ordinance Cap. 168. He was disqualified from driving for six months. He appealed. In dealing with "special reasons" the learned judge stated "In a string of H authorities which need not be cited this court has laid it down that special reasons must be reasons connected with the offence itself and not the accused". And in Shilli Kisabu v R. [1977] LRT N 60 the appellant was convicted of reckless driving and driving while under the influence of drink or drugs. He was sentenced and also disqualified from I driving. He advanced the following reasons for non-disqualification, that it was his first accident, and he has a large family to support. In A dismissing the appeal against the disqualification the learned judge stated and I quote:

The court would thus not consider such factors as the size of the offender's family, the fact that he earns his living by driving or his long clean record. These are factors special to the offender B but they do not pertain to the offence.

I have demonstrated several instances which this court found no "special reasons". But the court is not unanimous on what constitutes special reasons in Sadrudin K.M Pirani C v R. [1977] LRT 58 the appellant was convicted on his own plea of careless driving c/s 50 of the Road Traffic Act 1973. He was sentenced to a fine of shs. 300/= or two months jail in default. He was disqualified from holding or obtaining a driving licence. In mitigation against non-disqualification the appellant stated that he was a pilot, that he was D required to go on duty at night, that he is always called on duty at week days and his parents are old and that he would suffer if his licence was cancelled. Biron, J. stated and I quote: E

To return to the question of the construction to be put on the term special reasons in section 27 of the Act, it does not necessarily follow that the same construction must be put on the term special reasons in section 27 of the Act as is put on the same term in section 63 of the Act, which described mandatory minimum sentences in the absence of special reasons, as the F same expression used in different sections of an Act may be construed differently. The reason why the term special reasons in section 27 is given the very narrow construction, that the reasons must be special to the offence, is a hangover from the interpretation of special G reasons in section 49 of the Traffic Ordinance (Cap.168 Sup 57) Revised Laws, which section created the offence of driving whilst the driver's efficiency was impaired by drink or drugs, which interpretation, incidentally, unless I am mistaken, stems from the construction put on H the same term special reasons by the English courts following the court of Appeal decision in Whittal v Kirby [1947] KB 194. The same narrow construction of the term special reasons is also put on the same term used in the Motor Vehicle Insurance Ordinance I

(Cap. 169-Supp 60) Revised Laws, for driving motor vehicle without there being in force a A policy of Third Part Insurance.

His Lordship went on to find special reasons as advanced by the appellant and proceeded to set aside the order of disqualification.

Whatever good reasons his Lordship had in adopting a wide and liberal construction, I B with greatest respect to his lordship, do not share the view expressed in Sadrudin K.M Pirani v R. (Supra). In a country like Tanzania driving to some people is a profession. It is a bread earning business. To say that dependence on licence for C livelihood is a special reason, is to render the provisions demanding disqualification in the absence of special reasons impotent and would defeat the whole policy behind such legislation which is to safeguard innocent road users from drivers who drive their motor vehicles on the roads. D

The policy behind Cap. 169 is to compensate the innocent road user in the event of an accident. That policy would be defeated if the court were to allow an accused driver to plead dependence on his licence as a means of his livelihood. I would consider that the interpretation in Kingombe v R., Lawrence Maliki v R. and Joachim Gregory v R. E (Supra) as to what amounts to special reasons as sound in policy. In the present case the second accused's mitigation did not amount to special reasons. They did not relate to the offence. They were reasons personal to the accused. He ought not to have been exempted.

For the above reasons the order of exempting the second accused from disqualification F is quashed and set aside. I order that the second accused be, and is hereby, disqualified from holding or obtaining a driving licence for a period of twelve (12) months from the date of this order.

G Order accordingly.

Mustafa, and Omar, JJ.A. and Mapigano, Ag. J.A.: The appellant was convicted G of wounding contrary to section 228(1) of the Penal Code in the District Court of Shinyanga and was sentenced to 8 months imprisonment on 24.1.85 by the Resident Magistrate. The appellant was alleged to have caused severe injuries to the complaint PW1 Iddi Amadi, which, according to medical evidence, amounted to dangerous harm, H and one injury was termed grievous harm. PW1 was a child of 13 years of age at the material time and PW1 alleged he was assaulted by the appellant.

The trial magistrate examined PW1 in terms of sec. 127 (5) of the Evidence Act and was satisfied that P.W.1 knew the nature and meaning of an oath and P.W.1 gave evidence on affirmation.

The conviction of the appellant was based primarily on the I evidence of P.W.1. Indeed the trial magistrate was impressed by P.W.1 as a witness. A

In his judgement the trial magistrate stated:

But P.W.1 was thoroughly examined before he gave evidence on oath. Although he is 13, he B appeared to know well the meaning and consequences of oath. In the witness box his credibility was not shaken at all during examination - in -chief, cross-examination, re-examination and finally examination by this court. This court had the opportunity to assess C his demeanour. He was nothing but a competent and credible witness.

The appellant's appeal against conviction and sentence to the High Court was unsuccessful. The appellant was given leave to appeal to this court out of time by the D High Court which certified the following points of law for our consideration:

1. In what circumstances would the evidence of a child of tender years, given an oath or affirmation or without such oath or affirmation form the basis of a conviction in the E absence of corroboration?

2. Would failure by a court to state that it has warned itself be fatal to its decision? F

We will deal with the appellant's appeal only on ground 6 which alleged that the High Court judge misdirected himself "on the evidence of children which need corroboration and which was lacking. Such evidence could not be basis of conviction".

We refer to section 127 of the Evidence Act which deals in part with child witnesses. G Section 127 (2) reads:

Where is any criminal cause of matter any child of tender years is called is a witness does not, in the opinion of the court, understand the nature of an oath, his evidence may be received, H though not given upon oath or affirmation, if in the opinion of the court, to be recorded in the proceedings, he is possessed of sufficient intelligence to justify the reception of his evidence and understanding the duty of speaking the truth.

(3) Notwithstanding any rule of law to contrary where evidence received by virtue of I sub-section (2) is given on behalf of the prosecution and is not corroborated by any other material evidence in support of A it, implicating the accused, the court may, after warning itself of the danger of doing so, act on that evidence, to convict the accused if it is fully satisfied that the child is telling nothing but the truth.

In our view, in terms of the above provisions, the sworn testimony of a child of tender B years, does not need corroboration. It can be treated as any other sworn testimony.

It is interesting to contrast this new development in our law with that in England regarding child witnesses. In Archbold Criminal Pleading and Practice 40th Edition para 1431 C and para 1432 and para 1433 deal with corroboration of children's evidence. Briefly if evidence is given unsworn, corroboration is necessary as a matter of law. Where however the evidence is sworn (in which case although the evidence need not be D corroborated as a matter of law) the jury should be warned of the danger of acting on uncorroborated evidence. They may convict on such evidence, if bearing the warning in mind, they are none the less convinced that the witness is telling the truth.

In so far as this appeal is concerned we are satisfied that the evidence of PW1 did not E need corroboration and that it could form the basis of a conviction.

In answer to the question of law posed by the High Court, we think that the sworn evidence of a child does not need corroboration and the unsworn evidence of a child is F governed by the provisions of section 127(3) of the Evidence Act as regards corroboration.

Case Information

Appeal dismissed. F

Sisya, J.: This is a second appeal. It is a criminal appeal originating from the Dochi Primary Court of Lushoto District. Without prejudice, as is now notoriously the case with most of the proceedings which pass through the hands of the presiding Magistrate (H.K. Shellimoh Esq. Primary Court Magistrate) this present one too is fraught with G irregularities and deviations from the laid down and recognised practice and procedure. In dealing with this matter I will, nevertheless, be guided by the principle that substantial justice must be done without undue regard to technicalities which is applicable to all H matters originating from Primary Courts, see Section 37, Magistrate' Courts Act, No. 2 of 1984.

Be it as it may, mention is hereby made of the fact that in his complaint to the Dochi Primary Court the complainant in the case mentioned three persons, namely Haji Shame I Mukai, Ahmad Kaniki and Issa Kaniki, as accused persons. The record of proceedings of the trial court, on its face cover, too, shows these three names as being the names of the A accused persons. It is only the order of appearance which differs: According to the complaint the first accused was shown to be Haji Shame Mukai and Issa Kaniki the third accused. This order was reversed on the face of the court record wherein the first accused is shown to be Issa Kaniki and Haji Shame Mukai, the third accused. In either B case Ahmad Kaniki was shown as second accused. Perhaps this is of no significance at all because its effect, if any, must be negligible. The point to note, however, is that the arraignment and the subsequent hearing proceeded against only two of the original three C accused persons. These were Haji Shame Mukai and Issa Kaniki who, incidentally, are the appellants in this instant appeal. The record of proceedings is completely silent as to the fate of the third person, that is Ahamadi Kaniki. He was neither arraigned nor tried. The complaint against him was, as it were, merely left hanging in the air. I will also leave it there. D

These two appellants were tried jointly on three counts charging them with the offences of criminal trespass, malicious damage to property and threatening violence. These are offences contrary to section 299, 326 and 89, respectively, all of the Penal code. E Immediately after pleas were taken and before hearing commenced both appellants raised objection to Mr. Shellimoh presiding over the trial. Both appellants specifically expressed confidence in the Primary Court as an institution but they demanded another magistrate to preside over their case and not Mr. Shellimoh. F

When asked to advance reasons in support of their application (or was it a demand?) both of them stated that they would do so to the magistrate who would preside over the hearing of their case. Neither of them, therefore, advanced any reasons before the court constituting Mr. Shellimoh, as the presiding Primary Court Magistrate, and two G assessors, Messrs Shemase and Kipande. The learned Primary Court Magistrate, quite correctly, placed the matter before the assessors for their decision. The two assessors were, unanimously, of the view that the appellants' application for another magistrate was baseless because no reasons had been advanced for disqualifying Mr. Shellimoh H from presiding at the trial such as being induced by a bribe or promises thereof or fear of bias originating from a clash over some female. The assessors' was, in fact, the decision of the court as they were already in the majority Mr. Shallimoh, even then, concurred. I therefore, accordingly refused and it was, further, ordered that trial was to proceed as A scheduled. This was done.

The complainant gave his evidence and he was duly cross-examined by both appellants. Thereafter, the complainant informed the court that his witnesses were present and/or available. For unknown reasons the record of proceedings is completely silent on the B point - hearing was adjourned to the following day. Both accused were granted cash bail in the sum of Shs. 8,500/=, each, with one surety failing which the appellants were to be held in custody. It is not known whether or not the appellants met the terms and conditions of bail which, to me, appear unduly harsh. However, since this is not subject C of any complaint I do not propose to dwell on the same any longer.

On resumption on the following day one more witness gave evidence on the complainant's side. When the appellants were called upon to cross-examine him they, D one after another, refused to do so and intimated that they wanted to engage an advocate. The presiding magistrate took this as an application to stay the proceeding so that the appellants may engage legal counsel and he put the matter to the assessors for their decision. Both assessors were of the unanimous view that the application had been E made belatedly. They, therefore, decided that hearing should proceed as scheduled, adding that the appellants could, if need be, still engage a lawyer but later and, presumably, in a high tribunal on appeal. The presiding magistrate, again, concurred with the assessors' view on this point. When the decision of the court was known to the F appellants each one stuck to his guns: The appellants stated that they had no question to ask the witness and they added, one after the other, that they had looked for an advocate. The evidence of the said witness and (subsequently, after the assessors had put across a few questions to him) the case for the complainant was, eventually, closed. G The appellants were then called upon to defend themselves in terms of Section 30 (1) (c) of the Third Schedule to the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1984. Both appellants refused to say anything, adding that they had decided to engage an advocate. The trial court took this as an election by the appellants not to say anything and after recording the H opinions of the assessors proceeded to judgement. Both accused were by unanimous decision, found guilty and they were convicted accordingly on all the three counts. They were each sentenced to pay a fine of shs.1,000/= or, in default of payment, go to jail for I three months on each of counts one and two, and on count three they were each sentenced to six months imprisonment, without option of paying a fine. The terms of imprisonment in default of payment of a fine A imposed in counts 1 and 2 were to run consecutively with the term of imprisonment imposed in count three. The appellants paid the fines in counts 1 and 2. The appellants together with "the village", (I presume the Village Government) were ordered to pay to the complainant shs. 17,000/= by the way of compensation. B

Aggrieved, the appellants appealed to the District Court, Lushoto, against conviction, sentence and order of compensation. Save for the sentence in count three which was reduced to such term as resulted in the appellants' immediate release from prison - the C appellants had by then already been in jail for seven days - the appellants' appeal to the District Court was dismissed. Hence this present appeal to this court.

The first four grounds of appeal in the appellant's joint petition of appeal are in respect of the way the proceeding was conducted in the trial court. In the main, the appellants D complain that they were not given the opportunity of being heard at the trial.

I think it all started when the appellants, for reasons which to-date still remain undisclosed, expressed their dislike of the presiding magistrate continuing with the hearing of their case. Every magistrate is duty - bound to hear and determine or in other E words to deal with any matter over which he is vested with the requisite jurisdiction. Failing which he will be guilty of abdicating from duty. The only exception to this general rule is laid down in section 65 (1) of the Magistrate's Courts Act, 1984, and it is that no F magistrate should act in his judicial office in any proceeding in which he has any pecuniary or personal interest. To my mind, the basis of this provision of the law is to guarantee impartiality in the determination of judicial proceedings which is a primary element in the administration of justice and fair play. The judge here, however, is, G principally, the magistrate himself and it is only in proceeding in which the magistrate has pecuniary or personal interest. What, one may then ask, of a case or proceeding in which an interested party for a reason or reasons, known or unknown to the magistrate, apprehends that there may be no impartiality in the proceeding? The adage that Justice H should not only be done but it must manifestly be seen to be done is applicable to our judicial system. The answer to the question posed above would thus appear obvious and it is that the party concerned is perfectly entitled to raise his objection in open court. The judge this time is not the magistrate concerned but the person on the receiving end. I The important point to note here, however, is that the said objection of the presiding A magistrate was, however, not enough. They should have gone further to give reasons for their objection. As it turned out, they gave no reasons. As a result there were absolutely no grounds, let alone reasonable grounds, for their objection. For this reason B it was open to the court to proceed hearing the case as scheduled and, indeed, the Court's decision on this point cannot legitimately be assailed. It was proper and it is hereby so declared.

Next came the appellant's belated intimation that they were engaging learned counsel to defend them. It is conceded, which, indeed, I must, that every accused person or litigant C has a constitutional right to defend his/her cause fully and to the best of his/her ability, and this includes availing oneself service of legal counsel. At the same time I am fully aware that as a matter of law, advocates are not permitted to appear in Primary Courts. As aforesaid, the trial court ruled that the matter had been brought up by the appellants, D so to say, too late in the day, and the court was somewhat sceptical about the proposition put forward by the appellants. At the hearing of this appeal before me learned State Attorney, Mr. Magohe, was equally sceptical about the appellant's proposition on this point. Mr. Magohe pointed out that this matter has now passed E through two judicial tribunals in both of which advocates can and do appear but none has appeared for the appellants. Without beating about the bush, I cannot help sharing Mr. Magohe's views on this point. If, indeed, the appellants were serious on the issue of F engaging an advocate then perhaps we would not have failed to see one at some stage in these proceedings, that is to say in the District Court on first appeal or in this court on second appeal. I repeat that no advocate has over appeared for the appellants or either of them in the instant proceedings. It seems to me, in all the circumstances of G the case, that the proposition in question was no more than a mere attempt to ridicule the due process of the law. No court of justice, worth the title will be prepared to stomach such acts. The refusal by the trial court to be hoodwinked by the appellants was proper and I so hold.

I now turn to the crux of the complaints on this aspect of the matter. I do not hesitate to H point out, straightaway, that there is no truth whatsoever in the appellants' allegation that they were not given the opportunity of being heard. From the brief account of events in the trial court already narrated hereinabove - and I see no cause to reiterate the I same - it is clear that the appellants were given opportunity not merely to cross - examine PW 2 but actually to defend themselves as well. Both of them refused to say anything in defence thereby A forfeiting their right to defend themselves. Surely they cannot now properly be heard to complain. I dismiss the appellants' complaints on this point as being without substance in law.

In the fifth ground of appeal, the appellants aver that nothing was destroyed in the B complaint's shamba. This is a matter of evidence which the appellants ought to have adduced at the trial but they failed to do so. The end result is that the evidence of the complaint and his witness, PW 2, was neither challenged nor contradicted and it stands unshaken. The duty of the court was to decide the case on the evidence adduced before C it. In the absence of any other evidence to the contrary the trial court had no other evidence to go by and, further, it had no cause to reject the evidence before it, the same being credible and admissible. In other words, it was legal evidence. D

The salient facts of the case which both courts found established and proceeded to act upon show that the complainant on one hand and the appellants and other villagers of Msale village on the other hand had dispute over a shamba. The matter was referred to court (see Dochi Primary Court Civil Case No. 89 of 1985). Judgement was given in E favour of the complainant who was also to be paid shs. 20,000/= as compensation. The complainant was not satisfied with the amount of compensation, he wanted more whereupon he appealed to the District Court, Lushoto. On 12.9.85 while the District Court was yet to give its decision in the matter these two appellants led other villagers F and entered the complainant's shamba without the complainant's consent. They uprooted some banana trees and set fire to some of the stalks. They also dug out some potatoes and carried them away together with some bunches of banana. On seeing this G the complainant rushed to the Police Station, Lushoto, and reported the matter. He was told that there was no transport available, apparently, to take the Police to the scene. The complainant then went and complained to the District Magistrate who then set the 17 September, 1985, as the date of judgement. According to the complainant judgement was again in his favour. Nevertheless, the appellants and other villagers H continued to cut and eat bananas from his shamba with impunity. Eventually, the complainant went and complained to the law enforcing agents. It seems as a follow up of his complaint the District Commissioner, Lushoto, visited the area. The village chairman then urged the DC to rusticate the complainant. The said chairman also I threatened to do acts of hooliganism and lawlessness if their demand was not met. He cited the A incident at Garo as being their precedent. The DC reminded the said chairman and others that lawbreakers would be dealt with. That was commendable. I think whenever opportunity arises the people of this country must be told or reminded (whatever the case may be), not merely of their constitutional right but also of their duties and B obligations under the constitution. Section 26 of the constitution of the United Republic of Tanzania, the mother of all the laws of this country, lays down as follows, and I quote:

26. -(1)Kila mtu ana wajibu wa kufuata na kutii katiba hii na sheria za Jamhuri ya Muungano. C

Going back to the facts of the case, the evidence adduced by the complainant shows that on the night of 20/21st September the two appellants went to the house of the complainant and while raising an alarm they said that they had been told by one E Makamba and one Mbega, assistant to the Executive Secretary of CCM, to get hold of the complainant, kill him, and decapitate him, put the complainant's torso in a gunny bag and send his head to Lushoto. On hearing this the complainant got out of his house using the back door and he escaped to Lushoto. Up to the time the complainant gave F evidence in the case, three days later, he had not yet returned to his house because he feared for his life.

As aforesaid, this evidence stands unshaken and I hasten to say that it does establish all the three counts charged. The convictions were thus sound in law and the same are hereby upheld. G

Regarding the sentences, in all the circumstances of the case I cannot say that the same were manifestly excessive or that they offended some settlement principle. I, accordingly, therefore, propose to leave them undisturbed.

Now turning to the order of compensation, I am at a loss to comprehend the basis upon H which the same was made. As aforesaid, the order of compensation also affects the village which, incidentally, was not even a party to the proceeding. The order against it, therefore, offends one of the basic principles of justice, namely that a party should not be I condemned without being heard. Further, there is the third person who was to be tried jointly with these appellants but somehow he was not so tried. Had he been tried he too may have had his A own share to make good the loss. On the whole, it is not possible to apportion the amount of compensation, nor do I consider it fair and just, on the evidence available, to rest it wholly and squarely on the shoulders of these two appellants. For these reasons, I will set aside the order of compensation. Subject to the law governing limitation of B actions I leave it to the complainant, should he feel disposed to do so, to follow up the matter in a Civil Court of competent jurisdiction.

All in all, save for the order of compensation which has been set aside, this appeal fails and it is hereby dismissed. C

Appeal dismissed.

This was an application to set aside an ex parte temporary injunction issued by the High A Court against the applicant who was the General Manager of Morogoro Canvass Mill Ltd., and the Director of Immigration Services. The full set of facts is in the ruling.

Held: (i) The rule that the court shall in all cases, except where it appears, that the B object of granting the injunction would be defeated by the delay, before granting an injunction, direct notice of the application to be given to the opposite party, is mandatory;

(ii) if the opposite party can be served without delay, as was the position in this C case, an ex parte injunction should not be issued;

(iii) in all applications for prerogative orders, such as certiorari and mandamus leave must be sought and obtained before the application for any prerogative order is heard;

Maina, J.: This is an application to set aside the ex-parte temporary injunction dated 28 April, 1987 issued by this court against the applicant who is the General Manager of Morogoro Canvas Mill Ltd, and the Director of Immigration Service. H

The respondent was an employee working for Morogoro Canvas Mill Ltd, as Financial Controller. The annexure to this application shows that the contract of service was between the respondent and Hebox Holland Engineering B.V. The respondent was assigned by Hebox to work for Morogoro Canvas Mill Ltd. On 1 April 1987 Hebox I wrote a letter to the respondent informing him that his contract of employment was to terminate on 30 April, 1987 and would not A be renewed. The respondent also received a letter dated 10 April 1987 from the applicant dismissing the respondent from his duties "with immediate effect". There was another letter (annexure E to the affidavit) which instructed the respondent to vacate the B house he was occupying, not later than 30 April 1987.

The above events led to the filing of the application by the respondent for orders of certiorari to quash the decision of the General Manager, and mandamus to compel the applicant General Manager to hear the respondent in accordance with rules of natural C justice, and for an injunction to restrain applicant from harassing him.

On 20 April 1987 the matter came before the Hon. Jaji Kiongozi who issued an ex-parte temporary injunction restraining the Director of Migration services from D deporting the respondent pending the hearing of the case and also restraining the applicant from evicting the respondent from his quarter during the pendency of the case. It was Mr. Uzanda's submission that the temporary injunction was incompetent because it was in breach of Order 37 Rule 3 of the Civil Procedure Code which provides as follows: E

> The court shall in all cases, except where it appears, that the object of granting the injunction would be defeated by the delay, before granting an injunction, direct notice of the application for the same to be given to the opposite party. F

The above rule is, I think, mandatory. If the opposite party can be served without delay, an ex-parte injunction should not be issued. In this connection, Mr. Uzanda referred the court to two decisions of the Court of Appeal. In Noormohamed Janmohamed v G Kassamali Virji Madhani (1953) 20 EACA 8 at page 11 the court said:

> The requirement to give notice is clearly mandatory and it cannot be disputed that the onus of H satisfying the court that there is a good cause for dispensing with it will lie upon the applicant.

The decision in the Noormohamed case was followed in the latter case of Devan v Bhadreasa and Another [1972] EA 23 in which the parties were living in the same I premises, and therefore there would have been no difficulty in serving the opposite party with the chamber summons. A The ex-parte interim injunction was set aside. In the present case, there is no dispute that the respondent is living near the applicant's house and had this been raised at the hearing of the application for temporary injunction, the court would have required notice to be served on the opposite party. B

Furthermore, there was no application made, no reasons were given, and also no order was made dispensing with the requirement of giving notice to the opposite party. Mr. Massati conceded that in the affidavit filed in support of the application for temporary C injunction, there was no mention made for dispensing with notice.

He also conceded that Order 37 Rule 3 of the Civil Procedure code is mandatory. However, he said that the matter was urgent and that service to the opposite party would have caused delay. With respect, I do not agree. The respondent knew that the General Manager was living in the same neighbourhood of the respondent's house. I do D not see what delay would have been caused by sending notice to the applicant. Mr. Massati also said that the application to dispense with notice can be made informally. But, with respect, there was not even an informal application to dispense with notice. The letter to the Registrar of the High Court that the matter was urgent, was not, in my E view, an application to dispense with notice to the opposite party. That letter merely asked for an early hearing.

Mr. Massati submitted further that he could not ask for notice to be served to the opposite party because the application for leave to apply for orders of certiorari and F mandamus had not been heard. In all applications for prerogative orders, such as certiorari and mandamus, leave must be sought and obtained before the application for any prerogative order is heard. In my view, the application for temporary injunction could only be made where leave had been granted. In this case, when the application G for temporary injunction was heard, no leave to apply for certiorari and mandamus had been granted by the court. It seems to me that if the court had been told on 28 April 1987 that in fact leave had not been granted to apply for certiorari and mandamus, the application for temporary injunction would not have been entertained. H The court proceeded with the hearing of that application on the assumption that leave to apply for orders of certiorari and mandamus had been granted. Since such leave had not been obtained, the temporary injunction cannot stand and for that reason alone, the temporary injunction would be set aside. I

I would go further and say that the temporary injunction against the Director of Immigration Services was incompetent for another reason. As A Mr. Uzanda submitted, the Director for Immigration Services was not a party to these proceedings. He was a stranger to the case. The ex-parte injunction was made against a stranger. Mr. Massati conceded but said that the court had discretion under section 95 of the Civil Procedure Code to make the order. I do not agree. Section 95 gives B inherent powers to the court "to make such orders as may be necessary for the ends of justice or to prevent abuse of the process of the court". It does not empower the court to make orders against a stranger to the case. There are provisions in the Civil Procedure Code for joinder of parties and Mr. Masati could have applied for the C Director of Immigration Services to be joined as a party to his application, and then ask for orders against the Director. This was not done and I do not see how the injunction against the Director of Immigration Services who was not a party to the case can be supported. D

The temporary injunction against the Director of Immigration Services can be set aside for another reason. Mandamus can only lie against the Director if it were shown that he had been requested by the respondent to perform certain duties and the Director either failed or refused to perform those duties. There is no such allegation in this case. As Mr. E Salula, learned State Attorney, submitted, on behalf of the Director of Immigration Services, because the respondent's employment ceased, the residence permit he holds is invalid. The respondent has not asked for another permit. If the respondent applies for another permit in another class, that would be considered by the authorities to enable the F respondent finalise his affairs in this country.

Another point raised by Mr. Uzanda was that the ex-parte temporary injunction was issued against known principles governing temporary injunctions. Learned counsel submitted that an applicant for an interim injunction must establish a prima facie case with G a probability of success and that the facts must show that if a temporary injunction is not granted, the applicant would suffer irreparable injury which cannot be adequately compensated by an award of damages. He cited the case of Giella v Cassman Brown H and C. Ltd [1973] EA 358 at page 360. It was Mr. Uzanda's submission that in this case neither certiorari nor mandamus can lie. I do not wish to restate the facts of this case. All I can say is that it appears to me from the affidavits and the annextures that the respondent was employed by Hebox Holland Engineering B.V and was only assigned by I Hebox to work for Morogoro Canvas Mill Limited.

MAINA J

So, there appears to be no contract of service between the respondent and Morogoro A Canvas Mill Ltd.

The applicant's letter dismissing the respondent from his employment is of no effect whatsoever. The position appears to be that Hebox informed the respondent that the B respondent's contract of service would expire on 30 April 1987. The applicant had no power to dismiss the respondent. The application to quash the decision of the General Manager Morogoro Canvas Mill Ltd, is to me meaningless because the General manager had no power to dismiss the respondent who has been notified earlier by his employer that the contract of service would expire on a specified date. C

As for mandamus, I agree that the applicant General Manager has no public duty to perform. In Halsbury's Laws of England, volume eleven, Third Edition paragraph 172 at page 54 the learned author states as follows: D

> Mandamus will lie towards any person or body in respect of anything which appertains to his or their office and in the nature of public duty. E

The applicant General Manager has no public duty to perform with respect to the respondent's employment. I agree with Mr. Uzanda that neither certiorari nor mandamus can lie.

Furthermore, mandamus cannot lie where there is some other legal remedy available. See Alfred Lakaru v Town Director Arusha [1980] TLR 326 at F page 327. In my view, the application for certiorari and mandamus has no possibility of success.
Finally I do not think that the respondent can say that he has suffered irreparable injury which cannot be adequately compensated by an award of damages. He can file a suit G against his employer for damages for breach of contract. That is a legal remedy available to him.
For these reasons, the application succeeds. The temporary injunction dated 28th April 1987 is set aside.
The respondent shall bear the applicant's costs. H

[zJDz]Judgment
Omar JJA, Mustafa, JJA and Mapigano Ag JA.: This appeal emanated from an application by Fredrick G. Kibwana, now the respondent, against the Assistant Registrar G of Buildings, the appellant for the order of certiorari to issue in order to quash the decision of the Assistant Registrar of Buildings in terminating the tenancy of the respondent.

The prayer for the order of certiorari to issue was granted by the High Court H (Mwalusanya, J); the decision of terminating the tenancy of F.G Kibwana was quashed and he was reinstated as the lawful tenant of the premises.
Against this decision of the High Court the Assistant Registrar of Buildings appealed to this court. The most important ground of appeal (and there are eleven of them) was that I the order of certiorari was bad in law. Also the learned judge misdirected himself on the fact by holding that A the respondent had no alternative remedy available to him.
1987 TLR p85
OMAR JJA, MUSTAFA JJA AND MAPIGANO Ag JA
The learned judge quoted para 147 of Halsbury's Laws of England which states that certiorari "will issue to quash a determination for excess or lack of jurisdiction or error B of law on the face of record or breach of the rules of natural justice or where the determination was procured by fraud, collusion or perjury".
In this case the learned judge held that since the tenant was not served with any demand notices for arrears of rent or letter of notice to quit the premises, the tenant was C condemned unheard which was in breach of rules of natural justice.
Be that as it may, I hold as did my brother Mustafa, J.A. that certiorari being a discretionary remedy for the courts to issue, it cannot be issued in this case where there is already a contractual relationship between landlord and tenant - a relationship of a D commercial or business nature. The recource to the courts of law to adjudicate on the breaches of contract would be a better procedure.
I too would allow the appeal, quash the order made and set aside the ruling made by E the High Court. I would award the costs of the appeal to the appellant.

No case referred to. F

[zJDz]Judgment

Chipeta, J.: In Tabora District Court, the appellant Iddi Fundi, was charged on six counts of stealing by public servant c/ss 270 and 265 of the Penal Code. He was convicted as charged and was sentenced to concurrent prison terms of seven, three, G three, five, three and three years respectively.

Dissatisfied, the appellant now appeal against the convictions as well as the sentences.

The prosecution's evidence was that prior to his being convicted, the appellant was H employed in the Judiciary as an accounts clerk, and at the material time he was attached to Tabora Urban Primary Court. Among his duties was the collection and banking of revenue received in that court.

On divers dates between 19th May, 1984 and 13th December, 1984, the appellant I received a total of Shs. 22,658/75 which he did not remit to the bank and for which he otherwise failed to account. A

When these shortages came to the knowledge of the appellant's immediate superior (P.W.2), P.W.2 took the appellant to the District Magistrate in-charge before whom the appellant admitted having converted the money to his own use. He was then given two B weeks within which to refund the money. He failed to do so, and so the matter was reported to Police.

In his defence, the appellant said that he just discovered that the money was missing from the store.

After carefully valuating the evidence, the learned senior resident magistrate was satisfied C and found as a fact that the appellant had received the money in the course of his duties, that he had not banked it as he was supposed to do, and that he had otherwise failed to account for the same. The learned magistrate accordingly inferred that the appellant had converted that money to his own use and so convicted him as charged. D

I entirely and respectfully defer to the learned magistrate's reasoning and conclusions. Both the oral and documentary evidence established beyond a shadow of doubt that the appellant had received the money and failed to account for it. At all material times he had custody of the keys of the store where the money was kept, and at no time was that E store broken into. The irresistible inference, therefore, must be that the appellant converted the money to his own use. The convictions, therefore, were fully justified.

I now turn to the sentences. The appellant was a first offender and relatively young. In F mitigation, he told the trial court that he was married with three children, and that he also had parents who depended on him. Before this Court he repeated those pleas and added that his father has since died.

In assessing the sentences, the learned magistrate took into account those factors, but he G appears to have been greatly influenced by the fact that such offences are rampant in the country.

I entirely and respectfully agree that the prevalence of a particular type of crime is a very relevant factor. However, this material factor must be considered along with other H aggravating or mitigating factors. Among the important mitigating factors are the accused's past-record, his age, the value of property involved, the degree of sophistry involved in the commission of the offence, and the reformability of the offender, not forgetting, of course, his family commitments and, where relevant, his loss of employment as a result of conviction. I

In the present case, the appellant was a youthful first offender aged 26 years, he has a relatively large family to support, the amount involved cannot by A any means be said to have been colossal considering the long period over which the thefts were made, the manner in which the offences were committed was not at all sophisticated, and there is also the certain fact that a result of those convictions the appellant has lost his employment and benefits. B

When those factors are considered together with the aggravating factor of the prevalence of the offence, in my view, the appellant deserved some measure of leniency.

It is for these reasons that I respectfully agree with Mr Tendwa, learned state attorney, that the substantive sentence of seven years imprisonment was excessive. In my view C the minimum sentence of five years imprisonment as the substantive sentence would have met the justice of the case.

Accordingly I hereby set aside the sentence of seven years imprisonment in respect of the first count and substitute therefore a sentence of five years imprisonment to run D concurrently with the rest of the sentences which are left undisturbed. The order of compensation will also remain undisturbed.

Save for the variation of the substantive sentence, this appeal is otherwise dismissed. E

Appeal dismissed.

1. Moore v Canadian Pacific Steamship Co. [1945] 1 All E.R. 128.

Mapigano, Ag. J.A., Omar and Mfalila, JJ.A.: This is an appeal from the judgement F of the High Court at Dar es Salaam, dismissing a suit brought by the appellant Makori Wassaga against the respondents Joshua Mwaikambo and Hamisi Mpendu and awarding the costs to the respondents.
The appellant was claiming damages against the respondents contending that the G respondents had written and published libellous statements against him. The action was founded on a letter, exhibit PI, copies of which the respondents had admittedly sent to the State House and the Anti-Corruption Squad on or about 4/6/85. That letter accused the appellant of having caused his employer, M/S. Building, Hardware and Electrical H Supplies Co. Ltd. -

BHESCO for short - to suffer a loss of Shs. 1,290,014/=. The respondents were also employees of BHESCO and at the material time they were holding the posts of Acting General Manager and Security Officer, respectively. The latter alleged that the appellant had acquired three houses, one of which rented, and four motor vehicles some of which commercial. The letter also alleged that the appellant was I operating a clearing and forwarding company. Interestingly, the appellant admitted in his evidence A that he had acquired some of those assets. The letter pointed out that the appellant was a leader (within the meaning attaching to that term by the Leadership Code) and thus implied that he had violated the stipulations of the Leadership Code with which every public servant in Tanzania should be familiar. B

MAPIGANO Ag JA, OMAR JJA AND MFALILA JJA

It is apposite to state the background to the publication. Sometime in March, 1983, one Okidi, a Shinyanga-based building contractor, went to BHESCO in Dar es Salaam for the purpose of purchasing certain building materials. He was a new customer at that place but I am inclined to believe that he and the appellant had known each other before. C He had a letter of recommendation from the Ministry of Works. Apparently he had no cash in his hands; he only carried a cheque book and he proposed that he made the purchases by means of cheques drawn on his bank at Shinyanga. The cashiers of BHESCO were reluctant to accede to his proposal, but the appellant prevailed upon D them and he actually made a guaranty for the due acceptance and payment thereof. The appellant was then the Acting Marketing Manager and therefore the cashiers' superior. The total amount on those cheques was Shs. 1,290,014/=. The said Okidi collected the goods from the BHESCO's godown and he was in the company of the appellant when E he did so.

It transpired that Okidi had no sufficient funds in the hands of his bank to cover the cheques. The cheques were therefore dishonoured and this naturally gave management of BHESCO great concern. Frantic efforts were made to have Okidi pay the amount. F Those efforts succeeded in part: Okidi paid a sum of Shs. 621,795/20, leaving a balance of Shs. 668,218.80. The appellant was taken to task about the matter. Indeed, his conduct during the sales engendered great suspicion. And subsequently there was an occasion when he snatched the dishonoured cheques from the accountant of the G company and took them away. When he was required to return them he gave a lie that they had been robbed at Manzese. But when pressure was brought to bear upon him he surrendered the cheques.

The matter was discussed by the Management Committee of the Company and it was H resolved and directed that a report be made to the police, and that was done.

Thereafter the letter exhibit P1 was written. The name of the addressee did not appear on that letter, but as I stated earlier, copies thereof were sent to the State House and the Anti-Corruption Squad. The letter is divisible into two parts. The first part concerns the I purchase of the goods by Okidi, the dishonouring of his cheques and the involvement of the appellant in the incident. The second part relates to the A properties the appellant had allegedly secured and the businesses he was operating.

The learned trial judge, Kazimoto, J., found that the first part of the letter was not B defamatory of the appellant; but he held, in effect, that the second part was, innuendo-wise, and for myself I consider that the judge was right. The judge then considered the defence of qualified privilege that had been set up and he took the view that the occasion afforded the respondents that defence. It has been argued on behalf of the appellant that the judge was wrong. With respect, we disagree. On the evidence on C record I consider that the judge was entitled to hold as he did.

The next question that passed was whether the respondents were motivated by malice in publishing that letter to the State House and the Anti-Corruption Squad, and I do not have to point out that the onus was upon the appellant to prove malice on a D preponderance of evidence. The respondents contended that they were actuated by a sense of duty and not malice, and the learned judge seemed to accept that contention.

Mr Maira, learned counsel for the appellant, has argued that the respondents must have E been acting out of sheer personal spite, because he said, (a) it was not established that the appellant owned all the assets mentioned in the letter and; (b) the matter regarding the dishonoured cheques had been reported to the Management Committee and the police.

That is a ponderable point. However, malice, in the strict legal use of that term, is not F identical with personal spite, it means wrong or improper motive, and in relation to the defence of qualified privilege the mere want or reasonable or problem cause is by no means conclusive. That is so because the law just requires that a privilege should be G used honestly and not that it should be used carefully. Counsel is referred to Moore v Canadian Pacific S.S. Co. [1945] 1 All E.R. 128, 133. And it is not sufficient that the statement in question is consistent with the existence of malice, it must be inconsistent with bonafides and honesty of purpose.

Mr Maira has also drawn our attention to the fact that the letter was published to P.W.6 H David Jacob who admittedly had no corresponding interest or duty to receive it. The story narrated by P.W.6 as to how he came to be possessed of a copy of the letter, which account was vehemently disputed by the respondents, strains belief considerably, I to put it mildly. But I really do not want to go into this matter in any detail, because, in my opinion, the publication of that letter to P.W.6 cannot be entertained by this Court, as a matter of law. For these A reasons; one, it was not alleged in the plaint; two, it was never canvassed in the court below; and three, it is not raised in the memorandum of appeal. In general, and this is I think elementary, party is bound by his pleadings and can only succeed according to what he has averred in his plaint and proved in evidence; he is not permitted to set up a B new case. And in reference to appeals, it is also trite to observe that this Court cannot entertain a new ground of appeal if no supplementary record of appeal has been lodged or no application for leave to amend the memorandum has been made and granted. C

For the reasons I have stated I would dismiss this appeal and grant costs to the respondents. As the other Members of the Court agree, it is so ordered.

D Appeal dismissed.

Mustafa, Omar, JJ.A. and Mfalila, Ag. J.A.: In this case the appellant was originally B charged with threatening violence but that charge was withdrawn and a new charge alleging arson was substituted thereof. The appellant was not called upon to plead to the new charge at all.
On first appeal the judge dealt with the omission in the following terms: C

On the question of non-compliance with section 234 of the Criminal Procedure Act I am satisfied the section was complied with - only that not everything was recorded in detail. For D under what circumstances could the appellant have said:

I do not need to recall the previous witnesses, immediately after the charge of arson had been substituted for that of threatening violence and P.W.1 alone had testified. E
With respect we think the first appellant judge was in error. It is mandatory for a plea to a new or altered charge to be taken from an accused person, as otherwise the trial becomes a nullity.

We would refer to an old case which had dealt with this matter and which is still good law. The case is Cr. Appeal 220/56 Akbarali Damji v R. reported F in 2 T.L.R. 137. The head note reads:

The arraignment of an accused is not complete until he has pleaded. Where no plea is taken the trial is a nullity. The omission is not an irregularity which can be cured by section 346 of G the Criminal Procedure Code.

The head note correctly sets out the findings of the Chief Justice in that appeal.

We are satisfied that, since no plea was taken, the trial was a nullity. H

We allow the appeal, quash the conviction, set aside the sentence imposed, and order that the appellant be released forthwith unless otherwise lawfully detained. We do not I think this case calls for an order of a retrial, and we will make no such order.

Chipeta, J.: In Shinyanga District Court, the appellant, John Straton Bihigimondo, was charged with and convicted of the offences of unlawful presence in Tanzania and giving H false information c/ss 26 (1)(i) and 26(2), and s.26(1)(a) of the Immigration Act, 1972, respectively. He was sentenced, respectively, to pay a fine of Shs. 10,000/= or three years imprisonment, and a fine of Shs. 5,000/= or one year imprisonment. He I failed to pay the fines and so was committed to prison.
CHIPETA J
The prosecution's evidence from a single witness was that the appellant was taken to the A Immigration Office at Shinyanga on suspicion, and there he was interrogated by an immigration officer, one Robert Msemakweli (P.W.1) as to the appellant's legality of stay in Tanzania. At first, the appellant lied and told P.W.1 that he was born at Mpanda, B that his mother was born at Sikonge, Tabora while his father was born at Kalema. On further interrogation by P.W.1 the appellant owned up and said that he was from Rwanda, that he came to Tanzania with his parents in 1964 as a genuine refugee, that he had since applied for citizenship but was yet to be registered as such, and that he was C registered at Mwese Settlement in Mpanda District.
These replies did not satisfy P.W.1 who, without further inquiry into those statements, prosecuted the appellant in Shinyanga District Court.
In his defence, the appellant reiterated his story that he entered the country in 1964 as a D genuine refugee, that in 1967 they were given refugee permits and settled in Mwese Settlement, and that he had since applied for citizenship. He called one witness who fully corroborated his story.
In respect of this second count the appellant stated that he at first told lies to P.W.1 E because P.W.1 threatened to deport him to Rwanda and that in fact there was a motor vehicle outside P.W.1's office which P.W.1 said would be used to ferry him back to Rwanda.
On that evidence the trial court convicted the appellant as charged. F
During the hearing of this appeal, Mr Matupa, learned state attorney for the Republic, declined to support the convictions; and the appellant made available to the court documents which reveal his status in Tanzania.
I will first deal with the appeal against the conviction on the first Count. The defence G evidence that the accused entered the country in 1964 as a genuine refugee and had a permit and that he has been in Tanzania ever since was not controverted by the prosecution. I would add that official documents made available to this Court by the H appellant conclusively prove that the appellant entered the country as a genuine refugee and that his status as such has not been revoked. Among those documents is a letter from the Mpanda District Immigration Officer dated 17th February, 1987, and a letter from the Divisional Secretary of Mwese, Mpanda District. I
CHIPETA J

That being the position, the defence evidence ought to have raised reasonable doubt in A the mind of the trial Court; and as pointed out above, the documentary evidence now available clearly demonstrate the appellant's innocence. Indeed, I think Mr Matupa hit the nail on the head when he stated in his submissions that the manner in which P.W.1 B dealt with the appellant demonstrated harassment. I say so because P.W.1 could easily have obtained the documents now available to this court if he seriously intended to find out the truth. He made no such attempt!

Even assuming for the sake of argument, that the appellant's papers as a refugee had expired and not renewed (there is no evidence to that effect), the appellant's lawful C presence in the country could still have been justified by proviso (ii) to subsection 91) of section 10 of the Immigration Act, 1972 which provides that where any permit or pass expires or is cancelled no further permit or pass is issued, the presence in Tanzania of the former holder to thereof is not unlawful by reason only of the provisions of that D subsection unless the Minister otherwise directs. Those provisions, as Mr Matupa rightly pointed out, ought, to be read together with those of section 26 of the Act.

In short, the appellant's guilt in respect of the first count was far from proved - let alone E beyond reasonable doubt.

I now turn to the evidence in respect of the second count. Like Mr Matupa, I am inclined to believe the appellant's story that he made the false statements because P.W.1 F subjected him to threats. Mr Matupa went on to submit thus since the materially false statements were made as a result of threats, those statements were involuntarily made and so were inadmissible under section 27 of the Evidence Act, 1967.

With respect, I am unable to go along with that logic. I do not think that the provisions G of section 27 of the Evidence Act, 1967 are relevant here. Those provisions talk of the admissibility and inadmissibility of confessions. In the present case, it has not been suggested that the materially false statements amounted to confessions. What P.W.1's evidence amounts to on this point is that in the court of the interrogation the appellant made statements which were a mixture of truth and falsehood. The appellant admitted H this.

In my view, the question for decision here is whether the false statements made by the appellant in those circumstances justified a conviction. The offence created by section I 26 (1)(a) of the Immigration Act, 1972, it seems to me, has the same elements as those creating a similar offence by section 122 of the Penal Code. If am right in this A view, then it must follow that for a false statement made to an immigration officer to be an offence, the maker must have made it knowing that such officer would act or omit to act in a manner as to be detrimental to some person or contrary to what such officer would have done if the true facts had been known. B

In the present case, P.W.1 was given false as well as truthful statement. He was, therefore, unlikely to act to the detriment of any person or contrary to what an immigration officer would act because he knew the true facts. To my mind, therefore, such false statements, made in the circumstances as those in which the appellant made to C P.W.1 are not those which the legislature in its wisdom could have had in mind.

This once again supports my inclination that the summary manner in which the appellant was dealt with is suggestive of harassment. D
On the basis of the foregoing, I hereby quash both the convictions and set aside the sentences. Should the appellant be still in custody, he shall be released forthwith unless otherwise lawfully detained. If he subsequently paid the fine, the same shall be refunded to him forthwith. E

[zJDz]Judgment

Chipeta, J.: The appellant, Rashid Ally, was convinced of the offences of personating a D public officer and obtaining money by false pretences c/ss. 100(2) and 302 of the Penal Code. He was sentenced, respectively, to one year and three years imprisonment, which sentences were ordered to run concurrently. E

The prosecution's evidence was to the effect that on 4th August, 1986, the complainant (P.W.1) and his two colleagues, P.W.2 and P.W.3, drove to Nzega from Mwanza in a Landrover.

On their arrival at Nzega they were confronted by a man who introduced himself to them F to be Corporal Joseph of the Police traffic section. The man demanded identity cards of the witnesses. P.W.2 and P.W.3 produced theirs, but P.W.1 did not have his own. The man then asked P.W.1, who was the driver of the Landrover to produce his log book; but P.W.1 did not have it. Thereupon the man told the three witnesses to go with him to the Police station. G

After moving a short distance, the man ordered P.W.1 to stop, which P.W.1 did, and the man demanded to be given Shs. 1,000/= "So that the matter could be settled". P.W.1 then gave the man Shs. 1,000/=, then the man left.

Next day, the three witnesses learnt that there was no Police officer known as Corporal H Joseph at Nzega. It was then that the three witnesses realized that they had been taken for a ride and that their "Police corporal" was no more than an imposter. The matter was then reported to Police.

The prosecution witnesses went on to testify that some two days later, P.W.2 and I P.W.3 saw the appellant at an hotel at Nzega, and they identified him to be the man who had posed as Corporal Joseph. So they A arrested him and took him to the police station.

The appellant put up a defence of alibi. He told the trial court that on 24th July, 1986, he left Singida for Dodoma in answer to a court summons issued by Dodoma Urban Primary Court in a case in which he was the complainant. He produced the said B summons as an exhibit. He went on to tell the trial court that on that day the case was adjourned to 3rd August, 1986 as some of the witnesses did not turn up, and on 3rd August, 1986, the case was adjourned to 14th August 1986 as one of the accused persons was sick. He then left Dodoma for Tabora by train on 4th August, 1986, the C day the alleged offences were committed, and he arrived at Tabora at 10.30 p.m. He produced a Railway train ticket showing Manyoni to Tabora as an exhibit. He went on to say that he travelled to Nzega on 5th August, 1986 where he arrived on 6th August, 1986, and to his surprise, he was arrested by P.W.2 and P.W.3. D

The learned trial district magistrate believed the prosecution witnesses to be truthful and, after discussing the relevant law, held that the witnesses correctly identified the appellant. He rejected the appellant's alibi as mere contrivance.

There is more than ample authority for the proposition that in order to justify a conviction E solely on evidence of identification, such evidence must be watertight. (See R. v Eria Sebwato [1960] E.A. 1974). It is equally well settled that in any case in which there is a question as to the identity of the accused, the fact of there having been given a description and the terms of that description are matters of the highest importance of F which evidence ought always to be given. (See Mohamed bin Allui v R., 9 E.A.C.A. 72).

In the instant case, the incident occurred at night. The only description given by the witnesses was that the imposter wore a black suit. None of the identifying witnesses G gave any other description of the culprit either to the Police or in court. Like the learned state attorney who, incidentally, declined to support the convictions, I am not persuaded that a black suit is a sufficient identifying mark in such circumstances.

The evidence of identification is further weakened by the appellant's alibi. That alibi was H not cracked and so I feel that to call it a contrivance can hardly be justified. The law is that where an accused person puts forward a defence of alibi, he does not thereby assume the burden of proving such alibi. It is sufficient if such alibi introduces reasonable I doubt in the prosecution's case. That was the case here.

For these reasons, it would not be safe to sustain the appellant's convictions. The same A are accordingly hereby quashed and sentences set aside. The appellant shall be released from custody forthwith unless further held in some other lawful connection.

Shio, for appellant

Marando and Maira, for respondent

[zJDz]Judgment

Nyalali, C.J., Makame and Kisanga, JJ.A.: This is an appeal by the Director of D Public Prosecutions in respect of extradition proceedings which originated in the District Court of Ilala District at Kisutu, Dar es Salaam. The Director of Public Prosecutions E hereinafter known as the D.P.P. is represented before us by Mr Shio, learned State Attorney whereas the respondent, namely one Peter Roland Vogel of German nationality, is represented by two advocates, that is Messrs Marando and Maira. On the 28th February, 1987 the Respondent was brought before a Resident Magistrate in F the District Court of Ilala District at Kisutu, Dar es Salaam for extradition proceedings under the Extradition Act, 1965. He was then remanded in custody. Six days later on the 6th of March, 1987, the case came up for hearing but it could not proceed to hearing because preliminary objections were made by the Advocates for the Respondent, G concerning the legality and the jurisdiction under which the Respondent was brought before the court. After considering those objections, the learned Resident Magistrate, Magessa PRM, ordered the prosecution to show compliance with the procedural requirements and whether there were any binding extradition arrangements between the H United Republic of Tanzania and the Federal Republic of Germany to enable the magistrate to proceed with the hearing of the extradition proceedings. In order to enable the prosecution to do so, the magistrate adjourned the case to the 9th March, 1987.

When the proceedings resumed as fixed on the 9th March, 1987, both the court and the I parties were satisfied that the procedural requirements for bringing the Respondent before the magistrate had been complied with. A However, neither the court nor the Advocates for the Respondent were satisfied on the preliminary issue of existence of a legally binding extradition arrangement between the two countries. The material produced by the prosecution side consisted of firstly, an uncertified diplomatic Verbal Note dated 14th April, 1964 from the Embassy of the B Federal Republic of Germany at Dar es Salaam, addressed to the Ministry of External Affairs and Defence of the United Republic of Tanzania. Secondly, the prosecution cited various legal matters both under domestic and international law in support of its contention. At the end of the day in court, the prosecution case turned on, among other C things, the authenticity of uncertified diplomatic Verbal Note. The learned resident magistrate found it to be of no evidential value. Consequently the preliminary objection was upheld and the proceedings were dismissed and the Respondent was discharged. D

The D.P.P. was aggrieved by the decision of the learned resident Magistrate and he appealed to the High Court. The High Court, Mapigano, J., however concurred with the findings of the lower court, and dismissed the appeal. The D.P.P. was further aggrieved by the decision of the High Court hence this appeal to this court. E

Three grounds were submitted by the D.P.P. in support of the appeal. Mr Shio, in answering questions from members of this court in the course of the hearing of the appeal informed the court that new evidence concerning the existence of extradition F arrangements between the two countries had come to light subsequent to the conclusion of the proceedings in the two courts below. The evidence consists of certified photostatic copies of diplomatic exchange notes between the United Republic of Tanzania and the Federal Republic of German made between 11th December, 1963 and G 14th April, 1964, that is, after the second anniversary of Independence and before the commencement of the Extradition Act, 1965.

The important issue before this court is whether we should interfere with the concurrent finding of the two courts below on the basis of the evidence which is said to have come H to light subsequent to the conclusion of the proceedings in the two courts below. Advocates for the Respondent have submitted that this court cannot do so because it was entirely due to the fault of the prosecution that such evidence was not available to the court of first instance. However under the adversarial legal system which applies to I the United Republic of Tanzania, the court cannot be expected to take the initiative to obtain A evidence since to do so would make the court appear to be prosecuting the case. On the other hand Mr Shio, learned State Attorney, has urged the court to interfere with the findings of the two courts below to enable the prosecution to adduce the evidence which B it had no opportunity to produce at the time of the proceedings in the court of first instance.

With due respect to Mr Shio, we do not think that this court would be justified in interfering with the findings of the two courts below on the grounds advanced by him. The record of these proceedings clearly shows that the prosecution had ample C opportunity to seek and obtain the necessary evidence either form the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of this country of from the Embassy of the Federal Republic of Germany. It would seem that the failure to obtain the necessary evidence was due to a mixture of incompetence, negligence and lack of seriousness on the prosecution sid. This D unsatisfactory state of affairs appears to have persisted even in respect of the proceedings before this court, as illustrated by the fact that the existence of the relevant diplomatic exchange of notes became known to the court only in answer to questions E asked by members of this court. Had we not asked these questions, this appeal would most likely have been concluded without the court being aware of the alleged diplomatic exchange of notes which took place between the two countries before the enactment and commencement of the Extradition Act, 1965.

However, the lack of merits in the ground advanced on the side of the D.P.P. does not F necessarily mean that the appeal fails. We have to consider the totality of the case in the interests of justice. We start with the submissions made by the learned advocates for the Respondent. With due respect we do not think that the grounds advanced on the G respondent's side constitute good reason to prevent this court from interfering with the findings of the two courts below. Although it is correct to say that we have an adversarial legal system in this country, it is important to remember that the adversarial system in this country has undergone considerable modification in its application. This H modification can be seen in a number of authorities decided by the High Court. We only need to cite two of these authorities to illustrate the position.

The first case is that of Salehe Mahamburi v Noseni Mrinda [1969] (HCD). 276. In that case, Georges, C.J. as he then was, stated: I

NYALALI CJ, MAKAME JJA AND KISANGA JJA

Looking at the matter from the point of view of English law, I would agree with the view A expressed by the District Magistrate. Proof of title here is, however, quite a difficult thing where there are no deeds showing ownership of customary land and seldom any documents evidencing a transfer. To decide cases on the basis of onus of proof, as in England, is not B desirable and would certainly not be understood. ... All effort should be made, therefore, to have all the facts brought out, rather than to depend on rules as to burden of proof - which operate fairly when legal advice is available to both sides, but not otherwise. C

The second and more relevant case is that of John Magendo v N.E Govani [1973] LRT n. 60. In that case Biron, J. as he then was stated: D

It is deplorable that any Bench-holder could treat court proceedings before him as a football match, with doubtless, the parties themselves being the ball and kicked around by their counsel, however inept they may be. E

It is the duty of a judge or magistrate conducting a case, to try the case and determine it on its merits doing justice to each party according to law. As remarked by Lord Godard, C.J. In R. v David Flynn, 52 Cr. App. R. 17. "Criminal trials are not a game. The object of a criminal trial is F to acquit the innocent and convict the guilty". Likewise the object of a civil trial is to do justice to the parties and determine the dispute between them judiciously in accordance with the law. It cannot be overstressed that it is the duty of a magistrate trying a case, not to sit back as a spectator or, to use the magistrate's terminology, a referee, and watch the proceedings, but to G try the case before him, whether a criminal or a civil one. And in order to arrive at a just decision, in civil case, the magistrate is expressly empowered by the Civil Procedure Code to summon witnesses of his own motion, and in criminal cases, he is not only empowered to H summon witnesses of his own motion, but it is mandatory for him to do so, if it appears essential to the just decision of the case. For the benefit of the magistrate it is pointed out that failure by a court to call witnesses when the justice of the case required it, has resulted I in the court's decision having been reversed on appeal to a superior tribunal. A

These decisions of the High Court of Tanzania with which we totally agree, illustrate the manner in which the High Court judges of this country have been exercising their powers B as granted by the proviso to section 2 of the Judicature and Application of Laws Ordinance, Cap. 453, by applying English law, "Only so far that the circumstances of Tanzania and its inhabitants permit, and subject to such qualification as local circumstances may render necessary". C

There is another reason why the objections raised by Advocates for the Respondent are insufficient to prevent this court from interfering with the findings of the two courts below. It is apparent that by nature extradition proceedings by virtue of section 7 of Extradition D Act, 1965, are a preliminary inquiry and not a trial. Obviously, the preliminary inquiry intended by Parliament under section 7 of the Act is that which was in existence at the time of the commencement of the Act, and not what is in use today after major amendments to the law, were made in subsequent years resulting in a purely formal E preliminary inquiry. In a preliminary inquiry as intended by Parliament up to 1965 the role of the magistrate was not that of an umpire or referee, but that of an active participant in the inquiry into the matters at hand.

We have asked ourselves, whether in these extradition proceedings, the learned F Resident Magistrate fully discharged his duties in conducting the inquiry into the matters that were raised before him. We have already mentioned that an uncertified copy of a diplomatic Verbal Note was tendered by the prosecution in the course of hearing the preliminary objection made by the Advocates for the Respondent. We agree with both G the learned Resident Magistrate, and Mapigano, J. that this unauthenticated diplomatic Verbal Note has no evidential value. But, that does not mean that the document has no significance whatsoever in the inquiry. In proceedings of this nature, such document ought at least to have put the magistrate on notice that proper and relevant evidence H could be obtained either from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the United Republic of Tanzania, or from the country which was seeking extradition of the Respondent. The significance of this unauthenticated document becomes apparent, when it is noted, that it I makes reference to earlier diplomatic exchanges between the two countries, concerning the establishment of extradition arrangements, and that, this alleged exchange of diplomatic notes occurred after the expiry of the A period of two years stipulated under what has come to be known by some international jurists as the Nyerere Doctrine State Succession, but before the enactment of the Extradition Act, 1965. We are satisfied that a reasonable tribunal of inquiry, having been put on notice about the above mentioned diplomatic exchange of notes, would not B conclude, without sufficient inquiry about the matter, that no legally binding extradition arrangements exist between the United Republic of Tanzania and the Federal Republic of Germany. This means that the learned Resident Magistrate did not fully discharge his duties according to law when hearing the preliminary objection raised by the Advocates C for the Respondent. We shall therefore have to interfere with the findings of the two courts below.

Before we do so however, we feel that we shall be failing in our duties if we do not express our dissatisfaction with the manner in which the prosecution handled these D proceedings. The prosecution lacked seriousness and purpose. This attitude is aggravated by the fact that only one state attorney appeared to argue the appeal against two defence counsels before us. Two state attorneys appeared in the court of first E instance, that is, Mr Shio and Miss Philip, and three state attorneys appeared in the High Court on appeal, that is Mr Shio, Miss Philip and Mr Mwanyika. We do not know whether the reasons for failure to have more than one state attorney appeal before us was due to shortage of experienced state attorneys in the Attorney General's Chambers. Whatever be the case, we do not think that it would have been impossible to find at least F one state attorney to join Mr Shio to assist this court reach a just decision. We would wish the Attorney General to take note of these expressions of our disapproval of the conduct on the prosecution side, and to ensure better performance in future in the G interests of justice and our nation.

Mroso, J.: The appellant was prosecuted in and convicted by the Primary Court of Chimala for the offence of wilfully and unlawfully destroying crops in a maize shamba, contrary to section 326 (1) of the Penal Code. He was sentenced to a fine of shillings I 10,000/= or six months imprisonment. The conviction followed from a plea of guilty by the accused person. He was also ordered to pay 140 bags of A maize or their equivalent monetary value as compensation to the complainant.

Although the appellant had been convicted on his own plea of guilty, he appealed to the District Court of Mbeya against both conviction, sentence, the compensation order and B an order to pay costs. The District Court dismissed the appeal except for the order for costs which was set aside. The appellant has now resorted to this court on a second appeal.
Both before the first appellate court and before this court the appellant, through his advocate, has argued that his plea of guilty was equivocal because it was not consistent C with the facts which were narrated by the prosecutor and that although the appellant admitted those facts to be correct, a plea of not guilty ought to have been entered against him.
To appreciate the import of this argument it may be necessary to quote at some length D from the Primary Court record.
The charge read as follows:

LKOSA:KUHARIBU MALI K/F 326(1) SURA 16 K.A. HABARI ZA KOSA: Mnamo tarehe 28/4/87 E saa 4.00 asubuhi katika kijiji cha Mabadaga Wilaya na Mkoa wa Mbeya, Nyerera Mainge unashitakiwa kuwa uliswagia ng'ombe zako kwenye shamba la mlalamikaji na kusababisha kuharibu mahindi yote yaliyokuwa humo shambani bila ya halali. F

To this charge the appellant replied "Ni kweli". The court recorded "Anakiri", meaning he admits the charge.

The complainant was asked (by the court) to narrate facts in support of the charge and he said as under:- G

Mnamo tarehe 28/4/87 saa 4.00 asubuhi mshitakiwa kwa makusudi aliswaga ng'ombe wake shambani, ambako kulikuwa na mahindi na ng'ombe wake wapatao 200 waliharibu mahindi yote kwenye shamba la ukubwa wa ekari saba, nilifika shambani na kukuta ng'ombe wa H mshitakiwa wamo shambani wakiwa hawana mchungaji na shamba lote limeharibiwa na kusababisha hasara ya gunia 140. Hivyo niliwakamata hao ng'ombe ndipo mshitakiwa akatokea akiwa amelewa. Tulimkamata na kumleta Mahakamani. I

MROSO J

The court recorded immediately after those facts were narrated that the accused A admitted the facts to be true. The court proceeded to convict the appellant on his own plea of guilty. When the court asked the appellant to state mitigating factors, if any, he is recorded as having said: B

Sina la kueleza lingine ila naomba kumlipa mwenzangu.

It is being argued for the appellant that since the complainant said the appellant was not present at the shamba when he (complainant) found the cattle grazing on his maize crop C and that as there was no mention of anyone who saw the appellant driving his cattle into the shamba, it could not be said with assurance that the appellant wilfully and unlawfully drove his cattle to the maize crop, to destroy it.

Learned State Attorney for the respondent Republic counter - argued that although it is D true it was not mentioned in the facts who had seen the appellant drive his cattle into the shamba and that he was not found in the shamba with his cattle and he only came later in a drunken state, yet the appellant accepted as correct the allegation against him in court that he had deliberately driven his 200 odd head of cattle into the complaint's E maize shamba. The learned State Attorney further said that the fact that the complainant did not see the appellant around when he discovered the large head of cattle in his shamba or that the appellant later appeared in a drunken condition does not negate the fact that he deliberately sent his cattle into the shamba. It is quite conceivable that the F appellant drove his cattle into the maize shamba and thereafter went away to drink his head off.

I find the State Attorney's argument quite tenable. It is thought that the appellant's cattle strayed into the complainant's shamba and, without his (appellant's) knowledge, G destroyed the maize crop, the appellant should have disputed the incriminating facts which the complainant narrated against him. On the other hand, it is reasonable to infer that the appellant well understood the damning allegations against him and knowingly accepted them as correct because such as inference would be quite consistent with the H eventual undertaking by him to compensate the complainant for the loss he had suffered. I, like the two lower courts, find that the appellant's plea of guilty was not at all equivocal but clearly unequivocal. I dismiss that ground of appeal.

I take it, too, that the appellant knowingly accepted as correct the complainant's claim I that his maize shamba was seven acres in size and that he had suffered an anticipated harvest of 140 bags of maize. Therefore, the A appellant cannot now be heard to complain that he had suffered injustice in not being present when assessment of damage caused to the complainant was being made.

Notwithstanding what I have just said above however, the trial court was not competent to order the appellant to pay back 140 bags of maize or the monetary equivalent of them B to the complainant.

The powers of Primary Court to order compensation are spelt out in paragraph 5 of the Primary Court Criminal Procedure Code, the Third Schedule of the Magistrates' Court Act, 1984. Paragraph 5 (1) (b) of the Code provides that except in a case under the C Minimum Sentences Act which a Primary Court is empowered to try, it can order compensation to the extent of shillings one thousand only.

It is quite pertinent that 140 bags of maize would cost not less that shillings 100,000/=, well above the jurisdiction of a Primary Court to order as compensation. I must, D therefore, quash the compensation order and substitute thereof compensation in the sum of shillings 1,000/= only. If the complainant feels he is entitled to a more substantial sum as compensation, he should file a civil suit against him in a court of competent jurisdiction. E

As for the sentence of a fine of shillings 10,000/= or six months imprisonment in default, the trial Primary Court had jurisdiction to impose and although the fine of 10,000/= was the maximum that court had power to impose, the appellant could hardly legitimately complain against its severity. His illegal act was grossly reckless and irresponsible and I F am not about to fault the lower courts.

For the foregoing reasons, the appeal is allowed only to extent indicated, otherwise it is dismissed.

G Order accordingly.

Mroso, J.: On 26th February, 1981 the respondent Mohamed Mateyo obtained a G decree in the District Court of Mbeya for a declaration that a house on Plot 22, Block 46 with Title number 12179 in the Mbeya Municipality belonged to him. The appellant felt aggrieved by that decree and appealed to this court. The appeal itself has had a H chequered history but I shall not go into that. Suffice it to point out that it was not until last week, the seventh year after it was filed, that it was heard.

Before the trial court it was not disputed that the house which was the subject matter of I the suit was registered in the name of the appellant. Originally the plot on which the house stands belonged to one Hilmar Kyumana. He had a Certificate of Occupancy. On 30th May, 1975 the Right of Occupancy was transferred to the appellant, in his name, in A consideration of shilling twelve thousand which was paid as purchase price of the house in the plot. The transfer was subsequently duly registered.

MROSO J

It was a matter for dispute, however, on who paid the purchase money. The appellant said he did it out of his own savings. The respondent on the other hand said he had paid B it out of love and affection for his brother, the appellant. The trial court was of the view that it was paid by the respondent.

There was a second issue on who received the rent from the tenants. Evidence was given by two witnesses who were tenants during the period between 5th May, 1975 and C 30th June, 1978. One of the witnesses said he paid rent to both the respondent and to the appellant, but at different times. The other one said he paid rent to the respondent only and that he recognized him as his landlord. The appellant in his evidence said he had authorized the respondent to collect rent on his behalf because he, the appellant, D was too busy working in an hotel of the respondent.

The trial court considered the evidence and the law and held that although the Certificate of Occupancy was in the name of the appellant the suit premises belonged to the E respondent mainly because it believed the purchase money had been paid by the respondent who also collected rent from tenants in the house and those tenants recognized him as their landlord. The crucial question in this appeal is whether the trial court had directed itself properly on the facts and on the law. F

On the evidence I think it was open for the trial court to hold both that the money for the purchase of the suit premises was paid by the respondent and that for most of the time between May, 1975 and 30th June, 1978 the respondent received the house rent and was considered by the tenants to be the landlord. But considering that the legal title to G the premises was in the name of the appellant could the trial court properly proceed to declare the suit premises the property of the respondent?

It seems to me clear that in law, the appellant in whose name the suit premises were registered was the owner. I am fortified in this view by Section 2 of the Land H Registration Ordinance, Cap. 334 which defines "Owner" in relation to any estate or interest as the person for the time being in whose name the estate or interest is registered. The appellant remained the unchallenged owner of the premises until July 1978 when the respondent purported to terminate the appellant's ownership, apparently I because of a misunderstanding between them resulting in the extinction of their mutual love and affection. A

It would appear from the facts of the case as given to the trial court as accepted by that court that the appellant had acquired title to the house by way of a gift inter vivos. Was B it open for the respondent to revoke the gift when their personal relationships charged?

Counsel for the appellant has submitted that the gift had been given unconditionally and was therefore absolute and irrevocable. He did not cite any authority for that proposition. The respondent has said before me that he had attached a condition to the C gift. He said he had told the appellant that he would hold the property in trust for his (respondent's) daughter who was then a minor. This is novel and appears to be an afterthought. The respondent never mentioned any such thing before the trial court and I do not believe he would have forgotten to mention it had it been the true position. Now, D back to the question whether the gift was absolute and irrevocable.

In the first place, the respondent as sui juris was competent to give the suit premises to the appellant as soon as he bought it by allowing him to take possession of the E Certificate of Occupancy and to register himself as the owner of the right of occupancy. It is stated on page 366 of Volume 18 of Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd Edition, that "It is on legal and aquitable principles clear that a person sui juris acting freely, and with sufficient knowledge, ought to have and has power to make, in binding and effectual F manner, a voluntary gift of any part of his property, whether capable or incapable of manual delivery, whether in possession or reversion, and howsoever circumstances"

There is no evidence that at the time the respondent paid the purchase money for the suit G premises and allowed the appellant to be registered as the owner thereof and to take possession of the certificate of occupancy he attached any conditions, precedent or subsequent, to the gift. So, in the absence of evidence to the effect that the respondent had reserved a power of revocation, and as there is no claim that the gift was induced by H fraud, undue influence, mistake or misrepresentation, of was tainted with illegality, I am constrained to hold that the gift was absolute and irrevocable.

The trial magistrate held that because there was evidence showing that the respondent was receiving rent and was considered by the tenants as the landlord, that, in effect, I annulled the appellant's legal title to the suit premises. No authority was cited for such a view and I, on my part, cannot think of any. It seems to me plain however that mere A receipt of rent from tenants cannot be sufficient in fact or in law to make the receiver, ipso facto, the owner of premises. It needs no great talent to know that owners of premises quite often do appoint agents to collect rent from tenants on their behalf. The tenants or their part may mistakenly take the agents for the landlord or, more precisely, B the owner of the premises.

Although the respondent has my sympathies in the sense that on the facts and the law of the case he is unable to take back the valuable gift which he had given to the appellant during their happier days, I have to allow this appeal by quashing the judgment of the C trial court and set aside the decree thereof. The appellant remains the owner of the suit premises and shall he entitled to costs of this court and of the court below. The costs to be taxed.

D Appeal allowed.

Bateyunga for the applicants.

Mroso, J.: The applicants, through their advocates M/S Bateyunga and Co., have B applied to this court for bail after several unsuccessful attempts which they made to the District Court of Mbeya before which they are facing a joint charge of injuring animals, contrary to section 325 of the Penal Code, Cap. 16 of the Laws. The application was made under section 149 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985. C

Learned State Attorney for the Respondent Republic has submitted that although on the merits, he would not have objected to bail, the applicants should have appealed the lower court order refusing bail and not make an application to the High Court. He did D not cite authority for that submission. Counsel for the applicants countered by saying that the usual procedure has always been that if the District Court makes a bail order adverse to an applicant, the applicant files an application, and not an appeal, to the High Court for bail or for better bail terms. E

Learned counsel for the applicants is right as to what the Procedure under the repealed Criminal Procedure Code, Cap. 20 used to be. But it is still the procedure under the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985?

Under the Criminal Procedure Code bail was grantable or refused by a subordinate F District Court under Section 123(1) of the Code and subsection (3) of Section 123 provided as follows:

(3) Notwithstanding anything contained in subsection (1) of this section the High Court may in any case direct that any person be admitted to bail or that the bail required by a subordinate G Court or a police officer be reduced.

The High Court took cognizance of the matter through an application made to it.

The provisions for bail under the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985 are to be found in H section 148. And then there is section 149 which, for ease of reference, I shall quote in full. It runs as follows:-

149. Where in connection with any Criminal proceedings a subordinate court has power to I admit any person to bail, but either refuses to do so, or does or offers to do so on terms unacceptable to him the High Court may admit him or direct his admission to bail or, where he A has been admitted to bail, may vary any conditions on which he was so admitted or reduce the amount in which he or any surety is bound to discharge any of the sureties (sic). B

The question of moment which is now relevant is, how does the matter get to the High Court? I think the answer lies in section 161 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985 which, again for ease of reference, I shall quote in full. It is in the following words: C

161. All orders passed under section 148 to 160 by any magistrate shall be appealable to and may be reviewed by the High Court.

Now, there was no such provision under the repealed Criminal Procedure Code. One D would not be misled by section 132 of the Code which read as follows:-

132. All orders passed under last preceding section by any magistrate shall be appealable to E and may be revised by the High Court. (My emphasis).

There it was only an order of forfeiture of recognizance (section 131) which was appealable or revisable, whereas under Section 161 of the Criminal Procedure Act all orders of a subordinate court relating to bail, sureties, and forfeiture of recognizances F included, are appealable to and revisable by the High Court.

From the foregoing discussion it is clear, I hope, that there is a sharp departure in procedure in the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985 from that in the repealed Criminal Procedure Code, Cap. 20. I have to rule, therefore, that the parallel application for bail G to this court after those which were made to the District Court and refused, is misconception of the law and must be dismissed. The applicants may, if they deem it necessary, appeal against the lower court order to this court and the door will be open to them. H

Application dismissed.

Case referred to.

1. R. v Magambo Kwenyema [1934] 1 EACA 169.

Mapigano and Mfalila, Ag. JJ.A. and Omar, J.A.: The appellant Said Hemedi was B convicted of the murder of his wife, one Esta d/o Rajabu, with whom he had begotten one child. The learned trial judge, Sisya, J., sentenced him to death. He has come to this Court in a bid to have the conviction altered to one of manslaughter. C

Throughout there was no dispute that the said Esta died at the hand of the appellant. The appellant admitted from the very beginning that he dealt her a panga blow on the face and wounded her, the incident taking place at Mtunda in the Korogwe District on Saturday 18/12/82. It appears that his assault was preceded by a matrimonial squabble D between the appellant and the deceased and that it took place when the two were living in separation. It was not in dispute that the deceased subsequently contracted tetanus and consequently died in the hospital on 31/1/83. The appellant denied, however, that he killed her of malice aforethought. He set up a plea of provocation, E contending that he had surprised the deceased committing adultery with P.W.3 Zahoro Buge who was formerly her husband and that the killing was done in the resultant heat of passion. What fell for consideration and determination, therefore, was whether the killing constituted murder or manslaughter. F

The prosecution produced P.W.1 Sylivester Rajabu the younger brother of the deceased. He was the principal witness for the Republic. He was a child of tender years. In the learned judge's estimation his age, at the time he appeared in the witness box in august, 1986, was between 9 and 10 years. If we go by that estimation, then the G witness was aged between 5 and 6 years at the time the killing took place. He gave unsworn evidence, the judge having got the impression, upon a voir dire, that he was sufficiently intelligent to justify the reception of his evidence, though he did not understand the nature of oath. H

According to P.W.1, the assault took place near a latrine at 8.30 p.m. at the home of his parents where the deceased was then staying. P.W.1 was then answering a call of nature inside the latrine. He had asked the deceased to escort him to the latrine and she was standing outside the latrine waiting for him when she was set upon. The deceased I cried saying "Father, I am dying" and then ran to the second house of P.W.2 Julius Nyangasa, her paternal uncle, leaving P.W.1 behind. As A it happened, P.W.1 did not see the assailant. But he denied that P.W.3 Zahoro was around, which, as we shall see presently, tended to support P.W.3's denial that the appellant found him with the deceased in flagrante sexual delicto.

P.W.2 Julius confirmed that the deceased came to his house crying and bleeding from a B fresh facial wound. In reply to his question the deceased stated that she had been attacked by her husband at the latrine. He said he did not ask her why the appellant had done so. Hours later when the appellant was brought before the elders of the village he, C the appellant, alleged that he surprised the deceased committing adultery with P.W.3 Zahoro. P.W.3 who was also present vehemently denied that allegation, saying that at the material time he was at a disco dance somewhere else.

In his testimony P.W.3 stuck to that denial. He said that since her marriage to the D appellant he had stopped talking to her. He went on to say that was not the first time for the appellant to make such a serious allegation against him. Previously, he said, the appellant had accused him of seducing the former wife, one Jane. According to him, the appellant failed to substantiate that charge when the matter was taken to the village elders. E

The appellant gave evidence in his defence. He maintained that he surprised P.W.3 and the deceased lying on the ground committing adultery, P.W.3 on top. He said the two had not completely undressed but had only pulled up or down their clothes. He was F carrying a panga and he raised it and threw it to P.W.3. He said that this time around he wanted to leave P.W.3 with a mark, because on the previous occasion, when he surprised him committing adultery with Jane, P.W.3 had subsequently denied having done so, putting forth the question why the appellant had not left him with a mark. According to the appellant, the panga missed P.W.3 and landed on the deceased G instead.

That was the substance of the evidence that was presented before the High Court in this case. After the two counsel had addressed the court and the judge had summed up the case to the three assessors the assessors stated the following opinions. The first H assessor, who seemed to have accepted the version of the appellant, found that the appellant had killed his wife accidentally. The second assessor was of the opinion that the evidence in regard to the adultery was not strong. He added that "even if there was I adultery the accused killed deliberately". He advised that the appellant should be convicted of murder. He is entitled to that

MAPIGANO Ag JJA, MFALILA Ag JJA AND OMAR JA
opinion. We wonder, though, whether he fully apprehended that the standard of proof A applicable in a criminal case of this nature is one beyond all reasonable doubt and that where the evidence burden shifts onto the accused it is sufficiently discharged by the accused by merely adducing evidence that casts a reasonable doubt in the prosecution case; and we are not sure that he understood that in this particular case, where the B appellant had put up a plea of provocation, the onus upon him was no more than to create in the mind of the court a reasonable doubt as to the truth of his story. The third assessor disbelieved the appellant's account and believed the testimony of P.W.3 that he was not present at the scene of the assault. C
In his judgement the learned judge agreed with the observation of the two assessors that the appellant must have been tracking the deceased with what he described as a "homicidal frenzy". He found that the appellant did "quietly" cut the deceased with a panga and then disappeared from the scene, again "quietly". He associated himself with D the view expressed by the third assessor and accepted the evidence given by P.W.3. He took the view that the evidence adduced by P.W.1 and P.W.2 afforded corroboration of P.W.3's alibi. He addressed his mind to the issue of mens rea and found that the appellant assaulted the deceased with the intention of doing her a serious E bodily harm at the very least.
The substantive part of the appeal is against the learned judge's finding in regard to the intelligence of P.W.1. Counsel for the appellant Mr Kavuta has addressed us at some length on this point and referred us to the relevant materials on the record. He has F invited us to find that this child was not intelligent enough and to question his recollection of the event seriously.
In our considered opinion Mr Kavuta's contention about P.W.1's intelligence is not without some basis. In actual fact that contention squares with our own analysis and assessment. As observed above, P.W.1 was aged between 5 and 6 years at the time of G the killing. He came to give evidence in the High Court four years after the event when he had attained the age of 9 or 10 years. He was then schooling in Std. III. But this is the child who told the court that he did not know the names of his parents, and H that he was not aware of the fact that his sister Esta has died. We are amazed in our judgement we are not satisfied that P.W.1 was possessed of sufficient intelligence. We therefore entertain serious misgivings about his recollection of the event.
We are fully apprehensive of the fact that we are sitting on appeal and that we have not I had the opportunity of seeing or hearing
MAPIGANO Ag JJA, MFALILA Ag JJA AND OMAR JA
the witness. But on the materials on record we strongly feel that the finding of the A learned judge in respect of P.W.1's intelligence was not reasonably open to him and we are, therefore, obliged to disturb it. We take the view that as a matter of prudence the evidence of P.W.1 required corroboration before it could be acted upon.

The question that arises then is whether the testimony of P.W.2 and P.W.3 afforded B corroboration of the evidence of P.W.1 Mr Mwale, learned State Attorney, appeared to think so. Like Mr Kavuta and Miss Mandari who appeared for the appellant at the trial we respectfully think not. We hardly find any corroboration in the evidence of P.W.2. C The material part of the evidence of P.W.2 wholly related to what took place elsewhere after the event. As shown, P.W.2 was not at the scene at the time of the assault. He could not have honestly sworn that the deceased and P.W.3 were not taken in the act of adultery. In this connection we have to point out that there is no evidential basis for the D learned judge's finding at page 51 that the alibi put forward by P.W.3 was supported in material particular by the evidence of P.W.2.

If we believed the alibi of P.W.3 can sufficiently afford corroboration of the evidence of P.W.1. It has been submitted, however, that P.W.3 was a witness who had his own E interest to serve and that it was unsafe to act on his evidence. We agree. It is possibly true that P.W.3 had been intruding into the appellant's matrimony. In sum we think that the defence of provocation should have availed the appellant. Of course the possibility F that the appellant intended to hit P.W.3 does not detract from that defence. As was restated in R. v Mgambo Kwenyema, (1934) 1 E.A.C.A. 169, if a person feloniously assaults another in such circumstances as would make the killing of that other person manslaughter, by accident hits and kills a third person whom he never intended to hit at G all, he is guilty of manslaughter.

Aside from that we think that malice aforethought was not sufficiently established. We are rather surprised that neither Mr Kavuta in this Court nor Miss Mandari in the High Court did touch on this point, but as we have pointed out, the learned judge adverted to H it in his judgment and found that the appellant intended to injure the deceased seriously. We get the impression that the learned judge did not examine the materials on record critically. It seems to us that the relevant materials evidence contained in the post-mortem report was of minimal help. There is hardly any way one can tell with I certitude how heavy was the single blow and how serious was the wound that was occasioned. As shown, the deceased died in the hospital on 31/1/83, that is 49 days after as the result of tetanus that had set in the A wound in the meantime. We are of the view, therefore, that in any event the killing only constituted manslaughter and not murder.

We allow the appeal, set aside the conviction of murder and substitute one of manslaughter therefor. We sentence the appellant to imprisonment for a term of five B years effective from the date of the conviction in the High Court.

C Appeal allowed.

Mroso, J.: The appellant was charged in the District Court of Iringa with a total of twenty five counts. Ten of them were on fraudulent false accounting, contrary to section D 317 (c) of the Penal Code, eleven counts were on stealing by Public Servant, contrary to sections 265 and 270 of the Penal Code and the remaining four counts were on forgery, contrary to sections 333, 335 (c) and 337 of the Penal Code. Although he disputed all the counts the trial District Court found him guilty on nine counts of E fraudulent false accounting, for which he was sentenced to two years imprisonment on each count; on ten counts of theft by public servant he was sentenced, on some, to six years imprisonment on each count and, on others, to four years imprisonment on each count. On the forgery counts he was found guilty and convicted on three counts and F was sentenced to two years imprisonment on each count. The sentences were ordered to run concurrently. He left dissatisfied with the convictions and sentences, hence his appeal to this court.

During the period between July, 1982 and August, 1983 the appellant worked as an G accounts assistant in the office of the Officer Commanding District, Iringa (O.C.D) and had two accounts clerks working under him. among his duties, he collected government revenue, issued Exchequer Receipts to those making payments to him and eventually banked the collections. It would appear (as no direct evidence was given) that before H taking collections to the bank he had first enter the total amount into a Bank Pay-in-slip, also known as a letter transfer. It would also appear (again, because no evidence on procedure to be followed was given at the trial) that serial numbers of Exchequer Receipt which had been issued when collections were being made were quoted on the I Pay-in-slips. It may also be inferred from the recorded evidence that the Pay-in-slips were prepared in A several copies.

It was alleged before the trial court that the appellant wrote on the Pay-in-Slips amounts which were less than the actual collections which related to the Exchequer receipt that were quoted on the relevant Pay-in-Slips. It was further impliedly alleged that the B appellant banked only the amounts shown on the pay-in-slips and misappropriated the difference in the collections.

On the whole the case was prosecuted in an unsatisfactory manner and the evidence as well as the judgement were generally not as good as they should have been. As it is C already apparent, certain important evidence was not given but was merely assumed. For example, no evidence was led regarding what ought to have been the proper procedure to be followed by the appellant in taking custody of various accounts books, in receipting payments; or in what other books or documents revenue so received was to D be entered; the procedure leading to banking of revenue; if there was any practice of bank reconciliation, et cetera, et cetera. No bank employees gave evidence on the value or importance of Pay-in-slips, whether the amounts shown on the face of the originals of the pay in slips were actually received by the bank, what could be the explanation for the E difference in the amounts shown on the originals of the pay-in-slips and those shown on the copies thereof, all of which were rubber-stamped by bank staff. Also, although the appellant is said to have stolen a large part of the revenue he used to collect, no Bank statements for the relevant period were produced in evidence to show the actual F amounts which were credited on the days the appellant banked revenue collections.

The case was tried by two magistrates in succession. The first trial magistrate was apparently transferred from Iringa District Court before completing the trial. The G succeeding magistrate properly informed the appellant of his rights under Section 214 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985. The appellant requested that two witnesses, namely PW2 and PW4 be recalled go give evidence afresh because, as he later made it very clear, he wished the succeeding magistrate himself to hear the evidence of those H witnesses, and not to act on their evidence which the first trial magistrate heard and recorded. The wish of the appellant, which was granted, was sanctioned by section 214 (2) (a) of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985. Unfortunately, however, this second trial magistrate in his judgement also considered the evidence of PW2 and PW4 which his I predecessor had heard and recorded as well as their evidence which he (the succeeding magistrate) heard and recorded. In some cases, A the magistrate preferred to believe the version of those witnesses' evidence which they had given to the first magistrate rather than the evidence they gave before him (the accused). Once the accused indicates his choice, the trial court is not entitled to circumvent it. B

In this judgement I shall not go into all the unsatisfactory features of the trial court judgement, which are not very few. However, I have carefully gone through all the evidence, including the exhibits which are produced at the trial. It is glaringly clear that the appellant committed some fraudulent false accounting offences and stole government C revenue. In his defence to the trial court he admitted that the originals of Pay-in-Slips which were tendered in evidence were written by him and bore his signature. He said the amounts of money shown on them were correct. That can only mean that those D were the amounts he took to the bank for banking. However, the total collections according to the Exchequer Receipts quoted on pay-in-slips, and the appellant gave no explanation at all for the discrepancies. The irresistible inference is that the accused stole the difference in those amounts of money.

The evidence to prove the offences of forgery was questionable. The documents alleged E to have been forged are triplicates of letter transfers (pay- in-slips). I have looked at those copies and they are all shown to have been overwritten with superimposed figures. There was no conclusive evidence that it was the appellant who did so. In effect, the F convictions on the forgery counts are quashed and sentences imposed in respect of them set aside.

Although the trial court convicted the appellant on count 18 relating to the theft of Shs. 9,795/=, there does not appear to be clear evidence to proved the charge. PW1 who G was giving evidence to prove the various counts told the trial court "I am confused on the 18th count. I request the court (sic) to continue with the 19th count". The witness did not again advert to that count so, the conviction on that count is unsupportable. It is quashed and the sentence of six years imposed for it is set aside. H

As for counts 22, 23 and 25, there was no firm evidence to prove them. The trial magistrate said of count 22 - "there was no evidence that this amount (of shillings 11,088/15) was banked". "The presumption is that the accused stole this money". But I the prosecution had to positively prove that the money was not banked or in any other way accounted for, and to convict on that kind of presumption is a novel standard of proof. An accused person can only be convicted on A proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Convictions on counts 23 and 25 were partly based on secondary evidence (a) buff-copy of a pay-in-slip) which did not satisfy the provisions of section 67 of the Evidence Act, 1967 on the admissibility of secondary evidence, and partly on omitted evidence. The trial magistrate excused the B non-adduction of necessary evidence by reasoning thus:

However, I am mindful, that the practice is to summon bank officials to testify on the banking of C the money in question. But, perhaps, this omission on the part of the Police Investigator or Public Prosecutor, is not fatal to this case.

With respect to the learned resident magistrate, that omission was fatal to the charges and the convictions, therefore, cannot be allowed to stand. They are quashed and the D sentences imposed in respect of them set aside.

In effect the appeal is dismissed on counts 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15 and 16. The sentences imposed on those counts are not excessive and are upheld. The E appeal is allowed on counts 18, 22, 23, 24 and 25.

Mwalusanya, J.: The appellant in this appeal Dotto d/o Rubera successfully sued the G respondent Clement s/o Mhigi at Burizayombo Primary Court in a claim of refund of 13 heads of cattle under Sukuma customary law. The appellant is the aunt of the respondent in that the mother of the respondent one Kulwa d/o Rubera (PW.2) is a twin H sister of the appellant. The respondent is an illegitimate child of this Kulwa d/o Rubera.

Sometime back, about 20 years ago, the respondent wanted to marry, but he had no father to provide him with the dowry cattle. His mother Kulwa d/o Rubera (PW.2) went to ask her twin sister, the appellant, for some cattle on that she could give the same to I her son to marry. The appellant was kind enough, as she gave out 13 heads of cattle to Kulwa d/o Rubera who in turn gave them to the respondent for A marrying. The respondent duly got married and has children of his own.

Just recently it is said the respondent began to despise and quarrel with his mother and appellant. In other words he has decided to kill the goose that lays the golden egg. It is B said that he has completely cut off from his mother and appellant and that he provides them with no assistance despite their old age. When respondent had his three daughters married, he had no courtesy to inform his mother and the appellant. So the mother and the appellant are fending for themselves. Then there came a time when an insult was C added to an injury. It is said there was a piece of land which appellant and PW.2 had given to one of their sons for use, so that the crops from the shamba could help them. However respondent left his home in Sengerema District to go to claim that piece of land in Biharamulo District. He sued that boy in court, arguing that his mother and the D appellant had no title to pass to the son they had given him. We do not know who succeeded in that case, but that was the bitter pill that appellant and PW.2 could not swallow and the suit they filed.

There was the issue raised at the District Court, which was not dealt with by the trial E court, about the locus standi of the appellant who preferred the suit, as she was not the one who had personally handed over or given the cattle to the respondent. It was the respondent's mother PW.2 who had handed over the cattle to the respondent. In my view the District Court was right that the appellant was privy to the contract under F Sukuma Customary law, even if she was not the one who had personally handed over the cattle to the respondent. In fact that was a non-issue at the trial, as it was common knowledge that under Sukuma customary law, on the facts as presented, the appellant was privy to the contract and had a locus standi to prefer the suit. We should always G be wary not to introduce any notions of foreign law in our customary law. However reprehensive the customary law may be, it is not for the courts to change it, but for the customary law community concerned to do it. Therefore the trial court was right to be H silent on this issue, as it was conceded that the appellant indeed had a locus standi.

Now let me go to the matter in controversy. It was conceded at the trial that under Sukuma Customary Law it is proper for a parent or near relative to claim back anything given to a child, who later 'sins' against the donor. However, it is stated that the 'sins' I must be grave enough for such a drastic step to be taken. The trial magistrate together with the two assessors were of the unanimous view that the 'sins' A which were committed by the respondent were grave enough to justify the appellant to prefer the claim; and accordingly judgment was entered in favour of the appellant.

The respondent appealed to the District Court he was successful. The learned District B Magistrate called her own assessors who advised her that under Sukuma Customary Law only two 'sins' justified a parent to claim back what he donated to his son, and those were witchcraft directed at the donor and assaulting the donor. As the sins which the respondent had committed were not among those recognized ones, the District Court C held that the claim should fail.

In my considered view, the learned District Magistrate was wrong to enlist the help of assessors at the District Court under s.9(3) of the Magistrates' Court Act No. 2 of 1984. According to my understanding such provision should only be invoked when the D District Court hears a case in its original jurisdiction or when hearing an appeal in case where the trial court omitted to consider a matter of customary law. It will be appropriated that if a District Court calls its own set of assessors on a point which was decided by assessors at the trial court, there would be chaos, as has happened in this E case. So on that ground, my interpretation of the section in question, is to be preferred. The District Court should only have reviewed the decision of the trial court without enlisting the help of the assessors. So on that ground alone, the decision of the District Court must be faulted. F

And as a matter of principle I think the opinions of the assessors of the trial court are responsible and to be preferred. What the Sukuma customary law stipulates is that the 'sins' should be grave enough so as to justify claim of a refund from a delinquent child. G It would be anamolous if the sins recognized, were only witchcraft and assault of the donor, while such grave sins as committing adultery with the donor's wife or stealing huges sums of money or cattle from the donor were omitted. That cannot be the Sukuma customary law for which much credit is given to the wisdom of the Sukuma ancestors. H

In the event this appeal is allowed. The decision of the District Court is set aside and that of the Primary Court is restored. Order accordingly.

Mwalusanya, J.: The appellant in this appeal Martin s/o Ernest was charged and convicted of the offence of being in possession of property suspected to have been G stolen or unlawfully obtained c/o 312 (b) of the Penal Code Cap. 16. He was sentenced to two years imprisonment. He is now appealing against conviction and sentence.
It was not in dispute at the trial that the appellant was a police officer stationed at H Kwimba Township. There was a house which accommodated many other policemen including the appellant, but each had his own room. On 22/9/86 it was reported that a firearm was stolen from Kwimba Police Station and so a point was made of searching a room of each of the policemen. At about 8.30 p.m. Insp. Bernard Maduhu (PW.1) I accompanied by other policemen like D/Copl. Kajoki (PW.2) and Sgt. John (PW.3) and P/C Boniphace (PW.4) A proceeded to search the rooms of the various policemen. In the accused's room under his bed there was found a car's windscreen and a fanbelt of a vehicle. When asked where he got those things, it is said the appellant explained that he had seized them from B a certain driver from Mwanza called Nassoro whom he suspected to have had stolen the same. He said that he asked the said Nassoro to produce the receipts so that the said items could be released. He said that up to that time, the said Nassoro had not returned. C

At the trial the appellant denied that the alleged items were found in his room nor that he had ever told his arresters that the items belonged to one Nassoro. He testified that the items were planted on him by the policemen who conducted the search.
However the trial court found the prosecution witnesses to be truthful witnesses and D hence the conviction. I have no ground to fault the trial court, as the case depended on the matter of the credibility of the witnesses for which the trial court was better situated to assess. The memorandum of appeal does not raise any point worthy of consideration. This was a clear case in which the appellant had failed to give a reasonable explanation E to how he came by the property found with him. The conviction was rightly registered.
As regards sentence, I find that it was reasonable and met the justice of the case. In the event the appeal is dismissed in its entirely. Order accordingly F

Chipeta, J.: In Ujiji primary court, the present respondent, Mwanaidi d/o Rashid, sued the present appellant, Ally Nyembwe, for recovery of a plot measuring two acres.

After a full trial, the learned presiding primary court magistrate summed up the case to the gentlemen assessors. The two gentlemen assessors were unanimously of the view E that the respondent/plaintiff had proved her claim and gave their reasons for holding those opinions. The learned trial magistrate dissented and gave his reasons. The learned magistrate, however, continued: F

Kutokana na uwezo aliopewa Hakimu wa Mahakama ya Mwanzo na sheria, sio lazima afuate maoni ya washauri. Kwa hiyo Mahakama inaamua kuwa madai haya hayakuthibitika kwa sababu mdaiwa aliipata sehemu hiyo ki halali. Amri: Madai hayakuthibitika, mdaiwa G aendelee kulihudumia shamba lake kwa sababu alilipata kihalali".

The respondent then appealed to the District Court. The learned principal district magistrate of the first appellate court took the view that the learned primary court magistrate had grossly misdirected himself in that he acted contrary to express provisions H of section 7 (2) of the Magistrates' Court Act, 1984. In the opinion of the learned principal district magistrate, the error was incurable. He accordingly allow the appeal and ordered a retrial.

During the hearing of this appeal, Mr Kwikima, learned counsel for the appellant, I submitted that the first appellate court could itself have re-assessed the evidence and decided the issues without ordering a A retrial.

Without labouring the point, I respectfully agree with the learned principal district magistrate that the learned primary court magistrate of the court of first instance clearly B acted contrary to express statutory provisions. Section 7 (2) of the Magistrate's Court Act, 1984 unambiguously states:

(2) All matters in the primary court including a finding of any issue, the question of adjourning a hearing, application for bail, a question of guilt or innocence of any accused person, the C determination of sentence, the assessment of any monetary award and all questions and issues what-soever shall, in the event of difference between a magistrate and the assessors or any of them, be decided by votes of the majority of the magistrate and assessors present D and in the event of an equality of votes the magistrate shall have the casting vote in addition to his deliberative vote.

In the present case, the court was constituted by the primary court magistrate and two E gentlemen assessors. Since the two gentlemen assessors were unanimous in their finding, the learned primary court magistrate had no option but to draw up a judgement of the court containing the decision of the majority of the court and the reasons for the decision.

The learned primary court magistrate, therefore, had no authority to overrule the F unanimous opinions of the two gentlemen assessors however perverse their opinions might have appeared to him. The only option the learned magistrate had was to write his dissenting opinion.

The result in this case, then, is that there was, in effect, no judgement, and such "order" G as was purportedly made by the learned magistrate had no legal validity.

This error, in my view, and with deference to the learned principal district magistrate, was such a fundamental breach of mandatory statutory provisions as to be incurable. H

For the foregoing reasons, this appeal fails and is accordingly dismissed with costs in this court and the courts below. It is hereby directed that the suit be tried de novo by a court of competent jurisdiction constituted by a different magistrate and different panel of assessors. I

Mapigano and Mfalila, Ag. JJ.A. and Omar, J.A.: Moses Kasisi, also known as A Charles Deo, was brought to the Court of Resident Magistrate at Kisutu along with two other persons jointly charged with four counts of robbery with violence contrary to sections 285 and 286 of the Penal Code, one count of rape contrary to section 130 of B the Penal code, and one count of unlawful possession of offensive weapons contrary to section 8 (1) of the National Security Act, 1970. It has been contended before this court that the count of unlawful possession of offensive weapons was flawed, but we will leave that for later. C

The third accused, Bernard Shabani, also known as Luto Beni, jumped bail before the starts of the hearing and it appears that he is still at large. The learned magistrate applied the relevant provisions of the law and proceeded to try Bernard in absentia. The magistrate convicted all of them on only two counts of robbery and on the other two D counts. On the day of prosecuting the other co-accused, one Haruna Rashid, also known as Alli Basho, did not turn up. Like Bernard he was sentenced in absentia. The trial magistrate handed down a substantive sentence of imprisonment for seven years to each of them and Haruna has not been arrested to-date.

Moses who was described as the second accused was dissatisfied with the convictions E and the sentences. He lodged an appeal to the High Court at Dar es Salaam. He engaged an advocate, Mr. Lipiki, to appear for him. He succeeded in part. In his judgement dated 26.11.86 the learned judge (Kazimoto, J) upheld all the convictions F and the sentences except the conviction and the sentence on the rape charge. In real terms that fractional success was hardly of any consequence. Again Moses was not satisfied and he instructed his counsel Mr. Lipiki to lodge an appeal to this court, against the decision of the High Court to the extent that it dismissed his appeal. G

The incident that gave rise to this case took place in the city of Dar es Salaam on 26.2.80 during the night. We have read the evidence that was adduced in the trial court. That which was led by the prosecution depicts the appellant and his co-accused as H forging bandits who embarked on a series of armed robberies, and who ended up by staging a sexual assault on one woman at Ubungo. It seems to us that the case for the prosecution was mainly based on their identification by two witnesses and on the discovery of three pistols in the rooms they were occupying in a guest house called Mkwajuni. I

Three witnesses gave evidence on the side of the prosecution in relation to the robbery charges. The first was Nuru Ali Mohamed (PW 1). He was a A taxi driver. His vehicle was a Toyota Corolla bearing registration number MS 9109. He was driving the car along Azikiwe Street at about 8 p.m when two strangers hailed him. He stopped the car and at the instance of the two passengers he drove the car towards Upanga Sports Club. On the way at the point of a pistol one of his passengers B relieved him on the steering wheel; his wrist watch and his money. The car was driven to Tabata where he was dropped. The witness then went to the Central Police Station to make a report. On the following day he found his wrist watch, exhibit P1, came into C the custody of the police. This incident was the subject - matter of one of the two robbery counts of which the appellant was convicted, and it may be pointed out that throughout PW 1 did not even pretend to have identified his robbers.

The second witness was Basil Suprapesan (PW 2). He was relieved of his Peugeot D Car, cash and a gold chain by three bandits who menacingly levelled pistols at him. He was then driving the car along Mataka Street at about 11.20 pm. The three bandits came driving a taxi bearing registration number MS 9109. They overtook him and stopped the taxi in front, thereby blocking him. One of the bandits climbed into his car E and drove off. The other two climbed into the taxi and followed. He said the place was lit and he identified the appellant as one of the three bandits. At first he said he identified all the three bandits at a parade on the next day. Later he said that the parade in question took place a few days after the incident. Now this incident formed the subject-matter of the other robbery count in respect of which a conviction was also recorded. F
The other witness was Saiduu Nassoro (P.W.5), the woman who said she was raped at Ubungo. She had a boyfriend, a diplomat, whose name she did not disclose. The two had gone to a cine-theatre for relaxation in that evening and then to the Oysterbay Hotel G for dinner. They had then left the hotel and driven to the residence of the diplomat at Mawenya Road in Upanga. Three bandits pounced upon them at the gate. According to her, the bandits came there in a taxi and two of them climbed down, pistol drawn. The bandits despoiled the diplomat of all the money he had and then literally abducted her H and took her to the still of a forest at Ubungo where they raped her in turn. She alleged that she identified the appellant to be one of the three bandits. She said she had observed him at a lit trench where the taxi overtook another car. She added that she subsequently picked him out at an identification parade that was conducted by the police I in same night.
MAPIGANO AG JJA, MFALILA AG JJA AND OMAR JA
The appellant was apprehended in the same night. Likewise his co-accused persons. A They were found at Mkwajuni Guest House. Each was occupying a room and in each room was a pistol. According to SP Jeremiah Kilingo (P.W.3), he found the pistol exhibit P.3 lying under a pillow loaded with two bullets. This evidence was not in dispute. B

The defence of the appellant and the co-accused were similar. Both were residing at Mwananyamala in the city. They said nothing about the allegations of robberies and rape that were levelled against them. They said nothing about the pistols that were found C in the rooms they were sleeping. Their evidence was virtually confined to their arrest at the guest house, the torture they underwent at the hands of the police, and their subsequent detention.

The trial magistrate accepted the evidence of P.W.1 Nuru and P.W.2 Basil, and relying on the identification of the appellant by P.W. 2 he found that the appellant was one of D the bandits who robbed the two witnesses. He also accepted the evidence of P.W.5 Saiduu and her identification of the appellant and accordingly found that the appellant was one of the bandits who raped her. Next he found that the appellant and the two co-accused were found each possessed a pistol, and in the absence of any explanation E as to how they came by the firearms he concluded that their possession of the weapon was illegal.

As we have shown, the decision of the trial magistrate in regard to the rape charge was upset by the High Court. Citing three decisions, the judge held that the trial magistrate F had erred in that he had not directed himself to the requirement of corroboration in sexual offences and in that he had not warned himself of the dangers of acting on the uncorroborated testimony of the complainant. We wish to make a short observation about this particular matter.

We agree that it is the rule that in any sexual offence, if the person against whom the G offence is alleged to have been committed be an adult, the court should warn itself that it is not safe to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of the complainant but that if it is satisfied of the truth of the complainant's evidence, it may, after paying attention to the H warning, nevertheless convict. We understand that the wisdom underlying this rule came from the 17th Century English jurist Sir Matthew Hale, who wrote: "rape is an accusation easily to be made and hard to be proved, and harder to be defended by the party accused.." There has been a change of attitude in some quarters and the point has I been made that the protection constructed around a rape accused by Western jurisdictions are the envy of a murder accused. But we would not really like to go into A the matter at any great length. We may conclude by only saying that it may now be desirable to relook into the whole question of corroboration as it relates to sexual offences.

We turn to the grounds set forth in the memorandum of appeal. The first two grounds are directed at the finding of the two courts below in regard to the identification of the B appellant by P.W. 2 Basil. It was Mr. Lipiki's contention that the evidence of this witness was unsatisfactory, and we understood him to argue that if the learned judge has carefully scrutinized that evidence he would have reached the conclusion that the C identification was not really freed from error. With regard to the identification of the appellant at the scene of crime i.e Mataka Street, Mr. Lipiki has pointed out that there was no evidence as to the source of the light that illuminated the place and as to its degree of brightness. And with regard to the identification of the appellant at the parade, D the learned counsel has submitted that it was not established that the parade had been properly conducted i.e in terms of R. v Mango Manaa (1936) EACA 29. He said he invited us to liken such parade proceeding to an accused's extra-judicial statement. According to him, the prosecusion is obliged to establish the propriety of the proceeding E in every case in which it wants the extra-judicial statement introduced into the evidence, the absence of any objection by the defence notwithstanding. Mrs Malecela who appeared for the Republic before us disagreed.

The other two grounds of this appeal concern the possession of the pistols and the F arguments advanced by Mr. Lipiki in this court and in the High Court had two limbs. In the first place Mr. Lipiki submitted that there was no solid and constraining evidence that the appellant was in possession of the pistols. In the legal sense, he submitted, possession connotes knowledge on the part of the possessor. The circumstances, he G further submitted, did not rule out the possibility of the pistols having been planted in the rooms or left there by other prsons who had had access to the room. Secondly, Mr. Lipiki argued that the charging of possession of three pistols in one count was a misjoinder, given the circumstances as presented by the prosecution. Mrs. Malecela H would not subscribe to that view and she would not associate herself with Mr. Lipiki,s other contention that there was a miscarriage of justice, that is if there was actually a misjoinder.

Addressing ourselves to the question of identification we have to point out that this was I an issue of fact. In our view we think that the finding of the lower courts on this point was open to them and in principle we see no A good reason to disturb that finding. Indeed, the appellant's possession of the pistol in that very night was, in our view, a circumstance that lent some support to the identification of the appellant by PW 2 Basil. It has been suggested here that the pistols B that P.W. 2 saw were possibly toy-pistols. Surely we cannot treat that argument with any seriousness, it is drawn too much on imagination.

We have been urged to equate an identification parade proceeding with an extra-judicial statement proceeding. We have been invited to hold that the prosecution should have C led evidence to establish the propriety of the parade, regardless of the fact that there was no suggestion that it was improperly conducted. We regret we cannot do so.

For one thing, an extra-judicial statement, if it contains an admission or a confession, is at D law substantive evidence. An extra-judicial parade proceeding is not substantive evidence, it is only admitted for collateral purposes, in the majority of cases it serves to corroborate the dock identification of an accused by the witness, in terms of section 166 of the Evidence Act, 1967. For another, it is wrong to say that the prosecution is E obliged to prove the propriety of an extra-judicial statement in every case in which the prosecution seeks to adduce it, even where the admission of the statement is not resisted. The law does not say so and we have absolutely no desire to change it.

We turn to consider the question of possession. Mr. Lipiki is perfectly right in saying F that possession connotes knowledge on the part of the possessor. Common sense and justice require that it be so. The words of Lord Parker in R. v Cavendish [1961] 1 W.L.R 1083 at p. 1085 bears repeating here: for a person to be found to have had G possession, actual or constructive, of goods it must be proven either that he was aware of their presence and that he exercised some control over them, or that the goods came, albeit in his absence, at his invitation and arrangement. But it is also true that mere possession sometimes denotes knowledge and control. The example par excellence is H where, in a case of robbery with firearm violence. The robber is caught at the scene wielding the weapon. His wielding of the weapon would inevitably imply knowledge and control on his part. Each case must be decided on its own set of circumstances.
In the instant case the appellant was found in a room in a guest house. He was alone I and the pistol was found lying underneath the pillow. He owed the court a plausible explanation as to how the weapon came to be A there. There was none that came from him. In the circumstances we are satisfied that the court was entitled to find that he was in possession of the pistol and we think that his advocate's suggestion in the High Court and before us that the pistol might have been put into the room by some one else is far-fetched. B
Finally, we come to the question of mis-joinder. Standing alone, the charge of unlawful possession is, on the face of it, quite perfect, and for a person who did not know the evidence that the Republic had assembled against the accused persons, when the accused were first brought to the court to answer the charge, it was, at the conclusion of C the evidence of the prosecution, rather a case of the evidence not fully supporting the charge. We agree that it was wrong to charge the appellant with possession of the other two pistols that were found with the other two accused in the other rooms. In view of the evidence that was adduced we think that there should have been three separate D counts of unlawful possession in this case. That was a procedural error and we are satisfied that the error did not occasion a failure of justice. We set it right by convicting the appellant of unlawful possession of only one pistol namely exhibit P.3, and with that we dismiss the appeal. E
Appeal dismissed.

The appellant, original plaintiff, in the Resident Magistrate's court made the following applications. First that he wished to proceed without counsel. Secondly, he wanted the case to be heard before another magistrate. The magistrate granted the first application C but refused the second on the grounds that there were no sufficient reasons as to why he should not hear the case. The plaintiff refused to give testimony. The magistrate dismissed the case under Order XVII rule 3 of the CPC. The appellant filed an application in the High Court under section 79(1)(c) of the CPC, section 44(1) of the D MCA and any other enabling legal provisions, asking it to revise the proceedings of the Resident Magistrate's Court. The High Court dismissed the application on grounds that section 79(1)(c) of the CPC did not apply to this case amongst other reasons. The High Court did not consider the other provisions under which the application was made. The E appellant applied for leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal which was duly granted.

Mfalila and Mapigano, Ag. JJ.A. and Omar, J.A.: The appellant Zabron C Pangamaleza was the plaintiff in Iringa Resident Magistrate's Court Civil Case No. 9 of 1986 in which he sued the two respondents claiming special damages amounting to shs. 100,000/= and general damages for wrongful arrest, beating, charges and convictions as a result of which he was injured in his credit, character and reputation. He also alleged D to have lost in the process working implements worth shs. 58,000/= and 640 bags of charcoal worth shs. 89,600/=.
After the pleadings were completed or at least the court thought they were, the trial E opened before the Senior Resident Magistrate Mr. S J Kanyama on 29th January, 1987. The appellant made the following two applications before the trial got under way. First he told the court that he wished the case to proceed without his counsel in whom he no longer had confidence. Secondly he informed the presiding Senior Resident F Magistrate that he wanted the case to proceed before another magistrate because he said he did not have confidence in him as he did not trust him. The learned Senior Resident Magistrate made the following ruling: G

As regard to the 1st request by the plaintiff to reject the services of his advocate, the application is readily granted by the court, because he has the right and is completely free to employ or reject the services of an advocate. Since he now tells the court that he no longer wishes to employ the services of his advocate Mr. Mwakasungula, his application is granted. H The plaintiff will henceforth conduct his own case. As regard to his second limb of application, in which he applies that I should not try his case because in his own words "sikuamini" when pressed further on why he does not trust me as a trial magistrate, he says I "sikuamini hivi hivi", owing to this I think that it would be a total abdication of my duties as a magistrate, if I were to grant the plaintiff's application on such flimsy excuses. (sic.) I do not know either of A the parties to this case outside the walls of this court, and wish to state that my conscience is quite clear. Unless therefore there are any other reasons, I will hear this case because it is my duty to do so generally since one of the defendants has travelled all the way from Mbeya. B

The plaintiff than told the magistrate:

Since you still insist to hear this case and I do not want you to hear it, then I will not say C anything.

Thereupon the Senior Resident Magistrate made the following order:

The plaintiff's refusal to testify in proof of his suit, is tantamount to a refusal to prove his suit, D and this being the case I take it as a withdrawal of his right to prove the suit before the court. For these reasons, since both the defendants are before the court and have travelled all the way from Makete and Mbeya respectively in defence of the suit which the plaintiff does not wish E to prosecute, I hereby see no alternative except to dismiss the suit. The suit dismissed for want of prosecution and the plaintiff is condemned to pay all costs.

The appellant filed an application in the High Court at Mbeya under section 79 (1) (c) of F the Civil Procedure Code, Section 44 (1) of the Magistrates' Courts' Act "and any other enabling provision of the law" asking that court to revise the proceedings of the Resident Magistrate's Court at Iringa in this case and set aside the order dismissing his G claim for want of prosecution.

The application came before Mtenga J., who dismissed it holding that the allegations against the trial Magistrate by the appellant were baseless and improper and that in any H case section 79 (1) of the Civil Procedure Code on which the application was based applied to jurisdiction alone and that once it is settled that a court has jurisdiction to determine a question and it determines that question, it cannot be said that it has acted illegally or with material irregularity because it has come to an erroneous decision on a I question of fact or even law. The learned judge gave another reason for dismissing the application.

MAPIGANO AG JJA, MFALILA AG JJA AND OMAR JA

He said that since the appellant was present in court and when called upon to present his A case he declined to do so without any justifiable reasons, the Senior Resident Magistrate was right in dismissing the suit as he was entitled to do under the provisions of order XVII Rule 3 of the Civil Procedure Code which provides: B

Where any party to a suit to whom time has been granted fails to produce his evidence, or to perform any other act necessary to the further progress of the suit, for which time has been allowed, the court may, notwithstanding such default, proceed to decide the suit forthwith. C

This, the learned judge said, was the position in this case hence there was no room for the High Court to exercise its revisional powers in the matter. The appellant applied for leave to appeal to this court against this order and the High Court (Mwaikasu, J.) in a D very elaborate ruling allowed the application and granted leave to appeal.

I think Mtenga, J. was right in refusing to exercise his revisional powers under the provisions of section 79(1) of the Civil Procedure Code. For as the earlier decisions in E Matemba v Yanulinga [1968] E.A. 643 and Balakrishina v Vasudeva (1917) 44 I.A. 261 quoted by the learned judge rightly state, this section is primarily if not wholly concerned with jurisdiction and it cannot be said that in this case the Senior Resident Magistrate irregularly or illegally assumed jurisdiction or did not exercise it. As far as the F jurisdiction of the Magistrate and the court is concerned I can find nothing wrong with the way it was exercised. Hence if this had been the only provision under which the High Court could assume revisional jurisdiction, I would have had no difficulty with Mtenga, J.'s decision dismissing the application. But not only are there other provisions G under which matters, but they had actually been cited in the application. The applicant had cast his net as widely as possible. He cited section 44(1) (b) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1984 which provides:

44 (1) In addition to any other powers in that behalf, conferred upon the High Court, the High H Court

(a) ....

(b) May, in any proceeding of a civil nature determined in a District Court or Court of a I Resident Magistrate, on application being made in that behalf by any party or of its own motion, if it appears that there has been error material to the merit of the case, A involving injustice, revise the proceedings and make such decision or order.

1987 TLR p145

The learned judge did not even address himself to this provision to see whether it B widened the High Court's civil revision jurisdictional powers. Unlike section 79(1) of the Civil Procedure Code, this section goes beyond jurisdictional considerations. It covers merits of the case, that is to say the High Court can assume revisional jurisdiction in any case where it appears that there has been an error material to the merits of the C case involving injustice. In the present case the appellant had challenged the impartiality of the presiding Magistrate and therefore felt that he would not receive fair treatment in his court. Accordingly he applied for the case to be tried by another magistrate. The magistrate brushed aside these objections holding that it would be a total abdication of D his duties as a Magistrate were he to grant the application on such flimsy excuses and declared that his conscience was clear. I have no doubt at all that it was, but that was not the point. The point was the state of mind of the plaintiff before him. So while I am certain that the magistrate would have ensured that justice was done had he tried the E case, the plaintiff before him would not have seen that it was actually done. By insisting to hear the case against such strong opposition and proceeding to dismiss it, the magistrate not only confirmed the appellant's worst fears of his having a personal interest F in the matter, but also amounted to an error material to the merits of the case involving injustice to the appellant. It is for this reason that the approach of the learned judge was wrong. He approached the whole case as if he were trying the merits and truthfulness of the appellant's allegations against the presiding magistrate. He said at page 23 of the record: G

I must say without hesitation that the allegations levelled against the learned trial Senior Resident Magistrate by the applicant are baseless and they are unwise as well as improper and they are lacking in respect to the learned trial Senior Resident Magistrate as well as to the H court....

As indicated, this was straying into wrong ground. First of all, there was no evidence before the learned judge which enabled him to conclude that the allegations against the I Resident Magistrate were baseless unwise and improper. Secondly, as to lack of respect, I thought that judicial officers should earn not demand the respect of members of the A public.

The safest thing to do for a judicial officer who finds his integrity questioned by litigants or accused persons before him, is to give the benefit of doubt to his irrational accusers and retire from the case unless it is quite clear from the surrounding circumstances and B the history of the case that the accused is employing delaying tactics. Apart from ensuring that justice is seen to be done, he saves himself from unnecessary embarrassment. This can easily be done at a court like Iringa where there are several Magistrates.

Lastly I will deal with the last ground of appeal which was also raised by Mwaikasu, J. in C his ruling, namely, whether the learned judge was correct in law and in fact in holding that the trial magistrate acted properly when he dismissed the suit as Order XVII Rule 3 of the Civil Procedure entitled him to do so.

This Order and Rule which has already been quoted but which for ease of reference I D will reproduce again provides as follows:

> Where any part to a suit to whom time has been granted fails to produce his evidence, or to perform any other act necessary to the progress of the suit, for which time has been allowed, E the court may, notwithstanding such default proceed to decide the suit forthwith.

As was indicated earlier in this judgement, the learned judge stated that the trial magistrate rightly dismissed the suit because this section allowed him to do so after the F plaintiff deliberately refused to lead evidence in proof of his case. But the wording of this rule is such that it cannot be applicable to the circumstances of the present case. This rule is meant to deal with a situation where a party for one reason or another has asked G the court on a previous occasion to give him more time or order to do or complete something in the case and fails to do this within the time given. In the present case the appellant had not asked for more time to do anything and failed to do so and was thus asking for more time. He was simply asking the court to transfer his case to another H magistrate and the reasons he gave were not flimsy. The learned judge was therefore in error in thinking that the Magistrate could dismiss the appellant's suit under this rule.

Perhaps I should mention a further point which is not necessary for the determination of this appeal but important for the future conduct of the case. At the time the trial started, I the pleadings do not appear to have been completed.

There are two defendants, yet only one of them had filed a written statement of defence A by 29th January when the trial opened. The second defendant had not, so I do not understand how the case could have proceeded in respect of him had the hearing taken off.

For all these reasons I am satisfied that the Resident Magistrate was wrong in dismissing B the appellant's suit. He should have stepped down from hearing the case after one of the parties has recused him.

Accordingly I would allow the appeal, set aside the orders of both the Resident C Magistrate's Court and the High Court with an order remitting the case to the court of the Resident Magistrate at Iringa for hearing de novo before another magistrate.

I would also award the appellant his costs both in this court and in the High Court.

As the other members of the court agree, it is so ordered. D

Appeal allowed.

[zJDz]Judgment

Mwalusanya, J.: The respondent Jayantilal G. Karia made an application at Nansio Primary Court in Ukerewe District, claiming the custody of an infant child, a boy called D Sunny aged more than one year. The child was born to the appellant Halima d/o Kahema with the respondent, out of wedlock. When the application was made both mother and father of the child were living separately in Ukerewe District. The child at the time of the application was under the custody of the appellant's parents at Mwanza. E

The application was not controverted at the trial, as the appellant mother readily admitted that she was not in a position to take care of the child who was then with her parents at Mwanza. The admission was in writing and duly signed by her. The trial court finding that the appellant mother had no objection to granting the custody of the F child to the respondent, unanimously granted the application. That was quite proper as the welfare of the child required that the child be in the hands of either of the parents rather than the child's grandparents.

The mother's appeal to the District Court was in my view rightly rejected. As correctly G pointed out by the District Court, as the mother was not in the position to take care of the child, it was not in the interest of the welfare of the young child to remain with his grandparents when his father was fit and able to maintain him.

In the memorandum of appeal, the appellant has argued that there are material changes H in the circumstances of this case, to enable this court to vary the original order made by the Primary Court. She said now she is ready to take the child and maintain him. She also said that she is employed and has acquired her own accommodation at her new station in Mwanza. I

The answer to that submission is that the appeal is misconceived. Under s. 133 of the Law of Marriage Act. No. 5 of 1971, if there are any A material changes in the circumstances of the parties, after a custody order has been made, the aggrieved party has to apply to the same original court so that it varies its earlier order. An appeal to a higher court will not do. The original court has to be B satisfied that indeed in the meantime, there has been material changes in the circumstances of the parties since the original order of custody was made, to warrant variation of the same.

The application could be in the same original case file; but one may choose to file a fresh application in the same court for variation of an original order. And perhaps a fresh C application in a different court of concurrent jurisdiction will be proper so long as the applicant satisfies the court that there are material changes warranting a variation of an order made by another court. But I am sure, an appellate court is not a proper forum for that prayer. D

In this case it appears highly probable that indeed there are some material changes in favour of the appellant mother. This is because she is now ready to take the child instead of dumping it at her parents. And moreover she has secured her own accommodation at her new station in Mwanza. And thirdly it has all along been E conceded since the trial commenced that she is gainfully employed in the government with a reasonable salary. And most important in favour of the mother is that the child is under seven years of age (infant he is only 1 year and three months old) there is a rebuttable presumption that it is for the good of an infant to be with his mother. The F younger the child, as is the position here, the harder it is to rebut the presumption. Let it be noted here that the question of legitimation of the child is irrelevant in the question of deciding the granting of the child. Therefore the Primary Court and the District Court were to go out of their way in considerating the matter of legitimation of the child. G

In the event this appeal fails and it is dismissed. As indicated earlier the appellant should go to the original court for an application for variation of its original order as provided under s. 133 of the law of Marriage Act No. 5 of 1971. This is not the proper forum for H that prayer. I make no order for costs for this appeal.

I Order accordingly.

Munyera J.: The appellant was the petitioner in the Primary Court. He petitioned against his wife, the respondent for divorce. He claimed that the respondent had left the matrimonial home since 1981 and sicne then she has not returned. The respondent G denied that she left the matrimonial home on her own, it was the appellant who had sent her home, that the source of all this trouble is because she is barren, she has not produced a single child since their marriage in 1975. The trial court granted a decree of divorce and blamed the respondent for staying away for such a long time. She appealed H to the District Court which reversed the judgement of the trial court and dismissed the appellant's petition as res judicata. In turn the appellant brought this appeal.

This case has a history. In 1981 the appellant filed a divorce petition, Civil Case No. 48/81 same Primary Court. He alleged that the respondent disappeared from home I since 7.4.81 and up to the time of filing the petition on 21.9.81 she had not returned. The respondent replied A she had left home with the appellant's permission to find treatment for her stomach ailments which have prevented her from conceiving a child. The trial court rejected her defence and granted divorce. She appealed to the District Court, Matr. Appeal No. B 7/82, and won. The Senior District Magistrate (Mushumbusi) ruled that the respondent had gone for treatment, reversed the judgement of the trial court and declared the parties as still husband and wife. The judgement was delivered on 29.5.82. The appellant remained mum till the month of November 1982 when he filed an application in C this court (PC Civil Application No. 29/82) to be allowed to appeal against the judgement of the District Court out of time. The application was dismissed on 17.5.84, so the judgment of the District Court held good, the parties continued to be husband and wife. On 16.12.85 the appellant went to the same primary court and filed this present D petition the grounds being the same as those he gave in the earlier petition and which the District Court had rejected. That is why the District Court declared the petition res judicata. In admitting this appeal the admitting judge posed a question "whether this petition was res judicata". E

So the issue is whether the present petition was res judicata. The law of marriage is silent whether a judgment of court dismissing a petition is a bar to any future petition by the same spouse. In my opinion such judgement may or may not be a bar, depending on circumstances. If for example, after dismissal of a petition, the spouse reconcile and F resume cohabitation, later one of them commits a matrimonial offence, the offended spouse can petition for divorce even if he/she is the same one whose petition was dismissed in earlier case. This is so because this later petition is a fresh matter altogether. In this particular case since the District Court dismissed the appellant doesn't G say why but the respondent says she is unwanted, she has tried her best by asking the CCM and elders to reconcile them but the husband always became uncooperative. The respondent deserves sympathy, she is barren not self induced but by the act of God, that is why the husband is no logner interested in her but in his bridewealth. I find the H grounds relied on this present petition are the same as those dismissed by the District Court in its Matr. Appeal No. 7/82 and the petition was rightly declared res judicata.

Even if the petition was not res judicata the appeal would still be dismissed. None of I the parties had called any witnesses in this petition and the trial court dealt with it in a summary manner.

The appellant's case never even approached the standard of proof required in civil A cases. No court worthy of the name would have accepted his story. I dismiss the appeal with costs.

B Appeal dismissed.

Omar and Makame, JJ.A. and Mfalila, Ag. J.A.: Appellant was charged in the H High Court at Bukoba under Economic and Organized Crimes Control Act for being in possession of property suspected of having been stolen. He was convicted and sentenced to 12 years imprisonment. He is now appealing against both conviction and sentence. I Appellant was a tenant in a house occupied by many people including P.W.2 a child of 8 years by the name of Waswa, her mother Belina P.W 3 A Yunus Waziri a militiaman and some bar maids. P.W.2 Waswa stated that on 12.5.85 he was at home about 10.am when he saw appellant come out of his room holding a black bag and putting it against the wall of his room. He then covered it with corrugated B iron sheet. Appellant then went away. Waswa then informed his mother Belina who told P.W.3 Yunus about the suspicious hand bag which was hidden by the appellant. Yunus went and told his ten cell leader Abdul s/o Mushobozi to inform the police. The police were immediately notified and they went to the scene and saw the handbag, they C opened it and found an Uzi gun with its magazine which had 19 rounds of ammunition. There was also in the bag a police uniform which consisted of a shirt, trousers, belt, hat and its crown and five torches. The room of the appellant was searched but nothing incriminating was found.

While the police and other people who witnessed the search were walking away to the D market the appellant was spotted and on seeing the crowd approaching him he took to his heels. He was chased and arrested. Appellant according to P.W.1 who arrested him said that appellant told him that he was running to the market to get his things he had E forgotten there, and as to whether he knew the handbag, he said to have told P.W.1 that one Marcel of Kamachumu whose whereabouts he did not know had entrusted him with the said handbag for custody and that he had put it outside his room and covered it with corrugated iron sheets.

P.W.1 denied taking a Phillips 4 band Radio Cassette, a tape recorder and turntable F from appellant's room during the search, so did P.W.3. He too denied that any of the appellant's things were taken away by the police from appellant's room. P.W.1 admitted on cross-examination that there was a make shift fence of old tin sheets outside G this particular house and anybody could steal the bag or could plant it there but according to Waswa it was appellant who Waswa saw putting the bag there and covering it with corrugated iron sheet.

The appellant in his defence stated that his job was that of repairing radios. On the H morning of 12.5.85 a customer one Marcel who had brought him a radio cassette to repair the previous day, appeared at his home with two companions. Marcel enquired if appellant had finished repairing his radio and appellant replied that it would be ready in three days time. Then they all dispersed he, appellant and his sister-in-law went to the I market, bought fish and gave her to take home to cook.

At 10.30 a.m. as he was returning home he saw a crowd and heard an alarm that was A the Fundi you were looking for. It was a big crowd so he ran away in fear of his life. He was chased and arrested and taken to the police station. He was also shown the four Philip Band Radio Cassette, the tape recorder and turntable and he admitted that all these items were his. He was then forced to put on the police uniform and was B photographed in it. Appellant further stated that the items found in his room and were denied by the police P.W.1, and P.W.3 the militiaman to have been taken to the police were actually admitted by P.w.2 and P.W.3 in their police statements to have been so taken. The police statements were on appellant's assertion that these items including the C five torches were taken out of his room by the police.

Appellant went further and elaborated on that aspect of his cross-examination of witnesses about the enmity existing between Belena the mother of P.W.2, Waswa, over D the allegation of theft by Belena against appellant's wife. P.W.3 admitted that there was such an allegation of theft which culminated in the arrest of appellant's wife as well as the friend and guest of P.W.3's wife. So we say the enmity between P.W.2 Waswa's mother and the appellant may well have existed. And the suggestion by the E appellant in his Memorandum of Appeal that Waswa could have been tutored by his mother to start the ball rolling about the black bag so to speak, and later to be taken up by the elder tenants living in the house, may have some force. Especially if it is remembered that Waswa was prevented by the court being cross-examined, it being F argued by the court that his evidence was given not on oath only in the case accused person giving their evidence not on oath can they now according to Criminal Procedure Act sec. 293(3) be cross-examined. The trial judge obviously erred here. The unsworn evidence of the boy Waswa could be cross-examined as well, as a matter of trite law. G

After all his evidence as a witness affects the fortunes of the accused person and so must be tested by cross-examination.

Appellant's plea as gathered from his evidence and his memorandum of appeal is as follows: H

(a) That he did not put the bag there

(b) Waswa was tutored to say what he did but he did not see the appellant putting the bag against the wall and hiding it. I

(c) Appellant was not allowed to cross-examine. Waswa on the various matters connected with enmity between her mother and appellant A which could have shown how appellant was framed and how Waswa was tutored.

1987 TLR p155

OMAR JJA AND MAKAME JJA AND MFALILA Ag JA

(d) The police took his radio taperecorder, turntable and torches and there is evidence to establish this fact and yet the police P.W.1 and the militiaman B P.W.3 his fellow tenant denied in court that these articles were ever removed from his room. In hiding this fact of the missing articles the police after discharging the appellant's colleagues who had been in custody for 1 year and 4 months for the same offence had to decide to go ahead with the C prosection of appellant.

(e) P.W.1 D/C Exavey admitted in cross-examination that "there is a makeshift fence of old tins sheets. Anybody could steal from it and anybody could have planted the bag there". D

(f) The opening of the bag and the search of appellant's room were all done in his absence.

(g) That the house is accessible to many outsiders who go in search of favours of bar maids living there or of appellant's services as a radio repairer. It is not E strictly a private house, it is more of a public place.

We cannot ignore the fact of the argument in these grounds urged by the appellant. We find ourselves therefore unable to accept the evidence of this child Waswa as an eye F witness to the hiding of the bag by the appellant containing those articles found. As Waswa is the sole eye witness, his testimony if it is doubted must destroy the prosecution case.

We find therefore the appeal has merit. We allow the appeal quash the conviction and G order that the appellant be released forthwith unless otherwise lawfully held.

Appeal allowed.

This case involved a dispute over a plot described as Plot No. 1 Block 38 Ngamiani D Area, Tanga Municipality. In the High Court the evidence of the land officers was that prior to 1975 the plot in dispute consisted of two plots. The first plot was occupied by the respondent and the second occupied by the appellant. In 1974 the whole of Ngamiani was resurveyed under the Tanga Master Plan re-organization scheme, purportedly done under the Town and Country Planning Ordinance whereby existing E plots were reorganized and amalgamated. In this exercise the two adjacent plots were amalgamated and became one plot. The trial court gave judgement to the appellant, but on appeal to the High Court the trial court's decision was reversed hence the present appeal. F

[zJDz]Judgment
Mfalila and Mapigano, Ag. J.A. and Omar, J.A.: The dispute over the plot B described as Plot No. 1 Block 38 Ngamiani area in Tanga Municipality, and which is the subject matter of these proceedings started way back in 1975. The parties referred their dispute to the judicial process in 1980 and has been raging ever since. Each party claimed to be the true and lawful owner or occupier of the plot. C
Both parties in our view in their respective evidence either gave an incorrect and even untrue account of the origin of the dispute or side stepped the issue altogether.
The appellant, the original plaintiff, told the trial court that she bought the house standing D on the plot from one Kanji and that at that time she did not know the plot boundaries. She therefore asked the Municipal Surveyors to survey and demarcate the plot. They did so and designated it plot No. 1 Block 38 and granted her a right of occupancy for 33 years. At this stage, she said, she had building plans prepared as she wanted to build E a hotel on the plot and started putting materials on the site. But, she could not proceed with her building plans because the respondent was occupying the plot and still refuses to vacate.

On her part the respondent, the original defendant told the trial court that she has been in F occupation of the plot for many years and that on 26.11.76 she was given a temporary Right of Occupancy over the plot. Later she was offered the choice of buying the house on the plot. She never took up the offer she said, but she asked the court to declare her the legal occupier of the plot.

Both these accounts in our view do not accurately describe the true history of the dispute G as each party tried to portray herself as the only true and original owner of the plot which is nowhere near the truth.

The true and correct position was described by the Land Officers who gave evidence on H both sides. These were the District Land Officer Tanga, Mr Salehe Mussa Msumi, the Regional Land Officer Mr. Francis Ramadhani and a Land Officer from the Ministry Headquarter Mr. Sadiki Mrisho Matuta. The sum total of their evidence was that prior to 1975 the plot in dispute consisted of two plots. The first was plot No. 1 Block 38 I which was occupied by the respondent. The second was plot No. 15 block 38 which was occupied by the appellant. Before 1963 both plots were freehold but after 1963 they A were held under short terms of Rights of Occupancy under the new Government Leases Act. In 1974 the whole of Ngamiani areas was re-surveyed under the Tanga Master Plan re-organization Scheme whereby existing plots were reorganized and amalgamated. In this exercise the two adjacent plots i.e Plot No. 1 and 15 of Block 38 were B amalgamated and became one plot known is Plot No. 1 Block 38. The two original plot ceased to exist. The new enlarged plot was offered to the appellant on the basis that she had developed her portion of the plot better by putting up a permanent structure C that the respondent who had a temporary grass thatched structure on her portion of the plot. Instead, the respondent was offered another adjacent re-surveyed plot in the area which she turned down insisting that she wanted plot No. 1 Block 38. This is the history of the plot as given by disinterested witnesses. It is therefore not true as each D party claimed that she owned the plot from the beginning and that the other was the tres passer.

The trial magistrate accepted the evidence of the witnesses from the Land Office and held that the appellant was currently the lawful owner of the plot in dispute by virtue of E its allocation to her after the amalgamation of the two plots. He however declined to treat the respondent as a trespasser in view of the fact that she still is holding a valid lease under a previous grant which had not been revoked following the amalgamation of the plots. Accordingly he entered judgment for the appellant, ordered the eviction of the F respondent from the portion she was occupying and perpetually restrained her from interfering in any manner with the appellant's peaceful possession and occupation of the plot in dispute.

Against this decision the respondent successfully appealed to the High Court. She argued that the grant to the appellant of the Right Occupancy over the disputed plot for G 33 years was unlawful null and void because her previous interest in the land having not been revoked, there was nothing the Land Officer could give to the appellant.

The learned judge agreed with this argument and allowed the appeal on two grounds. H The first was that the respondent's claim over the plot was first in point of time and therefore had priority over the appellant's claim which came later when she was granted the 33 year Right of Occupancy before the respondent's right had been revoked. The grant therefore to the appellant of the 33 years Right of Occupancy was unlawful, null I and void. Secondly he held that the Tanga Master Plan upon which the grant of 33 year Right of Occupancy to the A appellant was based, did not exist and even if existed, he was of the firm view that the formulation of a Master Plan or Scheme for any urban area, ipso facto put an end or extinguish existing proper rights of any occupier. Accordingly he allowed the appeal B and set aside the judgement and orders of the lower court. He further "directed that the respondent now be allowed to enjoy her right of occupancy under the frame work of the law of this country".

MFALILA Ag JA, MAPIGANO Ag JA AND OMAR JA

In this appeal the appellant challenged this decision and orders. In her Memorandum of C Appeal, she challenged the judge's finding that the respondent's title on the plot was first in point of time to hers thus giving it priority and his failure to declare her the development owner under the Land Acquisition Act No. 47/67. See section 36 and 40 of the Act. She even challenged the finding that there were two plots prior to 1974 one D of which was plot No. 15. This plot she said never existed and that it was quoted on the documents in error. We are satisfied in the light of the evidence given by the Land Officers at District, Regional and National levels that this last point has no merit. We accept and we shall proceed on the basis that originally Plot No.1 Block 38 was two E plots namely Plot No. 1 and plot No. 15 which belonged to the respondent and appellant respectively. Indeed in the circumstances of this case it is the only way this dispute could have risen.

As indicated, the learned judge allowed the appeal on two main grounds. Firstly, on the F priority of the two competing claims in terms of which of them was the first in time. He held that the respondent's claim had priority over the appellant's claim and that since at the time of the grant of the 33 Years Right of Occupancy to the appellant the respondent's title had not been revoked, the grant to the appellant was unlawful, null and G void. Secondly that the Tanga Master Plan the basis of the grant to the appellant did not exist and that even if it did, it did not have the effect of extinguishing existing property rights.

The learned judge (Chua, J.) who heard the application for leave to appeal to this court, H formulated the following points of law to be determined by this court:

(a) If the scheme did come into effect prior to the amalgamation of the plots, would the act of amalgamation be lawful? I

(b) Would the amalgamation automatically revoke the right of occupancy which had been granted to respondent? A

MFALILA Ag JA, MAPIGANO Ag JA AND OMAR JA

(c) What remedies would the respondent have.

We are not happy with this formulation because we cannot see how the amalgamation of the plots could have been undertaken before the scheme came into effect. We think in B the light of the judge's finding the main question revolves around the existence of the Master Plan and its validity.

In stating that the respondent's claim over plot No. 1 had priority over the appellant's claim, the learned judge must have been referring to the short term titles issued after the C area was declared a re-development area by the Minister vide G.N. 185/65 on 24.4.65. But we do not see how this short title over the old plot No. 1 has any bearing over the current dispute which relates to the new and enlarged plot No. 1 Block 38 and D which is the subject matter of the grant to the appellant of a 33 year right of occupancy. The validity of this grant cannot be impunged on the basis that it is later in time than the respondent's title, which referred to a different plot. The respondent can only succeed by successfully challenging the validity of the act of amalgamating her old E plot No. 1 with the appellant's old plot No. 15 into a single plot No. 1 Block 38 under Tanga Master Plan. All the Land Officers testified whether for the appellant or the respondent to the effect that the plot now in dispute i.e plot No. 1 Block 38 Ngamiani areas was created from the amalgamation of two adjacent plots in the course of F implementing the Tanga Master Plan - the two amalgamated plots Nos. 1 and 15 had been occupied on short term titles by the present disputants. The Land Officers told the trial court that the new enlarged plot so created had to be offered to one of the former owners of the two old plots. The plot was offered to the appellant because she had put G up a more permanent structure on her portion of the plot than the respondent who had a simple grass thatched hut. The soundness of this criterion was not challenged. But the point was taken both in the High Court and in this Court that this amalgamation and the subsequent grant of the amalgamated plot to the appellant was invalid because the H Master Plan upon which it was based either does not exist or if it does it is invalid for having been effected without complying with the relevant governing legislation i.e section 27 of the Town and Country Planning Ordinance Cap. 378. The basis for the view that the much talked about Tanga Master Plan did not exist is that nobody produced the I Master Plan itself or the Government Notice bringing it into effect. We are very surprised that the document or A plan which was talked about so much by all the officials including the Town Planning Officer should not have been obtained from the Office of the Municipal Director in Tanga and exhibited in court. Counsel who represents the appellant, fully aware of the B importance of this document to his client's case sat idly by all this time when he could have walked the few metres to the Municipal Hall to obtain the plan. However we tend to agree with the observation of Chua, J. that the existence of such a Master Plan is more likely than not in view of strong references to it by officers better placed to know C of its existence. Its non production is a result of incompetence and negligence. We would therefore accept the evidence of the witnesses to the effect that there was a Tanga Master Plan in the course of whose implementation plots No. 1 and 15 Block 38 were D pooled and a single enlarged plot No. 1 Block 38 created and granted to the appellant. The validity of this grant to the appellant depends on the validity of the Master Plan under which it was created and granted.

A Master Plan or detailed scheme such as the one envisaged here is conceived and prepared under the provisions of section 27 of the Town and Country Planning E Ordinance (Chapter 378). The section provides as follows:

27-(1) Where the Minister is satisfied that, by reason of the complexity of the boundaries of land within an area scheduled or likely to be scheduled in a general planning scheme F for detailed planning, the preparation and execution of a detailed scheme for the orderly layout and development of land is impractical unless provision is made for the redistribution of land in that area, he may by notice in the gazette declare that the G provisions of the third schedule shall apply to such land and, thereupon, such detailed scheme may make provisions for the redistribution of land in accordance with the provisions of the third schedule, and the provisions of the third schedule shall apply to H such land in the execution of the scheme.

(2) Any reference in this Ordinance to a detailed scheme to which the provisions of the third schedule are applied under section 27 shall be construed as reference to a detailed scheme in which provisions may be made for I the redistribution of land in accordance with the provision of the Third Schedule. A

The relevant provisions of the Third Schedule relating to redistribution of land in areas scheduled for detailed schemes to which section 27 applies provide as follows: B

(1) All land to which the provisions of section 27 and this schedule have been applied within an area scheduled or likely to be scheduled for a detailed scheme shall be pooled and the boundaries of all plots and holdings therein shall be expunged. C

(2) The detailed scheme shall provide for the equitable redistribution of plots or holdings in the land so pooled among the owner of plots or holdings pooled. D

The Third Schedule then provides for the pooling and redistribution of plots or holdings so pooled in areas effected by or subject to a detailed scheme. But before this is done as was done in this case, the provisions of section 27 must be complied with by the Minister, namely that he must by notice in the Gazette declare the application of the E provisions of the Third Schedule to the area in question and only then may such a detailed scheme make provision for the redistribution of land in accordance with the provisions of the Third Schedule. F

The question at this state is whether the provisions of section 27 were complied with before the provisions of the Third Schedule were applied to the Ngamiani area. While we were able to say from the evidence of the land Officials and Town Planning Officer that the Tanga Master Plan existed, there is no way by which we can be satisfied that the G provisions of Section 27 were complied with unless we see the relevant notice in the Government Gazette. We were referred to none, and none was shown to us. The only conclusion we could reach in the circumstances is that the provisions of section 27 were not complied with before the provisions of the Third Schedule were applied to Ngamiani H area. Consequently the pooling and redistribution of the plots in the area including plots No. 1 and 15 was unlawful and therefore invalid. The main reason for the mandatory requirement to publish a notice of the intention to apply the provisions of the Third Schedule to an area so as to afford the inhabitants of the area an opportunity to I lodge their objections. In the present case we can see the respondent putting up quite a spirited objection if there had been such a notice. She was not afforded such A a chance. The Tanga Master Plan was therefore drawn up and implemented in contravention of the Town and Country Planning Ordinance. Any actions purportedly taken under it were unlawful.

But we hasten to add by way of correcting the impression created by the learned judge B that a Master Plan or detailed scheme cannot come into effect unless it is published in the Gazette. Dealing with this aspects of the case he said:

> As aforesaid the coming into effect of a scheme or any planning scheme or even a mere C inception whereof is a master of law and must be published in the official gazette. This was not done. At any rate no relevant Government notices were quoted by P.W.1, P.W.2, P.W.3 and D.W.1 in this matter. As a matter of law it will therefore, be erroneous for anyone merely to D assume, no matter on whose word of mouth, that the said scheme did come into effect.

With respect, we think the learned judge mixed up the legal requirements. The E Ordinance does not provide anywhere that the coming into effect of a detailed scheme must be published in the Gazette. The legislation provides for two kinds of publication. The publication under section 27 of the Ordinance refers to the declaration by the Minister that he intends to apply the provisions of the Third Schedule to a particular F area. Secondly having done so and prepared a scheme in accordance with the Third Schedule, he must deposit a copy of such a scheme at a place thought appropriate and a notice of such deposit must then be published in the gazette. The purpose again is to enable members of the public and other affected authorities to know where the scheme G is and inspect it for the purpose of lodging objections if any. When all these steps have been taken and after the lapse of time given for lodging objections, the scheme is adopted and comes into effect. There is no requirement for publishing the fact in the gazette.

Before reverting to deal with the practical effects of our finding on the validity of the H Master Plan, we wish also to say briefly about the consequences of applying the provisions of the third schedule to an area. With regard to this the learned judge had this to say:

> Even if I were held to have erred on this point, I am of considered and firm view that the I formulation of a Master > Plan or scheme for any urban areas does not, ipso facto, put an end or extinguish existing A property rights of any occupier and I so hold.

We think this considered and firm view is contrary to the provisions of the Third Schedule itself in so far as the application of the provisions of that schedule to a B particular area is necessary before any Master Plan or scheme can be prepared. As noted earlier the provisions of section 1 of the Third Schedule provide for the pooling and redistribution of all plots and holdings in the course of which all boundaries between such plots and holdings are expunged. We fail to see how existing property rights can C remain unaffected a situation where all the existing boundaries are expunged and the plots resurveyed for redistribution. The schedule itself foresaw this and provided the manner of redistributing to owners of plots and holdings so affected. See section 3 to 7 of the Schedule. D

We shall now revert to determine the rights of the parties in the light of our findings. The learned judge was more fortunate in that he found himself able to make a general order that the respondent "now be allowed to enjoy her right of occupancy under the frame work of the law of this country". In view of the real situation currently obtaining on the E ground, we fail to see how the respondent can go about enjoying her right of occupancy even under the framework of the law of this country. There is no plot for her to enjoy. Rightly or wrongly her old plot as well as the appellant's plot are no more. The respondent's plot No. 1 is not there. The real situation on the ground is therefore such F that there is nothing that the court can give her. Her plot is no longer on the survey maps of this country. The survey maps of this country have a plot No. 1 Block 38 which for very good reasons was given to the appellant. Since this plot has no relationship to the plot to which the respondent thinks she is entitled, her interests are simply competitive G and in the view of those who redistributed the plots, the appellant had a better claim by reason of her superior development on the property. If the granting of this plot to the appellant was irregular it would not become regular by simply giving it to the respondent H who in any case has an inferior claim to it.

In the circumstances and in view of the real situation on the ground, the sensible and practical thing to do is to leave undisturbed the 33 year Right of Occupancy granted to the appellant who should now proceed without any hindrance to effect the developmen t I on the plot. The respondent should vacate the plot and take another plot in the vicinity which the Land Office, is directed to offer and grant her as the law A requires them to do in such circumstances. To this extent we allow the appeal.

With regard to costs, counsel on both side agreed that in the circumstances of this case each party should bear her own costs both here and in the courts below. We agree and B therefore make no orders for costs both here and in the court below.

C Appeal allowed.

Mroso, J.: This is an appeal against the judgement of the District Court of Mbeya. The appellant had obtained judgement in his favour from the Primary Court of Mabatini in Mbeya Municipality but the respondent successfully appealed to the District Court against that decision. The appellant has come to this court to ask that the decision of the D Primary Court be restored.

The appellant is the father of a girl called Sabeta who is now aged a little over eighteen years. This girl has a baby who was born almost a year ago (on 30/12/1986). Sabeta claims that the respondent who is now nearly twenty years of age is the father of her baby. At the time Sabeta was made pregnant - during the early months of 1986 - she E was in Form II at Mbeya Day

Secondary School. The respondent was in Form III at Sangu Secondary School. Because of the pregnancy Sabeta was discontinued from school. Her father - the appellant - filed a suit in the Primary Court claiming F compensation in the sum of Shs.20,000/= made up as follows:

School uniforms	Shs.	4,500.00
Fare to and from school		l7,200.00
School fees	G	840.00
Shoes		1,000.00
Exercise books		360.00
Soap		1,000.00
Pencils		100.00
Embarrassment	H	5,000.00
Total		20,000.00

The Primary Court found as a fact that it was the respondent who made the daughter of the appellant pregnant and therefore liable to pay the compensation as claimed. I

In reversing the decision of the Primary Court the first appellate court held that the claim was not adjudicable in the Primary Court because it A was under the law of tort and that Primary Courts have no jurisdiction to try tort cases. Secondly, that expenses incurred by a parent in educating his child cannot be sued for in court if the child's education is terminated as a result of a pregnancy. Thirdly, that in any B case a parent has no cause of action against a man who fornicates with his daughter, whether or not she is made pregnant.

The appellant has felt deeply aggrieved by the decision of the District Court. He argues with bitterness that if the law of tort does not recognise the right of a father to claim C damages against a man who fornicates with an unmarried daughter, Nyakyusa customary law recognizes such a claim as valid.

It is not quite clear to me what the District Court meant by saying that the appellant's claim was "under the law of tort" and that a primary court had no jurisdiction to entertain D it. We know that there are torts which come under customary law. Under Section 18 (I) (i) of the Magistrate's Courts Act, 1984 a Primary Court has jurisdiction in all proceedings of a civil nature where the law applicable is customary law. Indeed, under paragraph 190, Part IV, First Schedule of the Law of Persons, G.N. No. 279 of 1963 E (which was applied to Mbeya District by G. N. No. 436 of 1963) it is provided that a father is entitled to compensation of not less than shillings 100/= against a person who makes his daughter aged under twenty one years pregnant. If a parent has such F entitlement it means that he can sue such a person in a Primary Court.

In the case under discussion the appellant sued for, inter alia, what he termed "kunitia aibu", which would appear to come under paragraph 190 of the first schedule to the Law of Persons, cited above. Shillings 5,000/= was claimed under that item and the trial G Primary Court accepted and allowed it.

This court has on several occasions approved of the right of a father to sue for compensation in a situation similar to the present one. For example in the case of Mpapayu v Tusiliwa [1972] H.C.D. n. 229 Kwikima Ag. J as he then was said: H

The Declaration of Customary law allows fathers (to obtain) compensation from those who made their daughters pregnant.

The learned acting judge must have had in mind paragraph 190 of part IV of the First I Schedule to the Declaration of Customary Law, G.N. No. 279 of 1963.

MROSO J

As for the claim to recovery of expenses incurred by the appellant in educating his A daughter Sabeta up to the time her education was terminated by the pregnancy, I would agree with the first appellate court that the appellant cannot recover. The expenses were not wasted, Sabeta got her education for as long as she remained in school and that education did not vanish merely because she became pregnant. The pregnancy may B have denied her the benefit of possible further education, but that could not justify the claim of shillings 15,000/=. As Said, J. as he then was, said in the case of Halfani Saluum v Halfa Kondo [1967] H.C.D n. 181 in which a parent claimed damages for C the expenses she incurred in educating her daughter for six years:

The claim does not disclose a cause of action as presented because it is the duty of a parent to educate his child. The expenses incurred for that purpose cannot be claimed for the child's D education being cut by intervening circumstances.

The question now in this case for consideration is whether it was the respondent who made the appellant's daughter pregnant. The girl Sabeta named the respondent as the E culprit. The respondent denied it. But was that enough for him to escape liability? Under customary law it was not enough.

Paragraph 193 of the Law of Persons, GN. No. 279 of 1963 provides as follows: F

Mwanamume ambaye ametajwa na mwanamke (asiyeolewa) kwamba ndiye baba wa mtoto hana budi kumkubali kwamba yeye ndiye baba wa mtoto ila akiweza kuhakikisha kwamba hakuzini na yule mwanamke. G

This paragraph puts the burden on the man to prove that he did not have carnal knowledge with the woman. The respondent did not discharge that burden. As it turned out the trial court believed that it was the respondent who made Sabeta pregnant. On the evidence it was open for the court to reach such a finding and I am not about to H disturb it.

In view of my earlier decision that a parent can claim and obtain judgement for compensation against a person who makes his dependent daughter under the age of 21 years pregnant, the remaining question now is whether the claim for Shs.5,000/= can be I allowed. The trial court allowed it. The respondent did not and has not before me suggested that the amount was excessive. I for my part do not A consider it either excessive or unreasonable. I therefore uphold the decision of the primary court regarding the award of shs. 5,000/= as compensation. Therefore, the appeal succeeds to that extent.

The amount which had been claimed in the whole suit was shs. 20,000/=. I have B allowed only a quarter of it (shs. 5,000/=). Corresponding to that only a quarter of the appellant's costs are allowed in this court and in the two courts below.

C Order accordingly.

Mapigano and Mfalila, Ag. JJ.A. and Omar, J.A.: The dispute between the parties in this case is over a plot of land described as No. 75 Block L, Mhoro Street, Dar es Salaam, now held on a Right of Occupancy. On 23/4/87 the High Court at Dar es B Salaam (Bahati, J.) pronounced on the matter and held and decreed that the plot was the property of the plaintiff Rahma Ahmed Abdulkadri. The defendant Omari Yusufu has come to this Court on appeal.

To get an objective idea of this case one must recapitulate the past and I will, therefore, C start by stating the events of the last ten years in outline. In 1977 probate proceedings, Misc. Case No. 1 of 977, were instituted in the Primary Court at Kariakoo by one Mwajuma Yusufu against Omari Yusufu the present appellant. On one hand Mwajuma Yusufu was claiming that the plot in question was part of the estate of her D deceased father one Yusufu Selemani, and on the other Omari Yusufu was claiming that the property had been transferred to him by the deceased during the deceased's lifetime. The Primary court found for Omari Yusufu, but Mwajuma Yusufu was dissatisfied and she appealed against the decision to the District Court of Ilala. The appeal, Civil Appeal E No. 17 of 1977, was dismissed on 4/4/81 and Mwajuma took a second appeal to the High Court at Dar es Salaam. The appeal, (PC) Civil Appeal No. 20 of 1981, succeeded and the judgement of Kimicha, J. who heard the appeal is dated 13/9/81.

Next, and that was about three years later, Omari Yusufu brought an appeal to this F Court from the decision of Kimicha, J. It was Civil Appeal No. 27 of 1984. In the meantime, in February, 1982 to be exact Mwajuma and her sister Fatuma had, at the instance of the High Court, procured a right of occupancy over the plot from the Land Office. Not only that. The two sisters had thereafter, on 22/9/82, sold the right of G occupancy to one Rukia Mzee Alli who had in turn sold the same to Rahma the present respondent on 15/10/82. There is no question but that both the transfers had been approved by the Land Office on 8/10/82 and 28/10/82, respectively, and that they took place before Omari Yusufu lodged a caveat in the Land Office in respect of the H property. The validity or otherwise of these dispositions is the centre-piece of the instant case.

Omari's appeal was allowed by this Court on 55/6/85. The decision of Kimicha, J. was set aside as a nullity and the record was sent back to the High Court for it to hear I Mwajuma's appeal afresh. But Mwajuma never pursued the appeal in the High Court. Probably she thought that it was not worth her while in view of the dispositions that had taken A place.

The present case started on 13/11/85 and it is essentially a sequel or offshoot of the above litigation. After the delivery of the judgement of this Court in Civil Appeal No. 27 of 1984 Omari Yusufu apparently took certain legal steps to enforce the judgement of B the District Court. At his instance the court bailiff went to the house and stood on the plot and tried to evict the people who occupied it. He encountered stout resistance and the incident prompted Rahma to file a suit in the High Court. The principal relief claimed C in her plaint was a declaration that she was the sole holder of the Right of Occupancy over the plot. Omari contested the action, contending that there was a taint of fraud in the dispositions of the Right of Occupancy to Rukia Mzee Alli and to Rahma, and making reference to the other litigation.

Four issues were formulated and recorded by Bahati, J. viz: D

(1) Whether the two transfers of the property to Rukia and to Rahma are good in law.

(2) What is the effect of the judgement of the Court of Appeal in Civil Case No. 27 of 1984 nullifying the High Court judgement in (PC) Civil Appeal No. 20 E of 1981.

(3) Which of the parties is the legal owner of the suit premises.

(4) To what reliefs are the parties entitled.

Evidence was adduced by the appellant with a view to establishing that a notice of F appeal to this Court had been lodged by the appellant Omari and was lying in the High Court at the time of Rukia's purchase of the property from the two sisters Mwajuma and Fatuma. The probity of Mr Ismail, the advocate who drafted the deed by which Rukia G transferred the unexpired portion of the term of the right of occupancy to the respondent Rahma, was called into question. Considerable efforts were made to show that Mr Ismail was fully aware at that point in time that the property was still being litigated upon, and that he purposely prejudiced the interests of the appellant Omari who H happened to be his former client. An attempt was also made to show that Rukia, the first purchaser, and the respondent, the second purchaser, were close relations.

All those allegations were strenuously denied by the witnesses for the respondent, and the substance of the respondent's case was that both Rukia and the respondent were I bona fide purchasers for value. Mr Ismail was called as a witness and he related as to how and why and to what A extent he was retained by the parties. His account ran as follows:

Omari Yusuf once engaged his services, that was after Kimicha, J. had allowed Mwajuma's appeal in (PC) Civil Appeal No. 20 off 1981. Omari instructed him to B lodge an appeal against that decision on his behalf. He had to start by drawing an application for leave to appeal. He let one Mwajasho who was a pupil-advocate in his chambers to prepare the application and the requisite affidavit. On 7/5/82 he "blindly" swore to the statements set out in the affidavit and then had the application as well as a C notice of appeal presented to the High Court. He did not know the other party Mwajuma Yusufu. He did not pursue the application on account of a certain difference between him and Omari Yusufu. On or about 15/10/82 he drew the transfer deed. According to him he did not know then that there was any dispute over the property in D question. As pointed out above, subsequent to the delivery of the judgment of this Court in Civil Appeal No. 27 of 1984 Omari Yusufu tried to take possession of the property. The relatives of Rahma sought his assistance to resist Omari's action. He agreed and went to the plot and argued with the court bailiff and the police. Omari was E absent but he (Mr. Ismaili) recognized, upon perusal of the court warrant, that Omari whose name appeared in that warrant had once been his client. He nevertheless continued to carry out the instruction of his new client. He stated, in reply to a question, that he did not deem it improper to do so. F

As pointed out at the very start, the learned trial judge gave judgement in favour of the respondent. The judge dealt with all the four issues that had been framed. His answer to the first issue was in the affirmative. He found that by 22/9/82 when Mwajuma and Fatuma transferred the property to the first purchaser Rukia Mzee Alli there was neither G an appeal from the decision of Kimicha, J. in (PC) Civil Appeal No. 20 of 1981 dated 13/9/81 nor a notice of appeal in that respect. He held that in those circumstances the successful party in the High Court was free to dispose of the property as Mwajuma H did. The judge was not satisfied that there was any fraud in any of the two transfers.

On the effect of the judgment of this Court in Civil Appeal No. 27 of 1984 which nullified the judgement of Kimicha, J. in (PC) Civil Appeal No. 20 of 1981 Bahati,J. observed the obvious, to wit, that the judgment was given after the property had actually I been sold to third parties and changed hands twice. He stated that since these dispositions were not tainted by fraud the judgment of this could not affect A the interests of those third parties and that the only recourse the appellant could well-advisedly have is to claim damages from the two sisters Mwajuma and Fatuma. In the event the judge proceeded to answer the third issue in the affirmative and to grant the B respondent the reliefs she was praying for.

MAPIGANO Ag JA, MFALILA Ag JA AND OMAR JA

This appeal rests on four grounds but some of the grounds can conveniently and properly be dealt with together. We have had the same representations as those in the High Court: Mr Rutashobya for the appellant Omari and Mr El-Maamry for the respondent Rahma. And in substance the arguments put forward before this court are C the same as those urged before the learned trial judge.

The first point taken is that the judge erred in holding that by the time the property was transferred to Rukia Mzee Alli no notice of appeal had been presented by the appellant D in respect of the decision of Kimicha, J. in (PC) Civil Appeal No. 20 of 1981. There is merit in this ground and I understood Mr. El-Maamry to concede the point. The fact of the matter is that a notice was lodged in the High Court at Dar es Salaam by Mr Ismail in May, 1982, and it appears at page 22 of the record of this appeal. That was E when Mr. Ismail was advocating for the appellant. The transfer of the property to Rukia, as already shown, took place on 22/9/82. All the same, for reasons that I am going to state presently the lodging of the notice mattered for little.

The second point taken is that the judge "misdirected himself when interpreting the legal F effect of the decision of this Court in Civil Appeal No. 27 of 1984 and the application of section 43 of the Evidence Act. 1967". Mr Rutashobya has argued that the decision of this Court in effect revived the judgment of the District Court and that since Mwajuma did not prosecute her appeal in the High Court after the nullification of the decision of G Kimicha, J. the position at law was that the appellant became the holder of the Right of Occupancy by reasons of his success in the District Court. I can see the force of this submission but in my view it all depends on whether Rukia was an innocent purchaser. If she was, then in my view this case comes almost four square within the principle stated H in Mulla Code of Civil Procedure 12th edition at page 268, which was approved by this Court in Mboweto v Kulala and Another [1981] TLR 335, a decision that was cited to us by Mr. El-Maamry, namely that a bone fide purchaser who is a stranger to the decree does not lose his title to the property by the subsequent reversal or I modification of the decree; in such a case the judgment - debtor whose property is sold is entitled only to the sale - proceeds of the property. The judge A did not say anything about the provisions of section 43 of the Evidence Act, 1967 which relate to the relevancy, conclusiveness and effect of certain final judgments including judgments in probate jurisdiction. It was not necessary for him to do so. In my view there was no room for the application of that section in this case in-as-much as the B paramount issue was whether Rukia was an innocent purchaser. I would thus dismiss this ground.

This brings me to the other ground of appeal, namely that the judge erred in holding that the transfer of the property was good in law. This entails a consideration of the evidence C in regard to the charge of fraud which is the central question in this appeal.

We have been asked to note that Rukia sold the property shortly after she had purchased it and we have been asked to draw the interference that she was throughout aware that the property was still the subject-matter of litigation. On my part I regret I D cannot do so. I see no tangible evidence to justify such a finding. Indeed, Mr. Rutashobya has conceded before this Court as he did in the High Court that Rukia "might have been a victim of an intentional deceit perpetrated by Mwajuma and Fatuma".

We have also been asked to find that Rukia and Rahma were close relatives. Again I E regret I cannot see any cogent evidence that can lead me to reach that finding. In any event I cannot see how such a relationship would help the appellant's case, once it is conceded that Rukia was an innocent purchaser.

Mr. Rutashobya has contended that Rukia was obliged to carry out thorough F investigations into the vendor's title and suggested that Rukia should have approached the local Party leaders in that regard. The short answer is that since a registration system obtains in Dar es Salaam the extent of investigation of title by a purchaser is limited. There is no need to undertake a historical investigation into the origins of the vendor's G title beyond the inspection of the register at the Land Office, because the purchaser is justified at law in the assumption that what the register contains is true and is all that there is about the property. As the learned authors Meggary and Wade observe in their text-book "The Law of Real Property", that is one of the attraction of registration of H title.

The conduct of Mr Ismail was again the subject of heated arguments. Mr. Rutashobya has lashed at Mr. Ismail, describing him as "a party to the clandestine transfer of the property". Mr Rutashobya has invited this Court to endorse that description. Once I again I cannot. As we have already seen, Mr. Ismail took the witness-box in the High Court and explained his involvement in this matter. It was a plausible A account and the learned judge was entitled to accept it as he implicitly did. Even if it were true that Mr Ismail's conduct was flawed I do not see how a judge would proceed to impute Mr. Ismail's breach to Rahma. B

As shown, the appellant came to court seeking to impunge the transfers of the property alleging criminal conduct i.e. fraud on the parts of the vendors, the purchasers and Mr. Ismail. I think it is now established that when the question whether someone has committed a crime is raised in civil proceedings that allegation need be established on a C higher degree of probability than that which is required in ordinary civil cases, the logic and rationality of that rule being that the stigma that attaches to an affirmative finding of fraud justifies the imposition of a strict standard of proof, though as Rupert Cross cautions and illustrates in his text-book on Evidence at page 124 the application of that D rule is not always commodious. In my assessment and as demonstrated above, the evidence that was led against the purchasers and Mr. Ismail fell short of the required standard. I would accordingly dismiss the third ground.

The last ground is that the learned judge erred when he held that the property belongs to E the respondent. For the reasons I have stated with regard to the other grounds I would dismiss this ground as well.
In the final event I would dismiss this appeal with costs to the respondent. As the other Members of the Court agree it is so ordered.
F Appeal dismissed.

Full facts appear in the judgment. C
Held: (i) Being "authorised to drive a vehicle" and "driving in the course of one's employment" are not necessarily the same. A person may be authorised to drive, but use that authority for frolics of his own;

(ii) the element of a driver being in the course of his employment is the D foundation for his employer's liability and it must be specifically averred for the plaint to disclose a cause of action against the employer;

Order accordingly. F
[zJDz]Judgment
Kyando, J.: At the commencement of the hearing of this case Mr. Raithatha, learned counsel for the defendant, took several points of objection to the plaint presented by the plaintiff. The first point relates to the title of the plaintiff; at the head of the plaint the plaintiff is shown to be "HANS NAGORSEN (SUING AS G ATTORNEY) . . . . . PLAINTIFF" and in para 1 it is stated in part:

The plaintiff is an adult natural person, and duly appointed Attorney for Mr. Karl Wepfler currently not available in Tanzania, with power to represent the said Karl Wapfler in this suit. H

Mr Raithatha contended that from the above, it is clear that Hans Nagrosen is an agent and if that is the case he has no cause of action against the defendant for an agent cannot I have a cause of action of his own against a party. He contended that in this case only Karl
KYANDO J
Wapfler himself could have had a cause of action against the defendant. A
The second point Mr. Raithatha raised was that the power of attorney given to Hans Nagorsen by Karl Wapfler, a copy of which has been annexed to the plaint as Annexure "A", duly authorises Mr. Nargosen to "settle" the claim; it does not authorise him to file a B suit on Wapfler's behalf. He (Mr Raithatha) therefore contended that Mr. Nagorsen has no authority to file this suit against the defendant.
Thirdly, Mr Raithatha contended that the Plaint has been signed by Mr. Maira. It has C not been signed by the agent or by the plaintiff himself, Mr. Raithatha argued that this offends the provisions of O.VI r. 14 of the C.P.C. He contended that even Nagorsen could not have signed it because the power of attorney he holds only authorises him to settle the claims; it does not authorise him to sign the plaint. D
Fourthly, Mr. Raithatha contended that under the "reliefs" prayed for the plaintiff has prayed for interest before judgment at 32%. Mr. Raithatha argued that where interest before judgment is prayed there must be in the body of the Plaint a cause of action upon E which the interest is based. He contended that in the instant case the plaintiff states no reasons why he is seeking the exorbitant interest of 32%. He said that if this rate of interest is the commercial rate then the plaint should have averred existence of the custom of this kind of interest. F
Finally, Mr. Raithatha submitted that in para 4 of the plaint negligence is alleged against the driver of the defendant. He said the defendant is therefore being sued on the basis of vicarious liability. However, he contended, there is no averment in the plaint that the driver caused the accident while in the course of his employment. He submitted that G failure to plead this makes the plaint fail to disclose a cause of action against the defendant.
For all the above points Mr. Raithatha prayed that the plaint be rejected, with costs. He H said he was not praying that it be dismissed, but that it be rejected.

In reply Mr. Maira for the plaintiff submitted, first generally, that Mr. Raithatha's submissions have no merits whatsoever; he said they are an attempt at "hair splitting." He then argued that Mr. Nagorsen has authority to conduct the case on behalf of the plaintiff in terms of O.III C.P.C. He stated that he (Nargosen) has disclosed that he is I acting as an attorney and has disclosed his principal. He said he cannot then see how he can be barred from suing as an attorney. He said Annexure "A" to the plaint authorises him (Nagorsen) to pursue this A matter and it is quite in order for him to file this suit on behalf of Mr. Wapfler.
Concerning the signing of the plaint Mr. Maira referred also to O.VII r.14 CPC. and argued that the provisions in that rule do not exclude an advocate or agent from signing pleadings. B
As regards failure to aver that the accident was caused by the driver in the cause of his employment with the defendant, Mr. Maira contended that this point is hollow as the cause of action arises out of an accident caused by the motor vehicle belonging to the defendant, for the benefit of the defendant. He contended that this has not been denied C in the written Statement of Defence and that the only denial in the Written Statement of Defence is that the defendant was negligent. He submitted that whether the driver was in the course of his employment with the defendant at the time he caused the accident need not be averred in the plaint but will be a matter to be proved by evidence D during the trial. He contended further that there has been no plea made by the defendant that the driver was not acting in the course of his employment when he caused the accident. He submitted that the words "duly authorised to drive the defendant's Air E gas fuel tanker" (which caused the accident) in para 4 of the plaint constitute a plea that the driver was acting int he course of his employment.
Finally, Mr. Maira submitted that in the unlikely event of my accepting Mr. Raithatha's contentions or submissions, I should hold that all the defects in the plaint are curable. He F said such defects do not go to the merits of the case, they do not destroy the facts of the case. He said under Section 95 CPC. therefore I should dispense with the technical defects so that the ends of justice are met. He also submitted that under O.VII CPC, as amended, a defective Plaint cannot be rejected but it can be ordered to be amended. He prayed that the objections raised by Mr. Raithata be overruled and the case be G proceeded with to hearing.
I will start with the contention that the Plaint should have averred that the driver caused the accident while in the course of the defendant's employment. The relevant paragraph is paragraph 4 in the Plaint, wherein it is alleged: H

The Plaintiff's claim arises from an accident caused by the defendant and/or its agent duly authorised to drive the defendant's Air gas fuel tanker, who while at the Dar es Salaam I International Airport negligently and/or carelessly drove the said tanker and caused an accident that resulted into extensive damages of the said Cessna A Air Craft thus grounding it from the 15th day off June, 1986, up to 14th January, 1987 when it finally got repaired.

It is clear from the above that no plea that the driver caused the accident while in the B course of his employment with the defendant has been made. The words "duly authorised to drive the defendant's Air gas fuel tanker" do not necessarily convey the meaning that the driver was in the course of his employment as Mr. Maira contended, C for the driver could have had a general authority to drive the tanker but it cannot be concluded from that fact alone that he was driving in the course of his employment when he got involved in the accident. Being authorised to drive a vehicle and driving in the course of one's employment are not necessarily the same. A person may be authorised D to drive, but use that authority for frolics of his own. I rule that the plea that the driver was in the course of his employment has not been made in the plaint.

Was it necessary to make the averment in the plaint that the driver caused the accident E while in the course of his employment with the defendant? As indicated already, Mr. Raithatha says it was necessary and failure to aver renders the plaint fail to disclose a cause of action against the defendant. Mr. Maira says it was not necessary as this element could be disclosed by evidence during trial. Unfortunately neither counsel cited F any authority to support their respective arguments. In the case of Fakurudin Ebrahim v The Bank of Tanzania [1978] LRT (Parts III & IV), n. 45 which was for action involving vicarious liability for the negligent driving of an employee, the driver who caused the accident was not joined as a party. In the District Court the defendant successfully contended that the Plaint was bad for non-joinder. On appeal, after G discussing and reaching the conclusion that it was not necessary to join the driver as a party, the late Biron J., observed:

> In my view, all that is necessary to set out in a plaint is the averment which if not traversed H would entitle the plaintiff to judgment. And in a case of this nature all that is necessary to set out to, that vehicle caused the damage to the plaintiff's vehicle belonged to the defendant, that at the material time it was being driven by the defendant's servant or agent in the course of his I employment, and that the accident ..... was caused by the negligence of the driver (underlining supplied).

KYANDO J

From the above passage in the Judgment of the late Biron, J., it is clear that it is A necessary for the plaint to aver that the driver or agent was in the course of his employment when he drove the vehicle which caused damage. In my view the element of a driver being in the course of his employment is the foundation for his employer's liability and it must be specifically averred for the plaint to disclose a cause of action B against him, i.e. the employer. As indicated already, in this case this element was not averred and the plaint as rightly submitted by Mr. Raithatha, does not disclose a cause of action against the defendant.

I will next consider the submission about the title of the plaintiff. It is shown at the top of C the plaint that Nagorsen is suing as an attorney. The letter authorising him to so do is said to be annexure "A" of the plaint. It says:

Dear Sirs,
Re: CONFIRMATION OF AUTHORITY FOR MR. H. NAGORSEN G
Reference is made to your letter B8125/DSR of 20th February, 1987. I herewith confirm, that Mr. Hans Nagorsen, P.O. Box 9302 Dar es Salaam is acting on my behalf, and is authorised to settle the claim of the damaged air craft. H
Since I am travelling a lot, I request you, to address all further correspondence to Mr. Nagorsen.

KARL WIPFLER.
1987 TLR p181
KYANDO J
As indicated earlier on above, Mr. Raithatha submitted that by the above letter, Mr. A Nagorsen has been authorised only to "settle the claim", and not to act as an authorised agent in terms of the provisions of Order III r. 1 of the Civil Procedure Code.
O.III r.1 CPC. provides: B

(1)Any appearance, application or act in or to any court, required or authorised to be made or done by a party in any such court, may, except where otherwise expressly provided by any law C for the time being in force, be made or done by the party in person or by his recognised agent or by an advocate duly appointed to act on his behalf. (Emphasis supplied).

I would readily agree that authorisation to settle a claim is not the same as authorisation D to appear, apply or do any act in or to any court within the meaning of those words as used in O.III r.1 CPC. As I see it, Mr. Nagorsen was authorised to negotiate settlements out of court, of the claim. He certainly was not, by the above letter, authorised to institute a suit or suits. The institution of the present suit by him was done without authority or power therefore. E
Then there is the question of signing of the Plaint, O.VI r.14 CPC. provides:

14 Every pleading shall be signed by the party and his advocate (if any) provided that where a party pleading is, by reason of absence or for other good cause, unable to sign the pleading, it F may be signed by any person duly authorised by him to sign or to sue or defend his behalf. (Emphasis supplied).

The plaint in this matter has been signed by Mr. Maira, the plaintiff's advocate. He has G signed the verification also. While, in terms of the provisions of O.VI r.14 CPC. above, he could have signed with the plaintiff, he cannot certainly sign a plaint alone, on behalf of the plaintiff, as an advocate. His having signed the plaint in this case renders it (the plaint) therefore defective. H

Then there is the point whether an agent can have a cause of action against a party on behalf of his principal. O.VI r.14 CPC which I have reproduced above says a pleading, where a party is unable to sign it, may be signed by any person duly authorised by him to sign or to sue or defend on his behalf. The reference to suing in this rule shows that an I agent can be authorised to sue on behalf of his principal. Where there is such authority therefore there is no reason why he A should not institute a suit on behalf of his principal and it cannot be said by so suing he cannot have a cause of action against the defendant. However, in this case, as already held above, there is no power conferred upon Nagorsen to sue as such. So he filed the suit as agent without having been given power by his principal to do so and that was B wrong, and makes the plaint defective.

Finally concerning the interest of 32% sought in the plaint, clearly the plaintiff should show if such scale of interest is authorised by commercial custom or not. He has not C done so and this also renders the plaint defective.

The above are all the points raised by mr. Raithatha and I have found that they are all valid points. I uphold his objections to the plaint on the basis of these points. The question is what is the result then? Mr. Raithatha as already shown, submitted that I D reject the plaint, with costs. Mr. Maira, on the other hand, submitted that I merely direct that the plaint be amended and invoked Section 95 of Civil Procedure Code.

Concerning the objection on the ground that the plaint does not disclose a cause of action against the defendant because it does not aver that the driver was in the course of E his employment when he was involved in the accident the proviso to O.VII r.11(a) CPC., as amended, (or rejection of plaints) provides that if the court is satisfied that if the plaintiff is permitted to amend the plaint, the plaint will disclose a cause of action it (the court) may allow the plaintiff to amend the plaint subject to such condition as to F costs or otherwise as the court may deem fit to impose.

In the instant case, I am satisfied that if the averment that the driver was driving in the course of his employment is made in the plaint, it (the plaint) will disclose a cause of G action against the defendant. Accordingly, I will order that the plaintiff should amend the plaint to include the element I have just referred to above.

As regards the objections on the ground that Mr. Nagorsen as agent cannot have a cause of action against the defendant and that he had no power of attorney to sue but H only to settle, Mulla in Code of Civil Procedure, 13th Edition Vol.I, says at p.669:-

> ...It has been held that an objection that the institution of the suit is not within the authority conferred by the power of attorney should be taken at the earliest possible opportunity and I before issues are framed and that even when an objection is so taken and sustained, the court should not reject the plaint but given an opportunity to the A parties to rectify the defect. (Underlining supplied).

The above is the position under the Indian Code of Civil Procedure. As the provisions B to which the above passage relates are similar to those in our CPC. I am of the view that the same is the position in this country also. So I will not order a rejection of the plaint. Instead I will order the plaintiff to rectify the defects to which the objections I have mentioned above relate.

Concerning the question of signing and that of the rate of interest, those also are defects C which the plaintiff should rectify; I will not order that the plaint be rejected because of them either.

In the final result then, the plaint is to be amended so that the defects pointed out herein are rectified. The defendant is awarded costs for successfully raising his objections to the plaint. D

It is so ordered.

Chipeta, J.: The three appellants, namely, Yassin Maulidi Kipanta, Nasibu Hussein Bubu and Ali Haruna Kalonda were jointly charged before Tabora District Court with the offence of being in possession of instruments with intent to commit a felony c/s D 298(c) of the Penal Code. They were all convicted as charged and each of them was sentenced to two years imprisonment. Dissatisfied, they now appeal against their convictions and sentences.

The Prosecution's evidence was that during the night of 2nd March 1987, one Simon Birafumba (P.W.1), who is a watchman, was on duty at Mabama C.C.M. office. At or E about 8.00 p.m. that night, while standing at a corner of the building, P.W.1 saw three people whom he identified to be the three appellants in this appeal. P.W.1 observed that the first appellant had a panga and an iron bar, the second appellant had three F spears, while the third appellant had two spears. As the appellants approached the building, one of them asked, "Mlinzi yuko wapi". Thereupon, P.W.1 entered the office and saw the appellants touching the door and windows of the building, and so P.W.1 raised an alarm.

The alarm was answered by the ward secretary (P.W.2) who immediately proceeded to G the scene accompanied by a group of villagers among whom were militiamen.

On arrival at the office, which is only 50 paces from P.W.2's house, P.W.2 and his group saw the second appellant running away from the scene. The second appellant H was then chased and apprehended with his three spears. On being interrogated, the second appellant said that he had been with the first and third appellants.

The villagers then started looking for the two appellants. They later located the third appellant hiding under a tree near the C.C.M. office, and the first appellant was in a I house which is not his own. Both of them were found in possession of weapons as described by

CHIPETA J

P.W.1. They were then accordingly charged with this offence. A

In his defence, the first appellant said that on the day in question he was drunk and that he was arrested for no reason in his room at about 9.00 a.m. Similarly, the second appellant said that on the day in question he was very drunk and was arrested in his B room at about 8.00 p.m. for no reason. The third appellant said that he was arrested while on his way home for no reason, and that he too was drunk.

The learned trial senior district magistrate believed the prosecution witnesses as truthful, and after carefully considering the circumstances in which P.W.1 saw the appellants, the C learned magistrate was satisfied that P.W.1 had correctly identified the appellants. He accordingly convicted the appellants as charged.

It is now well settled that where the evidence against an accused person is solely that of identification such evidence must be absolutely watertight to justify a conviction. (see D R. v Eria Sebwato, [1960] E.A. 174); and where the evidence of identification is that of a single witness, there is need to test such evidence with the greatest care; what is needed is other evidence, direct or circumstantial, pointing to the accused's guilt from which a court can reasonably conclude that the evidence of identification, although based E on the testimony of a single witness, can safely be accepted as free from the possibility of error. (See Abdallah Bin Wendo v R. (1953) 20 E.A.C.A. 166). In the words of the Court of Appeal of Tanzania in the case of Waziri Amani v Republic [1980] TLR 250, at pages 251-252: F

... evidence of visual identification, as Courts of in East Africa and England have warned in a number of cases, is of the weakest kind and most unreliable. It follows, therefore that no court G should act on evidence of visual identification unless all possibilities of mistaken identity are eliminated and the court is fully satisfied that the evidence before it is absolutely watertight.

In the instant case, there was moonlight on the night in question; P.W.1 and the H appellants live in the same village; P.W.1 saw the appellants from a distance of only twelve paces; and the circumstances in which P.W.1 saw the culprits cannot be said to have been calculated to make identification difficult. Indeed none of the appellants I suggested any reason why any of the prosecution witnesses would wish to frame them.

CHIPETA J

The evidence of identification does not stand alone. It is supported by other evidence; A the second appellant was arrested while running away from the scene while the third appellant was arrested as he hid under a tree; and at the time of their arrest that same night, the appellants were found in possession of weapons described by P.W.1. Besides, the second appellant, who was the first to be arrested, named the first and third B appellants to have been with him.

On the basis of the foregoing, I respectfully agree with the learned state attorney that the appellants were properly and correctly identified.

The next question for consideration is whether these facts constitute the offence charged. C If a man goes armed to a place where he has no lawful business at an odd hour and, upon hearing an alarm, takes to his heels or goes into hiding and fails to give a reasonable explanation for his visit to the place, the reasonable and inescapable inference D must be that such person is in such place for the purpose of committing a felony.

In the present case, the circumstances in which the appellant were seen at the scene, the hour of the night, their conduct at the scene and the nature of their weapons all lead to an irresistible inference that they were there with the intent of committing a felony and that E their weapons were instruments of housebreaking.

For these reasons, I am of the view that the conviction were fully justified.

I now turn to the sentences. In sentencing the appellants, the learned magistrate took into consideration the fact that the offenses of breaking are very common in his District F and so he felt that the appellants deserved stiff sentences. With unfeigned respect, the prevalence of an offence is one of the factors to be taken into consideration in assessing sentences. But it is not the only consideration. It must be taken into consideration along G with other factors. In the words of the Court of Appeal of Tanzania in the case of Silvanus Leonard Nguruwe v Republic, [1981] TLR 66 at page 68:

Prevalence of an offence is indeed a factor which a trial court should always take into account H when assessing a proper sentence to impose in any particular case; but it would be contrary to principle to consider this fact either as the predominant or the only factor that must guide the court in its consideration of sentence. I

In the instant case, the appellants were first offenders and youths aged between 18 years A and 27 years; and considering their conduct, it seems to me that they acted more foolishly that criminally. The nature of the offence itself is aimed at preventing the omission of more serious crimes.

For these reasons, I am of the view that the sentences were manifestly excessive. A B sentence of nine months imprisonment in my opinion, would have met the justice of the case. Since the appellants have already served eight months of the sentences, the sentence of two years imprisonment imposed on each of them is hereby set aside and C substituted therefore is such sentence as will result in each of the appellant's immediate release from custody unless otherwise lawfully held.

On fine, save for the variation of the sentences, the appellant's appeal is otherwise dismissed. D

Appeal dismissed.

Case referred to:
Katuale & Anor. v R. [1971] HCD n.46
Boaz for respondent B
[zJDz]Judgment
Kyando, J.: This case was heard by two magistrates. A total of three witnesses testified for the prosecution. The first Magistrate who heard the case, B.M. Luanda, R.M., heard the evidence of two of these witnesses. Then G.M. Nkwera took over. On taking C over and before he continued with the hearing of the case he made the following note:

Ct! 8. 214 of Cr.P.A. complied with
Sgd. G.M. Nkwera, RM D
23.1.86.

S.214 of the CPA provides as follows:

214 - (1) Where any Magistrate, after having heard and recorded the whole or any part of the E evidence in any trial or conducted in whole or in part any committal proceedings is for any reason unable to complete the trial or committal proceedings within a reasonable time, another Magistrate who has and who exercises jurisdiction may take over and continue the F trial or committal proceedings as the case may be and the magistrate so taking over may act on the evidence or proceedings recorded by his predecessor and, may in the case of a trial re-summon the witnesses and recommence the trial or the committal or otherwise subject to subsection (2). G

(2) Whenever the provisions of subsection (1) apply -

(a) in any trial the accused may, when such other magistrate commences his proceedings, demand that the witnesses or any of them be re-summoned and reheard H and shall be informed of such right by the second magistrate when he commences his proceedings.

(b) the high Court may, whether there be an appeal or not, set aside any conviction passed I on evidence not wholly recorded by the Magistrate before the conviction was had, if it is of the opinion that the accused has been materially A prejudiced thereby and may order a new trial.

At the commencement of the hearing of the appellant's appeal in this case, Mr. Boaz, B learned State Attorney representing the Republic, made the following submissions to this Court:

(1) Although the Resident Magistrate says at page 8 of the typed proceedings that s.214 CPA was complied with, there is no record of the answer given by the accused. C

(2) The evidence given by the witnesses who had testified before the first Magistrate was very crucial to the case. It is my view that they should have been re-called to testify before the convicting Magistrate so that he could have the opportunity of seeing them D testify. I believe that the appellant was prejudiced by the failure of the Resident Magistrate to re-call these witnesses. I was wondering whether this court should not invoke the provisions of s. 214(2)(b) of the CPA in this case therefore. E

The learned State Attorney also submitted that because the appellant has served a considerable part of his term in jail I should consider not ordering a re-trial. F

He referred me to the case of Katuale & Anor. v R., [1971] HCD n. 46 in which Kisanga Ag. J. (as he then was) held, inter alia that the fact that an appellant has already been in custody for some time is a consideration to be taken into account in deciding whether or not to order re-trial, but this is not the only consideration. The G decision should depend on consideration of all the facts and circumstances of each particular case. In the instant case Mr. Boaz submitted that the appellant was convicted and sent to jail on 3.3.86. He has been in prison for over a year now. He suggested that this is a long enough period the appellant has served and a re-trial under the circumstances should not be ordered. H

With respects I agree with Mr. Boaz's submissions. I am of the view that after complying with S. 214 (2) (a) of the CPA, the learned Resident Magistrate who convicted the appellant should have recorded appellant's answer - whether he wished I the witnesses who had testified before the first Magistrate to be re-called or not. I think this follows naturally from the provisions of the law that require that the accused "shall be informed of such right by the second magistrate" as they are in A s. 214(2)(a) of the CPA. As the position is now, we do not know what he (the appellant) said after Resident Magistrate complied with S.214 of the CPA as he states in the proceedings.

I also agree that the appellant was materially prejudiced as PW1 and PW2 who did not B testify before the second Magistrate were the crucial witnesses for the prosecution. Finally, I agree with Mr. Boaz that an order for a retrial would be inappropriate in this case.

Accordingly I allow the appeal, quash the conviction of the appellant and set aside the C sentence imposed on him. I order that he be released from prison immediately unless he is being held there for another lawful cause.

D Appeal allowed.

Kazimoto, J.: On 27/12/86 the accused was brought before Tunduru District court D and according to the record the accused was not required to plead to the facts. The record does not show with what offence he was charged. However on 9/1/87 the accused was charged with assault causing actual bodily harm c/s 241 of the Penal Code. He pleaded guilty and upon admitting the facts he was convicted on his own plea and E sentenced to 18 months imprisonment. After his conviction and sentence the complainant died. The accused was then charged with murder of the complainant. The learned Senior District Magistrate has queried whether the conviction and sentence of the accused which he has entered against the accused can still stand in view of the fact that F the accused is now charged with murder. Section 137 of the Criminal Procedure Act 1985 provides:

A person who has once been tried by a Court of competent jurisdiction for an offence and G convicted or acquitted of such offence shall, while such conviction or acquittal has not been reversed or set aside, not be liable to be tried again on the same facts for the same offence.

and Section 138 of the Criminal Procedure Act 1985 also states as follows: H

A person convicted or acquitted of any offence may be afterwards tried for any other offence I with which he might have been charged on the former trial under subsection (1) of Section 134.

KAZIMOTO J

The learned State Attorney has argued that the provision of section 137 of the Criminal A Procedure Act 1985 applies only when the facts in the second charge are substantially the same as the facts in the former charge. He submits that as the accused was convicted of assault a plea of autrefois convict cannot be raised to a charge of murder as these are different offences, although they may have arisen out of the same facts. He B relied on the cases of R v Morris [1967] 10 Cox Criminal Cases P 480. R v Miles [1890] 24 QBD 423 and R v Thomas [1949] 2 ALL ER 662. He submits that the principles in these cases apply equally to section 137 of the Criminal Procedure Act 1985 and that the murder charge has nothing to do with the offence of assault causing C actual bodily harm.

In R v Thomas [1949]2 ALL ER 662 the accused inflicted serious wounds on his wife with a knife and for that offence he was charged and convicted of felonious wounding with intent to murder. At the time of his conviction his wife was still being hospitalised D but she died later from the wounds she received from the accused. The accused was subsquently charged with murder. the accused raised the plea of autrefois convict. Humphreys, J. after considering R v Morris (supra) and R v Miles (supra) held that:

Although, to prove murder, it was assential to prove the assault adjudicated on at the time of E the conviction of felonious wounding, that conviction could not be pleaded in bar to the indictment for murder because the offence of murder only arose when the appellant's wife died. F

The decision in R v Thomas (supra) was followed by the High Court of Kenya in R v Absolom s/o Mohanga and Wilson s/o Wasike [1957] EA 660. In this case the respondents were policemen. It was alleged that they took two women from the prison G cells and had carnal knowledge with them without their consent. They were charged with conduct to the prejudice of good order and discipline under s.41 (44) of the Police Force Ordinance 1948. The charge was heard in accordance with the orderly room procedure and they were convicted and sentenced. Later they were charged with rape H and they raised the pleas of autrefois convict. The trial court upheld the defence and on appeal by the Crown Rudd, Ag. C.J.:

The offence which was the subject of the orderly room charge was certainly based on the I same facts but it was not the offence of rape, for the plea in bar to be effectual, the previous conviction must be for the same, or at least, practically the same offence as that A subsequently charged.

These are great persuasive authorities and they have stated the principles upon which a plea of autrefois convict can be pleaded successfully. In the present case the facts B which gave rise to the conviction of assault would appear to be the same in the murder case but the offences are distinct and separate. Applying the principles in R v Morris, R v Miles, R v Thomas and R v Absolom s/o Mohanga and Wilson s/o Wasike (supra) I hold that the accused in this case cannot rely on the plea of autrefois convict to the C charge of murder. The conviction entered against the accused under section 241 of the Penal Code prior to the death of the complainant, and not withstanding the subsequent charge of murder is proper and still stands as valid in law.

D Order accordingly.

Chipeta, J.: The appellant in this appeal, Shiku s/o Salehe, was charged with and convicted of the offence of rape c/ss 130 and 131 of the Penal Code and was sentenced to five years imprisonment. He now appeals against both the conviction and sentence. E

The prosecution's evidence was that during the evening of 8th June, 1986 the complainant, one Hadija d/o Malale (P.W.1) who is aged 28 years, was at a pombe shop at Bukene where she and other people were drinking. Among those present at the pombe shop were the appellant and one Magunila. F

At about 11.00 p.m., P.W.1 left the pombe shop for her home. It was a moon-lit night and she was all alone.

When she was about 100 metres from the pombe shop on her way home two men, whom she identified to be the appellant and one Magunila, approached her and felled her to the ground. When she tried to raise an alarm, the appellant and his colleague G slapped her and threatened to kill her if she raised an alarm. The appellant's colleague then firmly held her legs wide apart while the appellant lay on her chest and had sexual intercourse with her until he ejaculated. Thereafter, the appellant in turn held her legs H wide apart as his colleague also had sexual intercourse with her until he too ejaculated. All this time she was calling them by their names and asking them why they were doing such things to her.

The matter did not end there. Having had sexual intercourse with her, they subjected her I to more physical violence: they twisted her neck so violently that she defecated on the spot several times and later became A unconscious.

Next morning she was picked up by a police officer who then took her to Bukene Hospital. When she came sound she immediately named the appellant and the said Magunila as having been the people who raped her. B

That very day, she was examined by a senior rural medical aid (P.W.2) who observed that she had bruises and a swollen neck, and she had semen in her private parts which indicated that she had had sexual intercourse a few hours earlier. C

The appellant and his colleague were later arrested on the strength of the descriptions and names given by her. The said Magunila, however, disappeared after being released on police bond. The appellant was accordingly charged alone.

In his defence on oath, the appellant said that on 8th June, 1986, he was away in his D village and denied having gone to the pombe shop on the material day. He conceded, however, that he and the complainant have known each other for a long time.

After a very careful examination of the evidence before him, the learned trial district magistrate was fully satisfied that P.W.I was a truthful witness, and after considering the E circumstances in which the incident occurred, he was equally satisfied that P.W.I correctly and positively identified the appellant and his colleague and so rejected the appellant's alibi as creating no reasonable doubt in his mind. He accordingly convicted the appellant as charged. F

It is now trite law that before basing a conviction solely on evidence of visual identification, such evidence must remove all possibilities of mistaken identity and the court must be fully satisfied that the evidence is watertight. (See R. v Eria Sebwato, [1960] E.A. 174). That principle has been re-iterated by the Court of Appeal of G Tanzania, in the case of Waziri Amani v

Republic, [1980] TLR 250. In that case the Court of Appeal has advised as follows, at pages 251 - 252:

Although no hard and fast rules can be laid down as to the manner a trial judge should H determine questions of identity, it seems clear to us that he could not be said to have properly resolved the issue unless there is shown on the record a careful and considered analysis of all the surrounding circumstances of the crime being tried. We would, for example, expect, to I find in the record questions such as the following posed and resolved by him: the time the witness had the accused under observation; the distance at A which he observed him; the conditions in which such observation occurred for instance, whether it was day or night-time whether there was good or poor light at the scene; and further whether the witness know or had seen the accused before or not. B

In the present case, the learned magistrate, and he is to be commended for it, carefully analysed and considered the evidence of identification. He noted that the identifying witness (P.W.I) knew the appellant and his colleague before the incident; that the C appellant himself admitted this fact; that the witness had been with the appellant at the pombe shop shortly before the incident and that it was a moon-lit night. Further, he noted that she saw the rapists very close to her as they each lay on her chest in the act of the sexual intercourse; that she saw them for a long time while they took turns in raping D her; and that she immediately gave a description of the attire of the appellant and also gave their names.

It was after that careful analysis and consideration of the evidence of identification and all the surrounding circumstances of the incident that the learned trial magistrate was E satisfied that the evidence of identification was free from any possibility of error.

On my own re-assessment of the evidence on record there can be no doubt that P.W.I was a very truthful witness. Her graphical description of the ugly incident could only be made by a person who was not only present but actually suffered the agony. F

From all the surrounding circumstances, the amount of light then at the scene, the distance at which she saw the culprits, the length of time she had them under observation coupled with the fact that she knew the culprits before the incident, I respectfully agree with the learned magistrate that evidence of identification in this case met the required test. G

It is also trite law that in sexual offenses in which the victim is an adult, a judge should warn himself (and the assessors if any) of the danger of acting on the uncorroborated testimony of the complainant, but having done so he may convict in the absence of H corroboration if he is satisfied that her evidence is truthful. If no such warning is given, then the conviction will normally be set aside unless the appellate court is satisfied that there has been no failure of justice. (See Ghila v R. [1967] E.A. 722).

That principle was recently reiterated by the Court of Appeal of Tanzania in the case of I Moses Kasisi & Charles Deo v Republic,

CHIPETA J

C.A.T. Criminal Appeal No. 105 of 1987 (unreported). In that case the Court stated: A

We agree that it is the rule that in any sexual offence, if the person against whom the offence is alleged to have been committed be an adult, the court should warn itself that it is not safe to B convict on the uncorroborated evidence of the complainant but that if it is satisfied of the truth of the complainant's evidence it may, after paying attention to the warning, nevertheless convict. We understand that the wisdom underlying this rule came from the 17th century C English jurist Sir Matl Hale, who wrote: "rape is an accusation easily to be made and hard to be proved, and harder to be defended by the party accused."

Having reiterated the rule, the Court stated that it may now be desirable to relook into D the whole question of corroboration as it relates to sexual offenses. If I may humbly add a voice to that of the Court of Appeal, the rule requiring corroboration in sexual offenses unduly protects rapists, and it is an indication of a veiled suspicion by the courts, which is E hard to justify, that women, generally well known for modesty and self-respect are apt to make false accusations in sexual matters. Would the requirement of truthfulness of an adult woman in such cases, as is the case in other cases, not suffice? F

So much for the digression. In the present case, the learned trial magistrate was aware of the rule requiring corroboration in such cases and cited the relevant authorities and, finding no corroboration in this case, duly warned himself of the danger of basing a conviction on the uncorroborated evidence of the complainant. After subjecting the G evidence to careful scrutiny as stated earlier, he was satisfied that it was safe to convict the appellant on the uncorroborated evidence of P.W.1.

On my own view of the evidence on record, I do not think that the warning the magistrate gave himself was merely for the purpose of abiding by the rule. I think he H took serious heed f the warning. I, therefore, respectfully agree with Mr Tendwa, learned senior state attorney who appeared for the Republic in this appeal, that the conviction of the appellant was well founded.,

I now turn to the sentence. In view of ugly facts in this case I am not persuaded that the I sentence of five years imprisonment was a day too long. The appellant and his colleague behaved like brutes. They not only raped the complainant viciously but also nearly killed her. The A sentence, therefore, will also remain undisturbed, and as the same requires confirmation by this court, it is hereby confirmed.

In the result, this appeal is hereby dismissed in its entirety.

B Appeal dismissed.

Court High Court of Tanzania - Mwanza
Judge Katiti J

August 14, 1986.
(PC) CRIMINAL APPEAL NO. 1 OF 1986
Flynote
Criminal Practice and Procedure - Assessors - Failure or omission to involve assessors when taking plea - Whether curable B defect.
Criminal Law - Pleas - Accused convicted on his own plea of guilty - On appeal accused alleges plea was entered by the magistrate against his wish - What appellate court to do.
-Headnote

In a Primary Court the accused was convicted, on his own plea of guilty, of robbery with violence. When taking the plea, C convicting and sentencing the accused the magistrate did not involve assessors. The first appellate court dismissed the appeal by applying the provisions of s.20(2)(a) of the Magistrate's Courts Act, 1984. On a further appeal to the High D Court the judge considered what an appellate court should do where the appellant alleges that the plea of guilty was planted.

Held: (i) Before an appellate court upholds a purported plea of guilty it has to satisfy itself that: E

(a) the charge drawn and signed by the trial magistrate is an offence known to law;

(b) it is an offence over which the court has jurisdiction;

(c) the offence charged is sufficiently identifiable from the facts as lodged by the complainant; F

(d) the plea was unequivocal;

(e) where applicable, the assessors played their statutory role;

(ii) the appellant did not plead guilty to an offence properly and accurately identifiable from the facts presented; G

(iii) failure or omission to involve assessors and have their opinions on the question of guilt or innocence of the accused violated the provisions of s.7(2) of the Magistrate's Courts Act 1984; and is an incurable defect.

A Katiti, J.: Before Ibwera Primary Court, stood Ismail Bushaija charged with the offence of robbery c/ss 285 and 286 of the Penal Code Cap. 16 of the Laws. Purportedly on a plea of guilty, the trial Court without involving the assessors found him guilty as charged, and hence the imposition of the statutory minimum sentence for the B offence - seven years imprisonment. The said Ismail Bushaija aggrieved unsuccessfully appealed to the District Court, that confirmed the conviction and dismissed the appeal. I shall hence and herein refer to him as the appellant, as he has now appealed to this Court.

C The first appellate Court did dismiss the appellant's appeal, purely on technical grounds, that were unfortunately not related to the spectrum of the case generally in the face of the appellants charge that he never pleaded guilty and that the plea was planted. The first appellate court found an apparently easy route to dismiss the appeal by applying the D provisions of section 20(2)(a) of the Magistrate's Court Act 1984, that stipulate that "no appeal shall be allowed in any case of an accused person convicted of his own plea of guilty except against sentence or order of the payment of compensation." While I concede we have such statutory provisions, I have to hastily add, that the said provisions are not E supposed to operate in a vacuum, they are meant to apply to a certain set of pertinent facts and circumstances. Thus where an appellate court is faced with an appeal, resultant from a plea of guilty, it should not dismiss the same mechanically simply because on the face of the record there was a plea of guilty. Such court is before upholding the F purpoted plea of guilty enjoined to first satisfy itself, first, that the charge drawn and signed by the trial Magistrate is an offence known to law, second, that it is an offence over which the Court has jurisdiction, third, that an offence charged is G an offence that is sufficiently identifiable from the facts has lodged by the complainant, fourth, that the accused's plea on the same was unequivocal and fifth, that, where applicable the assessors played their statutory role. All these questions can easily be answered through critical examination of every aspect of the case. For however well intentioned the plea of H guilty may be the conviction cannot be rendered valid, if the charged offence is not known to law, or where there is no jurisdiction, and where the plea is equivocal.

The appellant does contend in his memo of appeal, which he did not enter appearance to prosecute, that the trial I magistrate, did fake the plea of guilty, contending further that the vindication of this allegation, was that even the assessors were not involved in the

A finding of his guilt. The appellant is in summary saying that he never pleaded guilty at all. The Republic represented by Mr. Songoro a State Attorney, on the other hand declined to support conviction, saying that, the particulars, ambivalent as they were, did not even contain all the element of the offence of robbery with violence C/s 265 and 286 of the Penal Code Cap. 16. B

I have taken purposeful opportunity and liberty to examine the record in deserving depth, in the above direction and I have found therein features that procedurally, substantively and fundamentally go to the root of the legality of the C conviction, aspects that unfortunately escaped the corrective touch by the first appellate Court. Of course, apparently the trial magistrate does seem to have been more enthusiastic to reach conviction than rationally dealing with the case. I shall now and hence go into the above mentioned features.

D This criminal matter, arose out of the complaint by the complainant Martine s/o Bemanka before Ibwera Primary Court. It is common ground that a Primary Court has a dual carriage way for receipt of complaints in a criminal area, and that is first, Criminal proceedings may arise out of the initiative by the Police by presenting a written and signed charge to the said Court, the Primary Court Magistrate only having a peripheral duty of checking the propriety of sections and E related statutes etc. The second way, which is relevant and important in this case, is where a private complainant on his own initiative lodges a complaint of facts constituting an offence. What is a magistrate enjoined to do? The answer is this. F It is trite law now, that where a complainant lodges a complaint of facts constituting an offence, in respect of which a Primary Court has jurisdiction, the magistrate of that particular Primary Court, is unjoined to draw-up and sign a charge, with such particulars as are reasonably necessary, to identify the offence, or offences, including the law and section or G division under which the accused is charged, see Rule 20 of the Primary Court Criminal Procedure Code third schedule to Magistrate Courts Act 1984. In this case, the magistrate did try but our worry, which was not the worry of the first H appellate court, is the identity of the offence. Of course, the magistrate cannot dream of complaints, they have to be filed by the complainant. In this case to understand how the charged offence was arrived at one has to see the complaint of facts given by the complainant. He inter alia complained thus: I

KATITI J

A Mnamo tarehe 2/9/85 muda wa saa 6.00 mchana nilikwenda kwa Ismail Bushaija kumdai fedha zangu nilizomlimia. Hapo hapo, ndipo aliponipiga teke kwenye ubavu wa kushoto, na kunivuta nywele kichwani na kuninyofua. Ndipo watu wawili pamoja na mwanamke mmoja ambao walikuwa wakimkatia mbao wakanivamia, na kuanza kunipiga, fimbo mgongoni na mkono wa kulia. B Ndipo alipo waambia hao wenzake kwamba wanipige waniue, wanichimbie shimo wanifukie. Ndipo Ismail aliponinyanganya kofia moja, kiko, pamoja na shs. 150/= nilikuwa nimezifunga kwenye kitambaa ambazo zilikuwa kwenye koti langu, nililokuwa nimevaa akazitoa. C

It is from such complaint of facts, that the magistrate drew a charge of robbery c/s 285 and 286 of the Penal Code Cap. 16 of the Laws. Without entering into the area of credibility, which has no place here, the above complaint of facts, D considering the essential elements of the offence of robbery over which Primary Courts have jurisdiction, I do not think they were sufficiently established by the facts contained in the complaint above. While it could be argued that there was E violence, such violence's functional aspects in the process, is difficult to allocate a place, in the facts presented above. It is trite law - Jumanne Hassan Kaluwona v R. [1970] H.C.D. No. 36, to mention one of the many cases on this aspect, that violence or the threat thereof, must be applied either before the theft to facilitate such stealing and to obtain the property, or after the theft, to retain the thing stolen, or to prevent its recovery. In this case, there is difficulty in F determining the purpose of violence. Equally it is doubtful, the appellant who had the status of an employer, could steal his employees property. I would agree with Mr. Songoro, that the complaint as above lodged and charged, did not G satisfactorily establish that the offence charged was offence committed, and the plea thereto even if unequivocal, could not have the effect of putting the matter right, as it is not easy to say that the appellant was even aware, that he was actually pleading guilty to the serious offence of robbery with violence c/ss 285 and 286 of the Penal Code, if in actual fact he did. H

Further examination of the record, has revealed absence of compliance with the statutory provision section 7(2) of the Magistrates Courts Act 1984. These provision provide thus:

I 7(2) All matters in the Primary Court including a finding in any issue, the question of adjourning the hearing, an application

A for bail, a question of guilt or innocence of an accused person, the determination of sentence, the assessment of momentary award and all questions and issues whatsoever shall, in the event of difference between a magistrate and the assessors or any of them, be decided by Votes of the majority of the B magistrate and assessors present and in the event of an equality of Votes, the magistrate shall have the casting vote, in addition to his deliberative vote.

The above underlining has purposefully been made by myself. As aforementioned the record shows there was failure to C partly comply with the above provisions. It is to be observed with a naked eye, that the assessors were not involved in any sense on the question of guilt, or innocence of the appellant. But the assessors participation in this regard is statutorily mandatory, and does not lie within the available options, the trial magistrate is discretionally allowed to take. Thus failure D or omission to associate the assessors and have their opinions on the question of guilt or innocence as dictated by section 7(2) of the Magistrates Court Act 1984, is a defect that is not even tolerable nor curable, not even under the doctrine of substantial Justice. Thus apart from doubts whether the appellant pleaded guilty to an offence properly and E accurately identifiable from the facts presented. We have an incurable breach of statutory command, either of which severally and independently has to unseat the conviction.

F From the aforegoing, I find myself disposed to agree with the Republic, that the conviction is not supportable. I hereby allow the appeal, quash conviction and set aside the sentence. It is ordered that the appellant be set at liberty unless he otherwise has been legally held.

G Appeal allowed.

Stock Theft Ordinance - Order under section 15(6) of the Ordinance - Whether appealable. C -Headnote

The representatives of a village were charged with theft of cattle or sheltering cattle thieves in connection with an inquiry on cattle theft by the village. They were found guilty of sheltering cattle thieves and convicted accordingly. On appeal the D judge considered whether the order given by the magistrate under s. 15(6) of the stock Theft Ordinance, Cap. 422 is appellable.

Held: (i) According to s.15(6) of the Stock Theft Ordinance an order of a magistrate under this section is final and E therefore not appealable;

(ii) the magistrate's order may be challenged by way of certiorari or mandamus.

[zJDz]Judgment

Mwalusanya, J.: This was an 'inquiry' under s.15(1)(b)(iii) of the Stock Theft Ordinance Cap. 422 H made by the Serengeti District Court to determine as to whether the members of Machochwe village were sheltering cattle thieves or otherwise assisting some cattle thieves. Some 497 head of cattle had been stolen from Nyamburi village in the same District on 5/10/1985 and on following the trail the same disappeared at Machochwe village. At the end of I the day the trial magistrate held that indeed the members of Machochwe village were guilty of sheltering cattle thieves and

MWALUSANYA J

A so the seizure of cattle from that village to compensate the complainants from Nyamburi village was justified.

I have already pointed out my qualms in Criminal Appeal No. 107/86 over the manner the trial magistrate conducts these type of 'inquiries', and it leaves much to be desired. First of all the procedure of charging the representatives from the B offending village with the offence of cattle theft is wrong. When you conduct an inquiry you don't charge anybody. All you have to do is give enough opportunity to both sides to be heard. And what is worse is charging them under a non-existent offence. It is absurd and I say so because it is common knowledge that s. 268(1) of the Penal Code Cap. C 16 under which they were partially charged, has been repealed by Economic and Organised Crime Control Act No. 13 of 1984. It is hoped that the trial magistrate will in the future endeavour to appraise himself of the correct manner of holding 'inquiries' under the Stock Theft Ordinance. D

Now the pertinent question is as to whether in spite of all the misgivings I have just raised, the order or decision of the trial magistrate is appealable or not. It is my finding that the decision is not appealable, just as I so held in Stephen s/o Kiberenge and others v R: Crim. Appeal No. 107 of 1986 (unreported). My holding stems from s.15(6) of the Stock E Theft Ordinance Cap. 422 which provides:

> 'An Order of a magistrate under this section shall be final'.

That is interpreted to mean that an order of the magistrate is not appealable. F

However following the reasoning in the decision of the Court of Appeal in England in Re Ex-parte Gilmore: [1956] 1 G Q.B.574 and that of the High Court of Kenya in Re Marles' Application: [1958] E.A 153 which I adopt, the word 'final' only means 'without appeal' but it does not mean 'without recourse to Certiorari or Mandamus'. And so the order of the trial magistrate may only be challenged in the High Court by means of prerogative orders of certiorari or mandamus. H

In the event the appeal fails and it is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed. I

F Moshi, J.: Before the Urban Primary Court of Bukoba, the child of the appellant aged 13 years, Peter s/o Ponciani, was charged with, and convicted of, unlawfully wounding the child of the respondent aged 10 years, Haiba d/o Hussein, c/s 228(1) of the Penal Code. Peter Ponciani was placed on twelve month's probation, and ordered G to pay Haiba Hussein a compensation of shs. 400/=.
The respondent was dissatisfied with the amount of compensation awarded. He filed a suit in the Bukoba Resident Magistrate's court, based upon the urban court case, against the appellant for a compensation of shs. 20,000/=. It was H Civil Case No. 44 of 1983, and he was awarded a compensation of shs. 1,000/=. The appellant was aggrieved, and hence this appeal.
It is clear to me that the order by the Urban Primary Court that the appellant's child was to pay compensation was ultra I vires. Compensation in respect of convicted juveniles is governed by section 21 of the Children and Young Persons Ordinance, Cap. 13.
MOSHI J
A Such an order may in an appropriate case only be made against a parent or guardian of the child or young person. It cannot be made against the juvenile. Even if the order had been made against the appellant, a parent, the position, in my view, would not have changed. Such an order would have been invalid for the following reasons. Section 21(2) of Cap. 13 provides that a court may not order a parent to pay a fine or compensation or costs without giving the parent an B opportunity to be heard. The urban court did not give the appellant an opportunity to be heard notwithstanding that she could easily have been available. She did not appear before the urban court. She was not summoned to appear. In the C circumstances, no lawful compensation order could have been made against her. For the foregoing reasons, the order for compensation made by the urban court is hereby set aside.

Considering the appeal itself, it seems to me that it has merit. It was amply established before the urban court and in the court of resident magistrate that the respondent's child, Haiba d/o Hussein, sustained some injury at the hands of the child D of the appellant, Peter s/o Ponciani. But the circumstances, as disclosed in evidence, were in my view such that it was undesirable to order the appellant to pay any compensation. The parties are neighbours. The children were attending E school and, at the material time, they were coming from school together with other school children. There was no evidence or indication from the evidence that the appellant in any way conduced to the commission of the offence by neglecting to exercise due care of her offending child. The incident was a result of common trivial school children's playful F squabbles for which it is wrong, of itself, to hold parents or guardians responsible by way of payment of compensation. It is neither conducive to, nor shall it promote, good and amicable neighbourly relations. The injury itself was medically categorised as a mere "harm" (Exh.A), and the claim in the plaint about permanent disfigurement was, as rightly found by G the trial court, an exaggeration and clearly unsupported by evidence. On the evidence, and in the circumstances, there was no material upon which the lower court could have properly founded an order for compensation against the appellant. There was no evidence that the appellant was uncooperative with, or that she displayed a hostile attitude H towards, the respondent shortly after the incident. If anything, it was the reverse. I am satisfied that the order for compensation was wrongly made, and that it cannot be allowed to stand. I

A For the foregoing reasons, I allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the Bukoba Resident Magistrate's Court, and the orders for compensation by both courts below, and hereby direct a refund of the money in the event that the order has been executed. I make no order as to costs.

MWALUSANYA J

A 2. Matu s/o Gichumu v R. (1951) 18 E.A.C.A. 311

Mr. Mataba for the Republic

Mwalusanya, J. The appellant Magesa Andrea s/o Mjunja was charged and convicted under s. B 25(2) of the Pharmacy and Poison Ordinance Cap. 416 for being in unlawful possession of Part I poison. He was sentenced to three years imprisonment. He is now appealing against conviction and sentence. Apparently the learned C District Magistrate of Ukerewe District is not yet aware that the statute under which the appellant was charged has been repealed by the Pharmaceutical and Poisons Act. No. 9 of 1978. And so the immediate issue is whether the conviction under the repealed statute is curable. In a similar quandary in the case of Omari Said v R. [1972] H.C.D n. 183 Mfalila J. held that the irregularity was curable. In fact he was echoing the ruling of the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa in th D e case of Matu s/o Gichuma v R. (1951) 18 E.A.C.A. 311 where it was held that such irregularity is curable if the repealed section is re-enacted in identical words in the current statute such that it cannot be said that the accused has in E anyway been prejudiced by the irregularity. Following that respectable authority I find that the offence with which appellant was charged has been re-enacted in identical words under s. 37(1) of the new statute. In the circumstances the appellant could not have been prejudiced by the irregularity. In other words the irregularity is curable. F

The next important question to explore is whether chloroquine injection is in the list of Part I poisons. At the trial there was a report (Exh. P4) by one Dr. Led Nyerembe to the effect that chloroquine injection was Part I poison. In order to satisfy my curiosity I began to scan the Poisons List (Declaration) Order GN.22/1980 to see if in that long list there is a G name of chloroquine injection. I could not see chloroquine injection in the list. But I saw chloroquine (natural salts of chloroquine and chiniofon) in the list.

It is significant to note that the doctor was not called at the trial as a witness, perhaps if he had been called he would have clarified to us laymen whether chloroquine injection is the same thing as chloroquinate. Without that evidence I am not H prepared to so hold. It is also significant to note that under the repealed statute, chloroquinate was not in the list of Part I Poison. It does not appear that the new statute has declared the whole chloroquine to be Part I poison but that only I chloroquinate has been so declared and that

A should be proved in court to contain natural salts of chloroquine and chiniofon. But that has not been done in this case.

Under s.60 (1) of the Pharmaceutical and Poisons Act No.9 of 1978 a certificate by a Government Analyst that a certain substance is Part I Poison is final. However the doctor in this case Dr. Led Nyerembe is not a government analyst as it B does not appear in any government gazette that he has been so appointed by the Minister of Health. Therefore the medical report of an ordinary doctor is not final as to whether a substance is Part I poison although of course it is entitled to some respect.

C In the event I need not go into detail as to whether appellant was found with the chloroquine injection bottles or not. However I might observe in passing that evidence was overwhelming indeed that he was so found.

Consequently I am constrained to allow the appeal. I quash the conviction and set aside the sentence. The appellant D should be released forthwith unless held for any other offence.

Order accordingly. E

Mnzavas, J.K.: On 23/11/1983 Asia Salum, Hussein Said and Rashidi Saidi were jointly convicted of assault causing actual bodily harm c/s 241 of the Penal Code. E

Asia Salum and her son, Hussein Said, were each sentenced to 12 months imprisonment whereas her other son, Rashidi Saidi, who the trial Court found to be 16 years old was put under probation for a period of one year. F

Soon after accused's relatives complained to the Registrar of the High Court who brought the matter to the Notice of the Court.

Acting under section 327 of the Criminal Procedure Code this Court called for the record for the purpose of satisfying itself as to the correctness, legality or propriety of the finding and the sentences imposed. On inspection of the record the G Court minuted:

Admit for revision....

(i) The sentences imposed could appear to be rather severe for first offenders. H

(ii) 2nd accused is a school boy.

Let the D.P.P. be served with notice.

When the matter came up for hearing on 12/12/83 Mr. Shio, learned state attorney, argued in support of the convictions. As for the sentences of 12 months imposed on the first and second I

A accused the learned counsel was of the view that the first accused, Asia Salum, was properly sentenced to 12 months imprisonment. It was argued that the sentence of 12 months in respect of the first accused was not manifestly excessive bearing in mind that the offence of assault causing actual bodily harm carries a maximum penalty of 5 years imprisonment. B

As for the second accused, Hussein Saidi, the Republic argued that there was undisputed evidence that he was a school boy aged seventeen and in Form III. It was submitted that it was wrong for the trial court to sentence him to a term of imprisonment.

C The learned state attorney had no quarrel with the order by the trial court to place the third accused under probation for one year.

After hearing learned counsel's submission I set aside the sentence of 12 months imprisonment imposed on the second D accused, Husseini Saidi, and in substitution therefore I sentenced him to such term of imprisonment as would result in his immediate release from custody unless he was otherwise lawfully held; and reserved my reasons for such order. I now E give my reasons:

In so far as the convictions are concerned I agree with the Republic submission that there was ample evidence in support of the charge of assault causing actual bodily harm.

Coming to the sentence of 12 months imprisonment there was no dispute that the second accused is a school boy and, he is 17 years old; and he is also a first offender.

F In imposing sentence the court is required to take into consideration several factors; such as, the gravity of the offence the record of the accused, his age and the interests of society and those of the accused. That this is the principle to be followed is clear from the decision of this court in Republic v Kidato Abudlla [1973] L.R.T. 82.

G In the present case the second accused is, as already mentioned above, aged seventeen. He is a form III student and a first offender. As for the nature of the injury on the complainant, PF.3 (exhibit A) shows that he suffered a cut wound 1/2 H x1/4 x1/4" on his face and dislocation of the left shoulder. Taking all these factors into account the learned trial magistrate should have found that it would have served no useful purpose to sentence the second accused to a term of imprisonment. The imprisonment would only serve to bring the school boy into contact with hard core criminals and make him more of a criminal by the time he left the prison than when he entered it. That youthful offenders should not be I sentenced to terms

A of imprisonment is also evident from the decision of this court in R. v Teodosio s/o Alifa [1967] HCD 216.

On the facts of this case the second accused should have been bound over, or put under probation or even discharged, conditionally or absolutely u/s 38 of the Penal Code. It is for these reasons that I ordered the release of the second accused on 12/12/83. B

Coming to the first accused it is not in dispute that she is, but for this offence a first offender. It was no doubt most unbecoming for her and her children to assault their neighbour the way they did, and for that she deserved a deterrent sentence. But the question is whether the sentence of 12 months imprisonment was so manifestly excessive as to call for C interference by this Court. As I have already mentioned above the learned state attorney argued that the sentence was proper in the circumstances. May be the learned state attorney has a point; but it has also to be remembered that the 1st accused had an unblemished record; and, as it was held by this Court in Hattan v R. [1969] HCD 234 "Where a first D offender is concerned the emphasis should always be on the reformative aspect of punishment unless the offence is one of such a serious nature that an exemplary punishment is required or unless the offence is so widespread that severe punishment is needed as a shock deterrent". E

The Court also said: "It is generally agreed that first offenders should not as a rule be sent to prison where there is an opportunity to mix with and learn bad habits from more seasoned criminals." Had the learned trial magistrate taken into account the factors to be taken into account in sentencing before sentencing the accused to twelve months imprisonment F he would no doubt have found that despite 1st accused's recklessness and unsocial behaviour she, being a first offender, deserved some leniency.

Taking these factors into account it is the view of this Court that the sentence of 12 months imprisonment in the circumstances of this case was rather on the high side. G

I accordingly hereby reduce the sentence of 12 months imprisonment to one of 3 months imprisonment only.

Order accordingly H .

The record of proceedings was called by the High Court for inspection and revision. D

Held: (i) Where the accused fails to appear on an appointed date it is preferable not to forfeit the bond of the surety too quickly, it is best to adjourn and allow the surety time to find the accused if he thinks he can get him; E

[zJDz]Judgment

Mnzavas, J.K.: On 20/1/81 the convict Omari Kibwana stood surety for one, Ally Kisagase, H second accused in Kivukoni Criminal case no. 828/80, at shs. 60,000/= bail. He continued to produce the accused in court every time he was required to appear, but on 24/10/83 he failed to produce him before the court as required.

I He himself attended the court and on being asked by the presiding magistrate as to why Ally Kisagase, the second accused, was

A not in court he replied that the second accused was sick. There upon the learned Senior Resident Magistrate said:

"This accused has several times defaulted to attend--- Surety for second accused to forfeit his bail bond of shs. 60,000/= or six months imprisonment." B

The accused failed to pay shs. 60,000/= and was consequently sentenced to six months imprisonment.

Dissatisfied by the decision of the lower court Kibwana's relative has written to this Court complaining against the C imprisonment of Kibwana. On receipt of the letter the lower court's record was called for inspection and, the Court ordered that revision proceedings be opened. When the case came up for revision on 21/11/83 Mr. Chiza, learned state attorney, argued that it was wrong on the part of the trial Senior Resident Magistrate to send the accused to prison. It D was the learned counsel's submission that the surety should have been given an opportunity to produce the accused before deciding what punishment was to be imposed.

With respect I tend to agree with the argument by the Republic that in deciding to send the surety to prison for his failure E to produce the accused in Court the Senior Resident Magistrate acted rather hastily. The surety's argument for not producing the accused was that the accused was indisposed. It may have been (or may not have been) true that the accused was unable to attend the court because he was sick. We do not know for sure that the accused was sick but F prima facie the Court had the word of the surety that the accused was sick hence his inability to attend the Court. That being the position it would have been a more just decision if the learned trial magistrate had given the surety a day or two to produce the accused; this would have given the court time to investigate the surety's story. G

This Court had occasion to deal with a similar situation in Hudson s/o Salum v R. [1975] LRT No. 34 where Kisanga Judge (as he then was) said: (1) Where the accused fails to appear on an appointed date it is preferable not to forfeit the H bond of the surety too quickly, it is best to adjourn and allow the surety time to find the accused if he thinks he can get him.
In an earlier case Hamlyn, J. said inter alia in Koba s/o Joseph v R. [1968] HDC 96:
"--- It was most improper on the part of the lower court to have imprisoned the surety." I
1986 TLR p18
A In the present case the surety had told the court that the second accused was, by reason of illness, unable to attend the court. As there was no reason to make the court think that the surety was lying it was clearly wrong on the part of the learned Senior Resident Magistrate to sentence the surety to a term of imprisonment. Even where it is proved that a B surety was responsible for the non-attendance of an accused, the accepted practice is that the surety's bond is forfeited or his property is sold to realize the value of the bond.
The peremptory sentence of six months imprisonment was clearly uncalled for and cannot be allowed to stand. In C exercising my powers of revision under s. 329 of the Criminal Procedure Code I hereby set aside the sentence of six months and I accordingly order that he be released from custody forthwith unless he is otherwise lawfully held.

Case referred to:

1. R. v Wallace [1958] E.A. 582

Sisya, J.: The appellant, Hussein Kasimu, was charged with and convicted of two offences of D dangerous driving and causing death through dangerous driving. Both these are offences under the Road Traffic Act, 1973. He was sentenced by the learned Resident Magistrate, Tanga, to a substantive term of three years imprisonment. His driving licence was also cancelled for four years. Aggrieved, he has now appealed to the Court. E

In paragraph two of his judgment the learned Resident Magistrate made the following observation regarding the two counts that is to say, 'The particulars are similar since it is the act of dangerous driving that is said to have resulted into the F death of a motorcyclist...' There can be no doubt that the offence of causing death through dangerous driving which, incidentally, is charged in count two is major to the one charged in count one, i.e. the one of dangerous driving which is minor. Not only that. As quite correctly observed by the learned Resident Magistrate, the particulars of the first, or the G dangerous driving count are the same and/or are included in the offence charged in count two, i.e. that of causing death through dangerous driving. Since the two offences charged were founded on the same set of facts it is not immediately H clear to me why it was decided to charge the appellant with both the major and the minor offences. It is just like charging a man with robbery with violence in one count and with stealing or assault in another count.

As aforementioned the learned Resident Magistrate convicted the appellant. He did not end there. He then proceeded to I and, in fact, he did sentence the appellant on both counts. On count I he sent

A the appellant to jail for two years and on count two appellant was sentenced to three years imprisonment; sentences to run concurrently. In so doing the appellant was, in effect, punished twice for the same offence of dangerous driving.

Having charged the appellant with causing death through dangerous driving it became not only most undesirable but also B contrary to law to charge him, by way of another and/or separate count, of the lesser offence of dangerous driving. In this connection reference is hereby made to section 21 of the Penal Code which lays down that: C

A person shall not be punished twice, either under the provisions of this Code or under the provisions of any other law, for the same offence.

D Obviously, there would have been no need for me to say all this had the two counts been preferred in the alternative. The question that now arises is what is to be done about the illegality. I will defer this question and deal with it later in this judgment, if need be.

It is now fully established that in cases of dangerous driving the act or omission upon which the prosecution rely to prove E dangerous driving must be specified in the charge. The act and/or omission of dangerous driving alleged by the Prosecution in the present case and which is shown in the charge as laid is that the appellant, while driving a bus registration no. TZ 58576, failed to slow down at a road junction and further that he failed to 'take proper precaution to F prevent the occurrence of an accident'. This latter aspect of dangerous driving, that is the omission to take proper precaution to prevent the occurrence of an accident, is nebulous and it ought, therefore, to have been particularized. This was not done.

G Be it as it may, the case for the prosecution rested almost entirely on the oral testimony of a single witness who claimed to have witnessed the accident which involved a bus and a motor cyclist and in which the latter, sadly, lost his life. The substantive part of the evidence of the said eye witness, one Joseph Andrew Mang'enya (PW1) reads and I quote from the record of proceedings: H

'.... On 18/5/82 at about 9.00 a.m. I was at between 12th and 13th at a watch repairer. While there standing I faced east towards Tanga Cinema and saw a bus with "AMBIYANSE" writing. It was a leyland bus. While approaching towards bus I

A stand from Tanga Cinema direction it entered 13rd (Sic) road without stopping. A motor cyclist was then driving along 13th road. The two met and the motor cyclist hit the bus at the door to passengers. ....'

B After the accident the Traffic Police were informed. The Traffic Police officer who visited the scene after the accident, one P.C. Makoye (PW2), gave evidence at the trial. He stated that he saw brake marks and also what he described as 'crutch pulling marks after accident' at the scene. These were caused by the motor cycle. There were no brake or tyre marks which were caused by the bus. P.C. Makoye drew a sketch plan which was tendered and submitted in evidence C and marked P.1.

The bus was inspected by a motor vehicle inspector, one Corporal Idi (PW3). It was passed as mechanically sound and/or in order prior to the accident. The motor cycle could not be examined because it was extensively damaged. D

P.C. Makoye ((PW2) stated in his evidence that one of the persons whom he found at the scene was one Mwakasha. He was the person who claimed to have "stopped" the appellant. P.C. Makoye could not recall seeing Joseph Mang'enya at the scene.

The said Mwakasha was not called as a witness and consequently he did not give evidence in the case.

In his statement upon affirmation in his own defence at the trial the appellant stated that on the relevant day and at the material time he was driving from the direction of 18th Street towards the bus stand. He crossed the 17th, 16th, 15th and 14th Streets. Before he did so he stopped at each and every street because there were "stop" signs. There was, however, no 'stop' sign before the 13th Street. Nevertheless, he slowed down and he looked right and left. There was no traffic and, therefore, he drove on. Moving in the first gear. As he was crossing the 13th Street he heard "something on the left hand side" but he did not know what it was. People then rushed towards him while shouting, "You have killed! You have killed". He stopped the bus, stepped down and ran away because he was scared.

In his judgment the learned Resident Magistrate was satisfied that the motor cyclist, one Joseph Thomas Mramba, died as a result of the injuries which he sustained in the accident. This finding is sound as it is supported and justified by the evidence. The learned Resident Magistrate was also satisfied that the accident occurred at the junction of the 13th Street along which the appellant was driving the leyland bus. This too cannot be faulted.

In dealing with the appellant's story in his own defence at the trial the learned Resident Magistrate had this to say, and I quote from his judgment:

'The accused claims he did not see the deceased on the motor cycle. In other words the deceased came from the blues. PW1 Joseph David Mang'enya saw him along 13th Street. PW2 P.C. Makoye detected motor cycle tyre marks covering 38 feet. I do not think that the deceased had descended from heaven and dropped at the place of accident'.

He repeated this theme in his judgment when he, again, said:

'The accused gave evidence denying to have had prior notice of the deceased on the road along 13th street. The deceased did not descend from heaven like manna!

With respect, it seems the learned Resident Magistrate misunderstood the import of the appellant's evidence on this aspect of the matter, that is to say, when he, i.e. appellant, denied seeing the deceased prior to the accident. As a result of the said misunderstanding the learned Resident Magistrate completely missed the point which the appellant was trying to make.

If I may begin by somewhat digressing a little, it is not correct to say that P.C. Makoye saw motor cycle tyre marks covering a distance of 38 feet. What P.C. Makoye said he saw covering the said distance of 38 feet were actually motor cycle brake marks. Brake marks, it must be pointed out, are not the same thing as and/or are different from tyre marks. The former are caused by friction when the tyres rub against the surface of the road as a result of braking whereas the latter are simply an impression left by tyres as they roll along the surface of the road. P.C. Makoye did not see, at least he did not say that he saw, any tyre marks at all at the scene, be they of the motor cycle or of the bus. Indeed he could not have done so if the road at the scene is, as most of the roads in the municipality of Tanga are, tarmac.

Secondly and, perhaps, more importantly I think it is clear upon a proper construction and interpretation of what the appellant said regarding the deceased's presence or non presence along the 13th Street that all he meant was that he did I not see the deceased ahead or in front of him prior to the accident. This, in fact, is borne

SISYA J

A out by the very way the accident occurred. It was not, so to speak, a head on collision nor was it the front part, or a portion thereof, of the bus which came into contact with the motor cyclist. The evidence, on the prosecution's own side, is that it was the motor cyclist who knocked the bus, and this was on the side near the passengers' door. It cannot be denied, in fact it must be conceded that, positionwise, the passengers' door of a bus is behind the driver's seat. The B question that now arises is, how can a man see what goes on behind his back? The answer is obviously that he cannot. My understanding of the law is that it is a primary duty of drivers on a road to keep a reasonable lookout for obstructions or traffic ahead in time to avoid a collision. C

The learned Resident Magistrate dealt with the duty of drivers on the road. On this aspect of the matter he directed himself in the following terms:

D 'Even assuming that the accused was on a major road and the deceased on a minor road the accused was duty bound to consider that there might be other road users. Instead he crossed the 13th street as if the two roads were exclusively for his own use. He faulted in his duty to take care. His driving was dangerous and I so find.' E

With great respect, this was a serious misdirection. The duty which the law imposes on drivers is the duty to keep a reasonable look-out, and not to have to anticipate unreasonable or dangerous behaviour on the part of other drivers or F road user, see R.v Wallace [1958] E.A. 582 at page 585. In the instant matter there is uncontroverted evidence of the appellant that when he got to the junction of the 13th Street and Lipia Street he slowed down and crossed when he noticed that there was no traffic ahead of him. G

The status of the two streets, that is 13th Street and Lipia Street was not determined. When questioned by the trial Court on this point P.C. Makoye is recorded to have said, and I quote from the record of proceedings:

'XXD BY COURT: There is no sign on either road to indicate which is minor and which is the major road'. H

In such circumstances it was open to the trial Court, as it also now is open to this Court, to find, which I do that the two I streets under query are of equal status. That being the case the position at

A law is that any person driving, pulling or propelling any vehicle or riding any cycle or driving any animal on either of these two roads shall give the right of way to traffic approaching along the road from the right, see s.13 of the Tanga Town Council (Traffic) By-Laws 1956. The evidence which was adduced in the case shows that it was the appellant who had the right of way. Since vehicles must move on the road it was not incumbent upon the appellant to stop at the B junction, of course, so long as there was no traffic, of which indeed there was none at the material time, ahead or in front of him.

C On the mode of driving which the appellant adopted at the time of the accident the learned Resident Magistrate had this to say and, again, I quote from his judgment:

'PW1 Joseph Mang'enya, an eye witness did not see the accused stop before he crossed the 13th Street. In his opinion the D accused was speeding. The witness laid no basis for that opinion. However, apart from his testimony there was indelible evidence on the road indicating a distance of 66 feet the bus covered after the accident' (The underscoring is mine).

E With the greatest respect this passage bristles with misdirections. First and foremost it is the mode of driving before or at the time of the accident which counts and/or matters; not after the accident. This is because anything can happen after an impact, for example, the driver may lose control. By dwelling, primarily, on what happened to the bus after the F accident in coming to the conclusion that the appellant was driving at speed the learned Resident Magistrate, therefore, erred in law.

G Secondly, it is not correct to say that PW1 Joseph Mang'enya, expressed any opinion on the speed at which the appellant drove the bus. I have gone through the evidence of PW1 several times but nowhere did he express such opinion on the speed of the bus, or even of the motor cycle for that matter. All PW1 said which has some bearing on the mode of H driving which was adopted by the appellant before or at the time of the accident was that the appellant did not stop before he crossed the 13th Street. I have already pointed out that since the appellant had the right of way and in the absence of any obstruction or traffic ahead there was no need for him to stop at the intersection of the 13th and Lipia Streets.

I In fairness to the learned Resident Magistrate there was a witness who made reference to the speed at which the appellant drove

A the bus. This was P.C. Makoye (PW2) who said, on this aspect of the matter:

'The bus driver had not stopped because there are no brake or tyre marks. He stopped at a long distance and this tells of high Speed'. B

To say the least this piece of evidence is highly speculative and, even more the reasoning displayed by Makoye is based on wrong premise. In the acknowledged absence of brake and/or tyre marks is it not possible, it may be asked, that the C appellant could have covered the distance of 66 feet, or even more for that matter, while driving at 15 kilometers per hour or even less? If the answer is in the affirmative - Which, in all the circumstances of the case it could jolly well be - then can that speed be described as high? No. Surely not. D

The learned Resident Magistrate ended his consideration of the issue of speed by saying:

'I will therefore be excused if in the circumstances I am permitted to hold that the accused speed was high'. E

With respect, the learned Resident Magistrate can neither be excused for nor permitted to so hold. This is because there is not even a grain of admissible and credible evidence or any other material from which it can legitimately be concluded F that the speed at which the bus was being driven by the appellant at the time of the accident was high.

It is conceded that speed, per se, is an element of danger. Its proof, however, is a matter of evidence of which there is G none in the instant case. No wonder the Prosecution themselves did not include speed in the charge as an act or one of the act and/or omissions which they would rely upon to prove dangerous driving.
On my evaluation of the evidence and, as afore intimated, in so far as the appellant had the right of way and there was no traffic ahead and in the absence of evidence of a departure from the standard of driving expected of a reasonably prudent H driver the mode of driving adopted by the appellant before and/or at the time of the accident cannot be faulted. This appeal, therefore, has merit and it is hereby allowed. The conviction is quashed and the sentence and order of disqualification imposed thereon and made as a result thereof are accordingly set aside. I

D Administration of Estates - Jurisdiction - Powers of Primary Courts in administration of estates matters - S.15(1)(c) of the Magistrates Courts Act, 1963.
-Headnote
A primary court heard matters relating to grant of administration of estates and proceeded to distribute the property of E the deceased. Among the properties concerned was a partnership property. On appeal the High Court stated the law concerning administration matters before Primary Courts.
F Held: (i) A Primary Court may hear matters relating to grant of administration of estates where it has jurisdiction, i.e., where the law applicable is customary law or Islamic law;
(ii) a Primary Court ought not to distribute the estate of the deceased; that is the job of an administrator appointed by court;

[zJDz]Judgment

D.N. Kapoor, Ag. J.: Appellant had instituted Administration proceedings in respect of the estate of late Issa s/o Kusaga being 'Shauri la Mirathi Na. 37/1981' in the Primary Court of Dochi. I

KAPOOR Ag J

A The estate of the deceased included Motor Vehicles, Bank Account, Houses and partnership property. The partnership was known as Kusaga Brothers. This partnership was registered with the Registrar of Business Names under No. 16551 dated 1st March 1962. The total value of the estate exceeded shs.100,000/=

B Time and again I have come across appeals originating from Primary Courts in Administration matters where the Primary Court Magistrates have exceeded their jurisdiction. This is one such matter where the Primary Court acted without jurisdiction. Even the District Magistrate failed to rectify the error.

C In the instant case the Primary Court received evidence in respect of the deceased's estate, including partnership property and proceeded to distribute the entire estate in its judgment.

I consider this is a proper case where I would endeavor to state the law concerning Administration matters before the Primary Courts. D

Powers of the Primary Court are derived through the provisions of Section 15 (1)(c) of the Magistrates Courts Act No.55 of 1963:

E "Section 15(1)(c) The practice and procedure of Primary Courts shall be regulated and, subject to the provisions any law applicable for the time being in force, their powers limited -

(c) in the exercise of their jurisdiction in the administration of estates, by the provisions of the Fifth Schedule to This Act," F

The Fifth Schedule to the Magistrate's Court Act is reproduced hereinbelow, in part -

THE FIFTH SCHEDULE G

PART I

"Powers of Primary Courts in Administration case.

H 1 (1) The jurisdiction of a Primary Court in Administration of deceased 'estates, where the law applicable to the administration or distribution of, or the succession to, the Estate is customary law or Islamic law, may be Exercised in case where the deceased at the time of his death, had a fixed place of abode within the local limits of the Court's jurisdiction: I

A Provided that nothing in this paragraph shall derogate from the jurisdiction of a Primary Court in any proceedings transferred to such court under Part V of this Act.

2. A primary court shall not appoint an administrator of a deceased's estate - B

(a) in respect of an Estate to which the provisions of the Probate and Administration 1961 are applied or of which a grant of administration has been made under that ordinance, or of which the administration is undertaken by the Administrator - C General's Ordinance;

(b) Where the gross value of the estate does not exceed Shs.1,000/=, unless the court is of the opinion that such an appointment is necessaryto protect the creditors or beneficiaries. D

3. A primary Court upon which jurisdiction in the administration of deceased's estates has been conferred may -

E (a) Either of its own motion or on application by any person interested in the administration of estate, appoint one or more persons interested in the estate of the deceased to be the administrator or administrators thereof, and in selecting any such administrator, shall unless for any reason it considers it inexpedient so to do, have regard to any wishes which may F have been expressed by the deceased;

(b) Either of its own motion or on application by any person interested in the administration of the estate, where it considers G that it is desirable so to do for the protection of the estate and the proper administration thereof, appoint an officer of the court or some reputable and impartial person able and willing to administer the estate to be administrator either together with or in lieu of an administrator appointed under sub-paragraph (a), H

(c) revoke any appointment of an administrator for good and sufficient cause and require the surrender of any document evidencing his appointment; I

KAPOOR Ag J

A (d) Make orders as to the administration of the estate, and, in particular but without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing, as to the law to be applied in the distribution of the estate and as to advertising or creditors;

B (e) require an administrator to sign an undertaking to administer the estate faithfully;

(f) require an administrator to give security for the due administration of the estate; C

(g) make orders as to the payment of share in the estate of any minor or other person under a disability to relative or other suitable person for the maintenance or otherwise for the use of such minor or person under a disability, or with the consent of the Public Trustee, to the Public Trustee; D

(h) make any order which it has power to make under this Act in cases of a civil nature.

E The Primary Courts (Administration of States) Rules were published under Government Notice No. 49 of 1971. These Rules prescribe the entire procedure to be followed by the Primary Courts in Administration of Estates. Rule 8 of the Rules G.N.49 of 1971 stipulates the matters that the primary court may hear and decide.

The effect of the above quoted provisions touching and affecting Administration of Estates in Primary Courts can be F summed up as follows:

1. A primary court has jurisdiction to hear an Administration Estate's matter PROVIDED the law applicable to the G administration or distribution or the succession to the estate of the deceased is 'CUSTOMARY LAW or ISLAMIC LAW'

2. After hearing the application, the Primary Court may grant Administration to one or more persons or to an officer of the Court. H

3. The Primary Court may hear and decide matters relating to:

(a) Whether deceased died testate or intestate and all matters relating to the will of the deceased.

(b) ascertain all property belonging to the estate and all persons who are entitled under the will or upon intestacy. I

KAPOOR Ag J

A (c) ascertain debts if any and consider questions relating to sale or otherwise dispose of the property of the deceased for paying debts, if any and distribution of the estate to heirs and beneficiaries.

B In my opinion a Primary Court may hear matters relating to grant of Administration of estates where it has jurisdiction (i.e. where the law applicable is customary law or Islamic Law). After hearing the application for grant of Administration the Primary Court ought to decide all matters relating to and affecting the grant and after such decision the court ought to C grant Administration to the applicant or make an order refusing grant. It would follow therefore that a Primary Court ought not to distribute the estate of the deceased. That is the job of an Administrator appointed by court.

I appreciate that there may be cases where the property of a deceased person may be in dispute. In such cases all those D interested in determination of the dispute or establishing ownership may institute proceedings against the Administrator or the Administrator may sue to establish claim of deceased's property.

The law regarding institution of civil claims has not been changed by the Administration of estate enactments. It only E provides a machinery whereby a legally recognized person is placed in the place of a deceased person in all matter relating to the deceased's estate.

To illustrate the point how some Primary Courts have entertained matters outside their jurisdiction, I would quote an F example: "Wife of a deceased person applied for Administration of her husband's estate. The primary court opened an Administration file. During the course of the hearing the applicant (wife of deceased) told the court all the property owned by the deceased. In this list there was a piece of land whose ownership was disputed. Someone else had G occupation of that piece of land. The primary court magistrate called that person to give evidence in these proceedings. That occupier came to court and gave evidence to the effect that the disputed piece of land was his property. The H primary court magistrate gave judgment for the wife of the deceased and ordered that third person to vacate the disputed land.

That third person appealed to the District Court and finally the parties reached the High Court. I quashed the proceedings and ordered fresh proceedings before the appropriate Courts."

I The most important point to note from the above quoted example is that a person who was not party to the suit had to drag

A himself up to the High Court to establish his claim in a matter that did not concern him directly in the original proceedings before the primary court.
In the instant case the Primary Court had no jurisdiction to distribute the estate of the deceased for many reasons apart from the fact that the Primary Court ought not to do the work of the Administrator. The estate of the deceased included B property which was held under a Registered Partnership No. 16551 dated 1st March, 1962. Partnership property is not covered under Customary Law or Islamic Law. Even the District Court would have no jurisdiction to entertain the Administration Suit as the property value exceeded shs.100,000/=. The present respondent was not a party in the C original proceedings.
For these reasons I quash the proceeding of both Courts below and order that the interested parties may lodge their claims before appropriate court having jurisdiction to entertain the claim. D
I order that each party bear its own costs of this appeal and costs of the courts below.
Order accordingly.

A prior to the filing of the suit. Counsel for the defendant raised the point of jurisdiction on the part of the High Court arguing that the amount claimed, shs.14,549/= was below shs. 20,000/= and therefore the Court lacked jurisdiction to entertain the suit. The amount of shs.8,713/86 shown at the prayer to the plaint did not form part of the plaint unless it appeared in the body of the plaint.

Held: (i) Interest prior to the filing of the suit is a matter of substantive law and it must be specifically pleaded;

1. Yusuf Abdallah v French Somaliland Shipping Co. [1959] E.A. 25

El-Maamry, for the plaintiff.

Uzanda, for the defendant

Bahati, J.: Mr. Uzanda learned counsel, for the defendant raised the point of jurisdiction on the part of this court arguing that since the amount claimed is below Shs.20,000/= this court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. Mr. Uzanda pointed out that the value of the plaintiff's claim was shown in paragraph 5 of the plaint which was Shs.14,549/=, but at the prayer to the plaint the plaintiff had tucked in Shs.8713/86 being interest from July, 1975 to January, 1981. This is interest of 7 years prior to the filing of the suit. Mr. Uzanda submitted further that the law relating to interest prior to the filing of the suit was clear namely that interest prior to the filing of the suit is a matter of substantive law and not procedural law and therefore such interest must be pleaded in the body of the plaint. It cannot be tucked in the prayer like interest after filing the suit. Mr. Uzanda referred the court to Mulla - Code of Civil Procedure - 12th Edition page 145 and also the AIR commentaries 6th edition volume 1 pg 6121. Mr. Uzanda submitted that the plaintiff had not pleaded the sum of 8713.86 in the plaint nor was it known on what basis he was claiming it. Interest prior to filing of the suit, Mr. Uzanda submitted, could come under three headings namely - by agreement, by mercantile practice, or by statute. But in the plaint this was not shown, he said. He submitted

A further that even if the case were to be heard on its merits it would be impossible for the court to award such interest because having not been pleaded, it could be argued. Mr. Uzanda concluded that the plaintiff had asked the court to adjudicate on Shs.14,549/= which is far below the pecuniary jurisdiction of the court; and as such the suit should be dismissed with costs. B

With regard to the counter claim, Mr. Uzanda argued that it had been filed nearly 2 years ago and no defence to it had been made by the plaintiff nor was there any application for filing any defence. He prayed that judgment be entered for the defendant as prayed in the counterclaim. C

In reply to this argument Mr. El-Maamry, learned counsel for the plaintiff asked for an adjournment to prepare his reply and his prayer was granted. When the matter came up for hearing about a month later, Mr. El Maamry submitted that the relief paragraph was part of the plaint and that although there was no paragraph claiming interests, interest was D properly claimed in the relief. In the alternative, Mr. El-Maamry applied orally to amend the plaint to incorporate a paragraph on the interest before filing the suit.

With regard to the defence to the counterclaim, Mr. El-Maamry conceded that he had not yet filed one nor asked for extension of time to do so. But he applied for leave to file it now because it was ready. E

Mr. Uzanda, replying to Mr. El-Maamry's arguments said that his main argument which was that the interest prior to the filing of the suit is a matter of substantive law and must be specifically pleaded because there are several grounds on F which it can be claimed. He said that this argument had not been answered by his learned friend. He went on to elaborate that the interest might be a subject of an agreement or based on mercantile usage or based on a statute. In G each case the basis of the interest had to be specifically pleaded. Mr. Uzanda cited yet another authority on this point namely Yusuf Abdallah v French Somaliland Shipping Co. [1959] E.A.25 at 28

With regard to the argument of Mr. El-Maamry that the relief is part of the pleading, Mr. uzanda submitted that the relief is based on the pleading and it is not part of the pleading. Mr. Uzanda referred the court to Mulla on Code of Civil H Procedure, 12th Edition pg. 96 where it is stated that a relief not based on the pleading should not be granted. With regard to the application by Mr. El-Maamry to amend the plaint, Mr. Uzanda submitted that as the issue of jurisdiction I had been raised it had to be decided first. If the Court

A finds that it has no jurisdiction then it cannot have power to do anything else except to dismiss the suit. Finally with regard to the application by Mr. El-Maamry for leave to file a defence to the counter claim, Mr. Uzanda submitted that no reasonable ground had been given why even an application for time to file the defence was not made almost two years since the counterclaim was filed. He therefore prayed the suit B to be dismissed with costs and the Counterclaim to be either allowed with costs or the defendant be allowed to prove it ex-parte by affidavit.

The 1st issue involved here is one of jurisdiction. The Plaintiff claims that the court has jurisdiction whereas the defendant C claims otherwise. Having gone through Mulla on the Code of Civil Procedure, 12th Edition on page 145, I have come to agree with Mr. Uzanda that interest prior to the filing of the suit is a matter of substantive law and it must be specifically pleaded. In this case the interest from July, 1975 to January, 1981 has not been pleaded anywhere but, in the words of D Mr. Uzanda, it has been tucked in the prayer for relief. I agree with Mr. Uzanda that as it is necessary to plead on what basis the interest sought is being claimed; and there are three heads on which such interest may be based, namely E mercantile practice, statute, or implied agreement or contract, the interest shown in the relief cannot be allowed to stand so as to swell the amount claimed from 14,549/= to over 20,000/=. The only relief which can be claimed is what has F been pleaded in the plaint. It follows therefore that the amount claimed in this case is only Shs. 14,549/= which is below the jurisdiction of this Court. In terms of Section 13 of the Civil Procedure Code this court has no jurisdiction to try the suit.

Mr. El-Maamry applied orally to be allowed to amend the suit. I do not think that such leave can be granted here G because the plaintiff was aware of the defect in the plaint through the written statement of defence but he chose to do nothing. It would not be just to the defendant to grant such leave.
Finally with regard to the counter claim, there cannot be any question of filing a defence to it at this late hour as the plaintiff did not do so for almost two years nor did he apply for extension of time to file any defence. The defendant is H granted leave to prove the counterclaim ex-parte by the affidavit as prayed. The plaintiff's suit is therefore dismissed with costs.
I Appeal dismissed.

Mnzavas J.K.: On 11/10/85 the appellant/applicant complained before the Regional Housing Tribunal alleging that the respondent had let his house (in which the appellant was one of the tenants) to members of the Tanzania F Peoples Defence Forces who, according to his testimony before the tribunal were threatening to evict him and his family from the house. He asked the tribunal to intervene and save him from being evicted from the premises.

G Before the tribunal the respondent admitted having let the said premises to, (according to him) officers of J.K.T. But he said that he did so after he had given notice to the tenants and asked them to quit the premises within an agreed date; and that all the other tenants, except the appellant, had already complied with the notice and have vacated their rooms. H He however further told the tribunal that he was ready to find another room for the appellant in an adjacent building over and above allowing him retaining one of his two rooms in the house. He asked the tribunal to grant him time to sort out the matter with the appellant. Thereupon the tribunal said: I

A ORDER: Prayer granted, matter be settled by the parties themselves first.

Apparently the parties failed to reach a settlement and they had to appear again before the tribunal on 1/11/85. After hearing both parties the tribunal made the following order: "Tenant to surrender the two rooms before 25/11/85 and shall B accept the other one kept by L.L. The landlod to assist him look for alternative room before that date". There was yet another order (type written) dated 5/12/85 which order was more or less similar to the previous order dated 1/11/85. C Dissatisfied by the tribunal's orders the appellant has come to this Court.

Legally an aggrieved party in dispute between landlord and tenant before a Regional Housing Tribunal appeals first to the Housing Appeal Tribunal before coming to the High Court. However it would appear that the Appeals Tribunal has not D yet been formed and it seems that is why the appellant has directly come to this Court. Be it as it may my reading of the proceedings in the Regional Housing Tribunal shows that the mandatory provisions of section 11 of the Rent Restriction Act, 1984 were not complied with. The section says inter alia: E

The jurisdiction of the Tribunal shall be exercised by the Chairman sitting with two other members of the Tribunal - Section 11(2).

F Nowhere in the handwritten proceedings is it shown that the learned Chairman, Mr. Mtenya, sat with members of the Tribunal and the orders arrived at were clearly a nullity.

The proceedings and the order of the Tribunal are therefore hereby set aside. The status quo before the matter came G before the Tribunal is restored. The Regional Housing Tribunal is to hear the dispute de novo and comply with the mandatory provision of section 11 of the Rent Restriction Act, 1984.

MWALUSANYA J
A the plaintiff. Later execution proceedings was issued for payment of a total of Shs.658,776/=. One of the points taken on appeal is that the execution proceedings for the untaxed costs amounting to over five times the decretal amount was irregular. Counsel for the respondent Mr. Butambala conceded that much. It was quite improper B for the learned Resident Magistrate to issue execution proceedings for Shs. 658,776/= which had not been taxed by the Taxing Master as is required under Rule 61 of the 'Advocate's Remuneration and Taxation of Costs Rules' as amended by GN.89 of 1962. The Resident Magistrate as a Taxing Master at the District Court level should have taxed the bill of C costs first before issuing execution proceedings. On this aspect of the case we allow the appeal and quash the execution proceedings.
The next point is as to whether the suit was time-barred or not. That depends on as to when the period of limitation D started to run. This was a contract that was made in 1975 for milling maize into maize-flour on behalf of the N.M.C. In 1976 it is said that the appellant corporation refused to pay the respondent for services rendered. The appellant refused payment on the ground that he had actually stolen some of the maize-flour that he was supposed to deliver to them after E milling. He was reported to the police and respondent was charged in Criminal Case No. 115/1979 wherein he was acquitted. The respondent did not file this suit till 7/9/1984. It is conceded by both parties that the limitation period for F this type of suit is six years as per Part I of the First Schedule of the Law of Limitation Act No. 10 of 1971. Mr. Rugarabamu for the appellant has argued that the period of limitation started to run in 1976 and so by 1984 the respondent was time-barred. On the other hand counsel for the respondent Mr. Butambala argued that the period of G limitation did not start to run until 1979 when respondent was acquitted. But Mr. Rugarabamu argued that the criminal trial was not a disability as respondent was free to file the civil case.

The trial court was obviously unhelpful when it held that the law of limitation should not be applied if it produced unjust results to any of the parties. The trial magistrate patently misdirected himself on this matter. A court is a court of law and H not a justice. So judges and magistrates are enjoined to apply the law as they find it even if they feel it is unjust. As one of celebrated English Chief Justices, Lord Mansfield, had once said, the courts should apply the law even if the sky I will fall. If the law is unjust it is for Parliament to amend it but not for the court to refuse to apply it.

MWALUSANYA J

A In my view the period of limitation did not start to run until the acquittal of the respondent. This is because the appellant was not then denying liability but wanted to ascertain as to whether the respondent was not under any liability to them so that they could off-set that sum from what they owed the respondent. In fact that is what the appellant B corporation had endorsed on the back of Exh. A through one of its officials. It is only after the acquittal and when appellant still refused to pay that the cause of action arose and only then did the period of limitation start to run. As the acquittal was in 1979 and the case was filed in 1984 then it was within six years. Therefore I hold that the suit was in time and not time-barred. C

Finally the appellant argued at the hearing of the appeal that the respondent had failed to prove at the trial as to how much of the relevant contract he had performed so as to deserve a sum of Shs.194,346/= In my view the respondent had already proved that much on a balance of probability. That was a collorary from the outcome of the criminal case. In the D criminal case it was argued on behalf of the appellant that respondent had received 500 bags of maize for milling. He was supposed to send back 484 bags of maize-flour but instead it is said he only returned 324 bags of maize-flour and so 160 bags of maize were stolen. The criminal court in its judgment Exh.B found as a fact that respondent had delivered all E 484 bags of maize-flour to the go-down of N.M.C. Therefore that respondent had already fulfilled or performed his part of the contract was a non-issue at the subsequent civil case. After the criminal trial it was a foregone conclusion that F the respondent had performed his part of the contract. The appellant corporation is therefore liable in law.

In the upshot the appeal is dismissed with costs.

G Appeal dismissed.

G Mwalusanya, J.: This is an application for revision filed by the applicant Kampuni ya Uchukuzi Mwanza Ltd. (KAUMA) against the respondent Gabriel C. Riwa concerning the judgment of the Resident Magistrate's H Court Mwanza which awarded the said respondent shs. 2,125,000/= as costs payable to him as a Court-broker under the Attachment and Sale (Broker and Fees) Rules GN. 298/1964 as amended by GN. 105/1984. The application for revision is under s. 44(1)(b) of the Magistrate's Courts Act No. 2 of 1984. I
MWALUSANYA J
A For the respondent Mr. Kahangwa took the first point that the application is misconceived because under s.79(l) of the Civil Procedure Code Act No. 49 of 1966 the powers of revision of the High Court are restricted to matters of jurisdiction only. And he cited the decision of this court in Matemba v Yamulinga [1968] E.A. 643(T) by Mustafa J. B For the applicant Mr. Lyimo conceded that the application is based on merits of the case and not on the question of jurisdiction.

But he contended that nevertheless the application was in order because under s.44(1)(b) of the Magistrate's Courts Act there is a section that provides that the High Court may revise proceedings of subordinate courts: C

'if it appears that there has been an error material to the merits of the case involving injustice'.

And on this point I agree with counsel for the applicant Mr. Lyimo that the High Court has been given additional powers D under the Magistrate's Courts Act over and above those contained in the Civil Procedure Code. This is buttressed by s.79(2) of the Civil Procedure Code which provides in black and white thus: E

Nothing in this section shall be construed as limiting the High Court's power to exercise revisional jurisdiction Lunder the Magistrate's Courts Act.

F Therefore that section makes it crystal clear that the High Court has additional powers of revision under the Magistrate's Courts Act.

So the crucial point to decide in this application is as to whether there is some material error on the merits of the case as conducted by the trial magistrate. This calls upon this court to construe Para 1 and 2 of the Second Schedule of the G Attachment and Sale (Brokers and Fees) Rules GN. 298 of 1964 as amended by GN.105 of 1984. These two paragraphs read:

H Para 1: For attachment or taking possession of movable property and keeping possession of the same for 15 days or part thereof, when the estimated value of the property (in accordance with the executing officer's inventory furnished under Rule 5) -

(a) Does not exceed shs. 400/= -shs. 60/=. I

A (b) Exceeds shs. 400/= - shs. 60/= for the first shs. 400/= and 10/= for each subsequent shs.1000/= or part thereof.

Para 2: For keeping possession of movable property after the first 15 days, for every shs. 100/= of the estimated value of the B property and for each day or part thereof - shs.5/=, but so that the fee shall not be less than shs.2/= nor more than shs.20/= per day.

C Those are the contents of the two paragraphs that were pertinent to the matter in issue at the trial.

Now it was common ground at the trial that the value of the attached property was shs.250,000/= Computation of the D fees payable to the Court-broker under para 1 of the Second Schedule of the Rules did not generate any controversy, and this was for the first 15 days. It was computed thus:

(a) For the first shs.400/= - shs.60/=

E (b) For the (shs.250,000/= - shs. 400/=) shs. 249,600/= the formula is:

shs. 249,600 x 10 = shs. 2,020,000/=

F Thus the total fees payable to the Court broker under para one was shs. 60 + shs. 2,496/= and that comes to shs. 2,556/=.

The main contention was centred under para 2 and of the Rules. As for the number of days the property attached was G under custody it was conceded by both parties that it was 419 days. Now if you minus the first 15 days paid under para one above, you remain with 404 days. The trial court was of the view that the correct formula for the computation of fees payable to the Court-broker under Para 2 was:

H $$\frac{250{,}000 \times 2 \times 404}{100} = \text{shs. } 2{,}020{,}000/=.$$

The trial magistrate said that the sum payable could not be less because the fees were formulated by the legislature to I enable the Court-broker to manage to keep the attached property in safe

A custody for example enabling him to pay a watchman to look after the property.

Mr. Kahangwa counsel for the respondent at the hearing of this application supported that contention.

However at the trial and at the hearing of this application counsel for the applicant Mr. Lyimo strongly objected to that B formula adopted by the trial magistrate in computing the fees payable to the Court-broker under Para 2 of the Rules. He pointed out that the correct formula was that: You divide by 100 the value of the property and then multiply by five. You then get (shs. 12,500/=) what would otherwise be payable in one day if there was no proviso. He went on to say that by virtue of the proviso the amount payable per day is limited to a minimum of shs.2/= and a maximum of shs.20/=. In this C case Mr. Lyimo chose to play the maximum rate of shs.20/= and so concluded by saying that for 404 days the fees payable would be 20 x 404 = shs.8,080/= only. And plus shs.2560/= from the first paragraph you get a total of D shs.10,636/= which would be payable to the Court-broker. Mr. Lyimo also argued that awarding shs.2,125,000/= to the Court-broker would be ridiculous and anamolous as it would be more than the value of the amount claimed in the suit. E

In the final analysis the issue posed for construction by this court is simply as to whether the phrase in the Rules 'the fee shall not be less than shs.2/= nor more than shs.20/= per day' pertains to the whole estimated value of the property or to the shs.100/= only.

It is a settled rule of interpretation that where the language of a statute is clear and explicit the courts must give effect to it F whatever may be the consequences, for in that case the words of the statute speak the intention of the legislature - see Graies on Statute Law 11th Ed. at p. 64. For that reason I cannot accept what was contended by Mr. Lyimo on behalf G of the applicants that the fees payable to a Court-broker cannot by any standards exceed the amount claimed in the suit.

In my considered opinion whether the fees payable to the Court-broker exceed the claim in the suit is of little importance H so long as, that is the intention of the legislature. Now reading the whole of para 2 of the Second Schedule very closely, one cannot fail to see that the proviso stating that a minimum fee of shs.2/= and a maximum fee of shs.20/= is payable, pertains only to the shs.100/= of the value of the property and not to the value of the whole property. To paraphrase that paragraph, it reads: 'For every shs.100/= of the estimated value of the property you pay shs.5/= I

A but so that the fee shall not be less than shs. 2/= nor more than shs.20/= per day. The proper construction therefore of that phrase would reveal that it pertains to shs.100/= only and not to the value of the whole property and so I hold.
B And on policy grounds it would also appear that the trial magistrate made a valid point. When he took the rate of shs.2/= as the minimum fees payable for every shs.100/=, it turned out that per day the court-broker was paid shs.5,000/=. That is not an extraordinary huge sum of money in these days of inflation as to make someone raise eyebrows. I agree with the trial magistrate that to keep safe custody of an item like a vehicle is an expensive undertaking. C On my part I have no qualms over the computation of the fees payable.
In the event the application fails as I find no error in the ruling of the trial magistrate to warrant interference by this court. The application is accordingly dismissed with costs. D
Appeal dismissed.

A The appellant was charged before an Economic Crimes Court. The offence with which he was charged was committed before the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act, 1984 became effective but the case was pending with the police under the Penal Code. When Act became operational the appellant was charged under it. Counsel for B the appellant argued that it was not proper to charge the appellant under the Act because it had no provision for retrospective operation. The High Court ruled that it was proper to charge the appellant under the Act. Counsel's application to appeal against this ruling was rejected and the judge sought to give a restricted meaning to the word "ruling". This meaning would exlude rulings which are of interlocutory nature. C

The Court of Appeal considered the evidence adduced by both parties. It also addressed itself to proper constitution of an Economic Crimes Court when passing sentence.

D Held: (i) There was nothing in law to prevent the Police from altering the charge, originally under the Penal Code, and to proceed under the Act if they thought that the facts disclosed an offence under the Act;

E (ii) the word "ruling" in section 2 of the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act, 1984, should be given plain and ordinary meaning to include interlocutory ruling;

(iii) the evidence adduced in support of the charge was not at all strong, and the appellant's defence, properly considered, raises serious doubts as to his guilt; F

(iv) section 16 of the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act 1984 requires that the issue of sentence be decided by majority of the members of the Court. The Judge erred in proceeding alone to determine that issue.

[zJDz]Judgment

4th July, 1986 Kisanga, J.A.: The appellant was convicted in a majority judgment under the Economic and Organised I Crime Control Act for occasioning loss to a specified authority, and was

A sentenced to 3 years' imprisonment, with an order for compensation in respect of the loss caused to the specified authority. He has now appealed against both conviction and sentence.

Very briefly the facts as found by the Economic Crimes Court were that the appellant was a bank official who at the B material time was a signatory to the encashment of cheques of over Shs. 10,000/=. He duly authorised the encashment of two cheques each worth Shs. 125,000/=. He authorised this at Mahenge where the drawer of the cheques, one Isaac Jacob @ Isaack Shinyanga had no bank account and when the cheques were later referred to Igunga where he had an account, there were no funds to meet the payment thereof. The prosecution, therefore, charged the appellant with C occasioning loss to the National Bank of Commerce in that he was careless in not clearing the cheques with the Igunga branch before authorizing payment of them at Mahenge. The appellant's defence was that he did not clear the cheques D because there was no telephone communication between Mahenge and Igunga branches of the Bank but that he, as branch Manager, used his discretion to authorise payment after satisfying himself that the drawer of the cheques was creditworthy. As intimated earlier the court was divided, the chairman and one lay member recording a verdict of guity E with the remaining lay member dissenting.

In this appeal the appellant is represented by Mr. S.A. Masati who had also acted for the defence at the trial. Before us the learned counsel filed seven grounds of appeal but at the hearing he abandoned ground three and argued the rest. For F convenience the first three grounds may be taken together. He alleges before us, as indeed he had alleged before the Economic Crimes Court, that the charge was defective in as much as it charged his client with an offence which was committed in July, 1984 before the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act came into operation in September that G year, and yet there was no provision in the Act for retrospective operation. It is apparent that the case falls within the provisions of section 65(4) of the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act which in the rest of this judgment will be referred to simply as the Act. That sub-section says that: H

65(4). Where a case is pending with the police or before the Tribunal but it may not be heard by the Tribunal as a result of the operation of the preceding provision of this section, proceedings in respect of it shall be instituted before the Court, subject to this I Act.

KISANGA JA

A Mr. Masati conceded that when the Act came into operation the case was pending with the police, and it is clear that it could not be heard by the Tribunal because the appellant was never charged before that Tribunal. But counsel contended that at the time of the commencement of the Act his client was then charged under the Penal Code with the offence of stealing by public servant. By this we understood him to say that the police should have continued the proceedings B against his client under the Penal Code. We could see no basis for that argument. We think that once the case was pending with the police at the commencement of the Act, there was nothing in law to prevent the police from altering the C charge, originally under the Penal Code, and to proceed under the Act if they thought that the facts disclosed an offence under the Act. We are therefore satisfied that the case was properly made the subject of a charge under the Act and we can find no merit in the complaint.

As intimated earlier, this complaint had been the subject of a preliminary objection at the trial but the Court overruled it. D Whereupon the learned counsel sought to appeal against such refusal but he was refused leave to do so. That refusal is now made a ground of complaint before us. Having regard to the view which we have just expressed on this matter, we E are satisfied that the Economic Crimes Court was quite justified to overrule the preliminary objection and we can see no merit in this ground of complaint either.

The refusal to grant leave to appeal against that ruling, however, appears to present some difficulty. Mr. Masati stated that in seeking to appeal against the ruling he was relying on the provisions of section 61 of the Act. That section F provides that:

61. A person aggrieved by a decision of the Court may appeal to the Court of Appeal of the United Republic in accordance with established law in that behalf. G

Under section 2 of the Act the word "decision" is defined to include

...a judgment, finding, acquittal, conviction, sentence or ruling.

H In over-ruling the objection the trial Court stated, inter alia, that the right conferred under s.61 of the Act did not concern every decision of the Court during the trial, but that it applied only to decisions which are final and not interlocutory in nature. It is to be noted that the word "ruling" has not been defined under the Act. I

1986 TLR 48

KISANGA JA

A The Court, however, took the view that the word is to be given a restricted meaning to exclude rulings which are of an interlocutory nature. The Court gave no reasons for so restricting the meaning of the word, nor can we suggest any. Such a restricted meaning can cause prejudice or injustice to an accused person in some cases, for example where his B objection is sustained on appeal resulting in his discharge or acquittal. In such cases the accused would have suffered unnecessarily the pain of being an accused person, with its attendant consequences, for the whole period between the time of such refusal and the time he is let off on appeal against the final decision. That would be undesirable, and we think C Parliament cannot have intended it. As stated before we can find no justification for restricting the meaning of the word "ruling". We are increasingly of the view that the word should be given plain and ordinary meaning to include interlocutory ruling. The trial Court was therefore unjustified to refuse the appellant's leave to appeal, but we hasten to D add that in this particular case such refusal did not prejudice the appellant because on the view we have taken of the matter, the intended appeal against the ruling would not have succeeded, anyway.

E Again for convenience we take together grounds five and six the gist of which is that the prosecution did not prove the case beyond a reasonable doubt having regard to the appellant's defence. Essentially the evidence implicating the appellant was that he authorized the two cheques without having first cleared them with the Igunga Branch of the bank. It F was undisputed that he had given his authority on 16.7.84 and the cheques were presented at Igunga on 15.8.84, that is about a month later, when it was learnt that the drawer's account had no funds to meet them. But the prosecution G adduced no evidence as to the state of the account as at the date of authorising the cheques. Counsel for the appellant submitted that it is possible that the account had sufficient funds on the date the cheques were authorized but that if the funds were run down only subsequently, then the appellant could not be to blame for it. There was one matter here H which was not quite clear from the evidence. That is the meaning of "clearing the cheques" with the Igunga Branch. We could not be sure whether this merely meant to ascertain whether the drawer's account at Igunga had sufficient funds, or whether it also meant debiting the account at the same time to the extent of the value of the two cheques or, if not so, to I take any precautions against any withdrawals from the account until presentation and payment at a later date of the two cheques. If it meant

KISANGA JA

A the former then counsel's submission has merit because, as he says, there might have been enough funds in the account on the material day, but if the funds were depleted only subsequently the appellant could not be to blame for it as there is no evidence as to what precautions, if any, he was required to take against any withdrawals from the account pending presentation and payment of the two cheques. In the absence of a clarification on this point, we think that the charge B cannot safely be said to have been proved sufficiently.

In dealing with the appellant's defence the learned judge and the lay member who recorded the conviction and whom we C shall continue to refer to simply as the two members of the Court, rejected that part of the defence where the appellant claimed that at the material time he was the branch manager, and that in that capacity he exercised his discretion and authorized payment of the cheques in the circumstances. A lot of argument centered around this point. The appellant had D asserted that he was posted from Morogoro to Mahenge as a branch manager, adding that the letter of his posting was at Mahenge while the copy thereof remained at Morogoro, and that if the prosecution so wished they could call the manager at Morogoro branch to produce it. The two members of the Court rejected that claim and preferred the E prosecution evidence which was to the effect that at the material time there was no substantive manager, that P.W.4, the accountant, was in accordance with the banking practice, the acting manager while the appellant was posted there simply as his number two. In rejecting that part of the defence, the two members of the Court took the view that "... where an F accused person relies on any defence it is his duty to prove, on a balance of probability that defence." And consistent with that view the two members of the Court contended that the duty to produce the letter of posting him as manager G was on the appellant and not on the prosecution. With due respect, this was a serious misdirection in law. The cardinal principle of our criminal law is that the burden is on the prosecution to prove its case; no duty is cast on the accused to prove his innocence. There are a few well known exceptions to this principle, one example being where the accused H raises the defence of insanity in which case he must prove it on a balance of probabilities. But the present case did not involve any defence which fell within the known exceptions so as to require the appellant to prove it. Nor could it be said that the letter was a matter which was specially within the appellant's knowledge so as to place on him, in terms of I section 114(1) of the Evidence Act, the

KISANGA JA

A duty to prove or produce it. Therefore in holding that the duty was on the appellant and not on the prosecution to produce the letter the two members of the Court shifted the burden to the accused person and to that extent they were in error. The duty was clearly on the prosecution. More so especially after the appellant had expressly mentioned the B places where the letter and its copy could be found. Had the letter been produced, we cannot say for certain that it would have necessarily supported the Court's finding that the appellant was not the manager at the material time.

In rejecting that part of the defence where the appellant claimed that he, in his capacity as manager exercised his C discretion to authorize payment of the cheques, the two members of the Court took the view that even assuming that the appellant was the manager, there was no proof that he was vested with any such discretion. The appellant had said in his defence that his discretion was contained in what he described as Volume 2 of the Bank Handbook at paragraph 6/21. D The provision, he said, conferred on him the authority to decide such matters. There is no indication that the said Handbook was ever produced or put in evidence. The two members of the Court rejected this part of the defence E because the appellant did not show or spell out the extent of his discretion. This is what they said:

.... The accused talked of his discretion under the banking procedures but he did not say what was the limit of his discretion. This would have helped the court to decide whether the discretion he used was reasonable in allowing the encashment of the Shs F . 250,000/= by defaulting the procedure.

With due respect, once again, this was a misdirection. The Court could not properly blame the appellant for not giving G adequage information about the extent of his discretion because he himself may have thought that the information he had given was enough. And indeed on glancing through his cross-examination, there is no indication that he was asked anything as to the limits of his discretion in the matter. In any event if the Court felt that it was necessary to have further H information to enable it to decide on the precise extent of the appellant's discretion, then it was open to the Court to call for the said Bank Handbook and to refer to the actual text. It could have done so by requiring an official of the bank to produce the book in evidence for the purpose. As things stand now, it cannot be said that this part of the appellant's I defence was given adequate

KISANGA JA

A consideration and refused on sufficient grounds. Had the Bank Handbook been produced, it might well have supported the appellant's contention that it conferred on him the necessary powers and discretion to act as he did, in which case the two members of the Court might have come to a different conclusion on the matter.

B The two members of the Court in considering the defence further, found that the appellant in authorizing the cheques acted unreasonably by relying on bank documents which were in possession of Isaac, his client, and which were sixteen months old. The said documents included counterfoils of cheque books, bank statements and bank paying-in-slips which C showed that Isaac's bank operation was good. But with due respect it seems that the Court was here picking and choosing from the defence only what was convenient for the purpose of its decision. Because the appellant said that in exercising the discretion to authorize the cheques, he took into consideration other factors in addition to those documents D . He said that he had known Isaac for a long time as a good customer of the bank. Isaac was a transporter and he owned a tractor. He was also a cattle dealer and he owned houses including one he had bought at Shinyanga. On the material day, the appellant went on, Isaac showed him Shs. 600,000/= in hard cash and told him that he was seeking to E withdraw an additional Shs. 250,000/= to enable him to purchase a lorry which was selling at Shs. 800,000/=. In holding that the appellant failed to exercise reasonable care the two members of the Court did not take into account these additional factors. To the extent of such omission they erred. They ought to have considered the defence in whole, not F only in part, and to see whether it created any reasonable doubt in their minds. The appellant claimed that upon considering all these factors he was convinced that his client was creditworthy and accordingly he authorized the cheques honestly believing that they would be honoured upon presentation for payment at Igunga. We are of the view that had the G two members of the Court considered the appellant's defence in whole they might have found that at least it was sufficient to cast a reasonable doubt as to his guilt. This is so especially as there was no attempt to contradict the appellant's assertion that Isaac, the said customer, owned various properties including the house at Shinyanga. Indeed H P.W.5, a police officer, testified that he visited Isaac's residence at Shinyanga although he did not find him there. This would tend to support the appellant's assertion that he believed that his client was a person who had property. I

KISANGA JA

A In an attempt to prove lack of care or negligence on the part of the appellant, the prosecution had sought to rely on a circular letter allegedly issued by the Bank's headquarters instructing its branches at Nyerere Road Mwanza, Tabora, Igunga and Shinyanga to close the accounts operated by Isaac and to leave only one. This circular was referred to and B the contents of it were actually read out in court by P.W.4. But for some reasons which are not immediately apparent, it was not tendered in evidence as exhibit. However, that circular was rightly not taken into account in considering the appellant's guilt because, among other things, the authorship of it was not proved and there was no evidence that its C contents had been communicated, or were known, to the appellant.

In the fourth ground of appeal Mr. Masati rightly complained that in the absence of one lay member, and the other lay D member dissenting, the learned judge proceeded to deliver the majority decision and further proceeded alone to sentence the appellant. This matter was governed by the provisions of section 16 of the Act, the relevant part of which provides that:

16. All questions to be decided by the Court, including the decision whether it finds the accused person guilty or Lnot guilty, shall E be decided by agreement of the majority of the members....

It is quite apparent from this provision that the issue of sentence is one to be decided by majority of the members of the F Court. The learned judge, therefore erred in proceeding alone to determine that issue. His order of sentence was therefore invalid, and had we been minded to uphold the conviction we would be bound to interefere with that order.

G Before we conclude the appeal we wish to observe although very briefly that the handling of this case was not at all satisfactory. The treatment of some of the issues involved was at times too casual and left a lot to be desired. The investigation of it was most superficial, and the presentation of it in court was only half-hearted leaving too many loose H ends. The number of misdirections on the part of the Court only served to aggravate that situation. We hope that all those concerned will make the necessary efforts to overcome such situations in future.

I In the last analysis we are of the view that the evidence adduced in support of the charge was not at all strong, and the appellant's defence, properly considered, raises serious doubts as to his

A guilt. In the circumstances we are satisfied that there is merit in this appeal which ought to succeed. Mr. Shio, the learned advocate who appeared for the respondent Republic at first sought to support the conviction, but on second thoughts conceded to this view. In the result we allow the appeal, quash the conviction and set aside the sentence with an order for the immediate release of the appellant unless he is otherwise lawfully held in custody. B

Having quashed the conviction, we find it not necessary now to consider the last ground of appeal which raises, in the alternative, the issue of excessiveness of the sentence and severity of the compensation order. C

Appeal allowed.

One of the complaints the appellant raised before the Court of Appeal was that there was an irregularity arising out of failure of the assistant returning officer to follow the guidelines given in a booklet titled "Guide to the Presiding Officers on H the Election Procedure". The guide required the officers to record on the counterfoils of ballot papers three numbers - the registration centre number, the constituency number and the voter's serial number. D Rutashobya, for the appellant

Kahangwa, for the first respondent

Mrema, for the Attorney-General

Mustafa, J.A.: In the Parliamentary election held in the Bukoba Urban constituency in October, 1985, E the 1st respondent herein Samwel Luangisa was the successful candidate. The 1st respondent won by 370 votes over his opponent Mujuni Kataraia the appellant herein. The 1st respondent polled 6,846 votes while the appellant polled 6,476 votes. The appellant challenged the election results in the High Court (Mwalusanya, J.) by way of an election F petition, but his petition was dismissed with costs in September, 1986, and he is now appealing to this Court. The Attorney-General has been joined as a second respondent in this appeal.

G In the High Court the appellant had alleged corruption, illegal campaigning and the exercise of undue influence on the part of the 1st respondent and various acts of non-compliance with the Elections Act on the part of the election officials. The High Court dealt with all the points raised in the petition and dismissed all the charges of corruption and illegal H campaign and acts of undue influence alleged. The High Court held that there were certain acts of non-compliance on the part of the election officials but concluded that those acts related to a very small number of voters and did not affect the result of the election.

We will consider the ten grounds of appeal filed by the appellant. Mr. Rutashobya appeared for the appellant in the appeal I

A before us, Mr. Kahangwa for the 1st respondent and Mr. Mrema for the Attorney General.

The first ground of appeal alleged that the trial judge had "played a partisan role" at the trial, presumably in favour of the 1st respondent. This ground can conveniently be taken with ground 10 of the appeal. In ground 10 the appellant alleged B that the trial judge "had misdirected himself when he declared that the appellant's counsel has not shown him how the illegal practices and contravention and non-compliance of the Elections Act 1985 had affected the results without asking the advocate to clarify on that and it was not proper for the judge to declare that before he heard the submissions of the C respondent's counsel and wrote his judgment".

Mr. Rutashobya based that serious allegation of the trial judge being a partisan on the following ground. After Mr. Lipiki, who at the trial had acted for the appellant, had completed his final submission to the court, the trial judge made the following observation which was on the record: D

I wish only to observe that you have not shown how the illegal practices and contravention or non-compliance of the Election Act has affected the results. As for the illegal campaigns you have not shown as to how they prevented the majority of the voters from E electing the candidate of their choice. If you had alluded to those points in your submission you would have rendered my job easier and helped me a good deal. F

In the judgment itself the trial judge reverted to this matter. He referred to several decided cases where certain acts of non-compliance had been found not to have affected the results of an election and therefore could not nullify an election. He continued. G

I have dwelt at length with these preliminary remarks because they are important but particularly because counsel for the petitioner Mr. Lipiki appears not to have been aware of these provisions. In his final submission he invited this Court to nullify the election H even if the contraventions in question did not affect the results of the election....

Mr. Rutashobya submitted that the trial judge had already made up his mind to dismiss the petition as soon as Mr. Lipiki I had made his final submission. He contended that the trial judge should,

MUSTAFA JA

A after Mr. Lipiki had finished, have asked Mr. Lipiki "to clarify" on the point about results being affected. Then Court Mr. Rutashobya said:

My submission is that reading through Mr. Lipiki's arguments at the end of the trial he had referred to the results being affected by B the illegal practices or non-compliance.

We think that the trial judge made his observation more in sorrow than anything else. He had expected help from counsel C appearing before him, including Mr. Lipiki, in deciding his case. It is clear that in law, certain acts of non-compliance, if they do not affect the result of an election, cannot have the effect of nullifying it. It would seem that Mr. Lipiki was not conversant with that aspect of the law, as he apparently submitted that any act of non-compliance, irrespective of whether D it affected the election result, would nullify an election.

If after the observation by the trial judge, Mr. Lipiki had wanted to "clarify" certain matters, he was at liberty to seek permission from the court to do so. The Court was still in session, and the trial was still proceeding. Mr. Lipiki did not E seek such permission. In these circumstances it seems extraordinary to us that Mr. Rutashobya had thought fit to complain in the way he had done. It was for Mr. Lipiki, if he had wanted to "clarify" matters, to do so. The judge had indicated to Mr. Lipiki what was wanted.

F In answer to this Court Mr. Rutashobya had stated that Mr. Lipiki, in his final submission, had referred to the issue about results being affected by illegal practices or non-compliance with election provisions. We have since read Mr. Lipiki's submission as contained in the record of appeal and we can find no trace of such reference. Mr. Rutashobya G misled us. He should be more careful and more responsible in his submissions before a court; or in making a serious allegation against the trial judge of being a partisan of the 1st respondent, unless he had some sort of evidence to H substantiate such allegation. Not a shred of evidence was forthcoming about the trial judge being a partisan. We are aware that Mr. Rutashobya had only been recently admitted to the Bar, and we will, on this occasion overlook what clearly is irresponsible and possibly improper conduct on his part. We may not be so lenient in future.

I On ground 2 it was contended that the trial judge had intimidated or threatened P.W.27 Wilbard Yusufu and had erred in

MUSTAFA JA

A rejecting Yusufu's evidence alleging corruption. During his testimony Yusufu alleged that the 1st respondent gave him Shs. 200 to help in the former's election campaign. When cross-examined by counsel for the 1st respondent Yusufu stated: "I am sure I can be convicted of corruption. I did not think it is a bad thing .. I don't know that to receive a bribe B is an offence".

Mr. Rutashobya purported to file a supplementary record of appeal in terms of Rule 92(1) of the Court of Appeal Rules. However the record consisted of an affidavit by the appellant and a photocopy of a newspaper item apparently dated 13.8.86. Counsel for both the respondents submitted that it was not a supplementary record of appeal and referred to C Rule 89 of the Rules of the Court of Appeal as to what constituted a record of appeal. The newspaper item clearly was inadmissible and the affidavit purported to refer to something not in the record of proceedings. It would seem that what D Mr. Rutashobya wanted was either to challenge the accuracy of the record or to seek to introduce additional evidence. If he had so wanted he had certainly adopted the wrong way and method of doing so. The so-called supplementary record is not admissible and will not be looked at. There is just no evidence to support the allegation that the trial judge E intimidated and threatened P.W.27 Yusufu.

The trial judge dealt at length with the testimony of P.W.27 Yusufu and the 1st respondent and his witnesses on the allegation of the bribe of Shs. 200 being given to Yusufu, and concluded that Yusufu was a liar and could not be believed. F We see no reason to differ from that finding.

Both ground 3 and ground 5 refer to the party held at the 1st respondent's house at Kitendagulo Village on 6.8.1986. It was common ground that a party was held there on that day. The 1st respondent's version was that it was a party for G close relatives to welcome him home after an absence of 2 months in Dar es Salaam where he attended the Budget Session. Only one outsider P.W.10 Joel, a close friend, was at the party. He said he personally did not invite anybody as he had arrived only the previous day. He said in evidence: H

1It was for me to bid farewell to my friends and they were congratulating me for having finished my five-year term safely. It was just a family get together to congratulate me for having finished my term safely. I

MUSTAFA JA

A The persons who attended ate food and a religious song was sung. There were no speeches nor was there any campaign during the party. There was a funeral of a neighbour that day and R.W.20 Lugusha, the District Party Chairman passed by on his way to the funeral and joined the 1st respondent for food. R.W.12 Jones and R.W.19 Jesse B also attended the funeral that day, but did not join the party.

P.W.11 Salum and P.W.12 Alfonce alleged that they were invited to and attended the party. They alleged that at the party which was attended by many people R.W.20 Lugusha spoke and urged 1st respondent to be the candidate for the new Parliament and that was agreed to by acclamation. He said among those present supporting the 1st respondent was C R.W.19 Jesse. A number of people signed the 1st respondent's nomination after the 1st respondent had agreed to stand as a candidate. He said P.W.10 Joel was also at the meeting together with Party and Government Officials. D Incidentally P.W. 11 alleged that the 1st respondent had invited all the leaders, players and fans (presumably supporters) of the Balimi Football Club and these attended the party. P.W.12 was a watchman of Bukoba Town Council.

E The trial judge went into the evidence adduced by the witnesses on both sides in great detail. He disbelieved both P.W.11 and P.W.12 as to what transpired at the party. He gave his reasons, a cogent one being that it was highly improbable that the 1st respondent could have invited to a campaign party all the "fans, players and leaders" of the Balimi F Football Club which formed a large group and could contain enemies as well as friends, especially as there was undisputed evidence that there was some friction between the Football Club and the 1st respondent. The judge also was of the view that if R.W.19 Jesse was at the party as the 1st respondent's supporter it was difficult to understand why the G appellant did not object to R.W.19 being appointed the Chairman of the campaign meetings on 2.10.85. The appellant stated that he had no objection to the appointment of R.W.19 as Chairman, and he did not object on 12.10.85 when the supervisory delegates were introduced. The judge was satisfied that both P.W.11 and P.W.12 had lied in court. He H preferred the version of the party as given by the 1st respondent and his witnesses. In fact the evidence of P.W.10 Joel would also support the version given by the 1st respondent.

In our view it was open to the trial judge, after assessing and analysing the evidence, and with the opportunity of seeing I and hearing the witnesses testifying, to have accepted or rejected the

A evidence of P.W.11 and P.W.12. We could not find any misdirection or non-direction in his assessment of the evidence.

In ground 4 the appellant alleged that the judge had erred in finding that there was no evidence that non-citizens had B voted and in ignoring evidence which showed that several unregistered persons were permitted to vote. This ground is totally baseless. The petitioner testified that he was informed by one Kakwezi that two non-citizens who he named had voted. Kakwezi was not called to give evidence and the petitioner's evidence was hearsay and inadmissible. Four C non-citizens attempted to vote and were caught and their voting cards confiscated. Mr.

Rutashobya attempted to argue that because 4 non-citizens were caught trying to vote, that was evidence that a number of non-citizens must have voted. That is a good instance of turning an argument on its head!

In ground 6 it was alleged that there was evidence that some people voted at polling stations not allotted to them, and that some voters were denied their right to vote. The appellant contended that the trial judge erred in holding that such D non-compliance with the election provisions did not affect the election result.

It is true that the judge found that 5 voters voted at polling stations not allotted to them, and he held that since that E misconduct created the same conditions for both candidates, the contravention did not affect the result of the election. Similarly the judge found that 6 non-registered voters had used "floating cards", and thus 6 registered voters had been deprived of their votes. He similarly held that did not affect the result of the election. Three persons, 2 drivers and a F policeman, were deprived of the right to vote, as they were assigned duties outside their constituencies on election day. In any event only 14 votes were involved; and in whatever way one looked at it, considering the majority was 370 votes, that could not have affected the result of the election. G

Ground 7 was concerned with non-stamping of ballot papers. Only one such instance was proved and one vote was spoiled in this way. This could not be said to have had any effect on the election result.

Ground 8 reads: "That the judge improperly dismissed the evidence proving that properly registered voters were H disqualified to vote".

A number of school boys, about 100, had their registration cards withdrawn. The 1st respondent had complained to the Assistant Returning Officer P.W.33 Tsere that under age students had been registered as voters. P.W.33 checked the I admission registers

A as to the age of the students, and withdrew 100 or so registration cards as he found that those students were under-age. Three such students testified. P.W.6 Deogratias admitted he was under-age and 2 others P.W.7 Rebangila and P.W.8 Abdul Razak alleged that they were then over 18 years and of age. All these 3 witnesses gave evidence of B their age themselves. No birth certificate was produced nor were parents or relatives called who could testify as to their dates of birth. In our view both the evidence of age contained in the admission registers and that given by the students themselves was hearsay. In fact no proper evidence of the students' age was established. However, the evidence of age C contained in the admission registers was ante litem, unlike the evidence of age given by the students at the trial. If the appellant had wanted to establish that the students were improperly deprived of their right to vote, it was for him to establish that fact. He had failed to do so. At the highest, two students could perhaps be said to have been so deprived. D That figure could not have affected the election result.

Ground 9 is concerned with the interpretation of section 61(c)(iii) of the Elections Act 1985. The appellant alleged that the judge had erred in its interpretation. It reads:

E 61. The voting at an election shall be conducted in the following manner -

(a) ....

F (b) ....

(c) immediately before the presiding officer or polling assistant delivers a ballot paper to any person -

(i) ....

G (ii) ....

(iii) the number of the voter in the copy of the register of voters or part thereof shall be marked on the counterfoil ...

H There were some 596 counterfoils of ballot papers which were irregular in that the presiding officer had recorded only the serial number of the voter instead of recording 3 numbers i.e. the registration centre number, the constituency number and the voter's serial number. However the Assistant Returning Officer was positive that the irregularity did not affect the I voting as the voters voted in the normal way and he was able "to trace where the voters voted in

A reading the printed number on the counterfoil and then tracing it in the Register of voters as to where it was allocated and if it voted or not". He established in Court that all the 596 voters voted in accordance with the law. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the irregularity was fatal as it offended the provisions of a booklet, called "Guide B to the Presiding Officers on the Election Procedure". The trial judge held that the law applicable was the Elections Act as contained in the provisions of Sec. 61(c)(iii), which provided that what was necessary was "the number of the voter in the copy of the register of voters, or part thereof shall be marked on the counterfoil." Mr. Rutashobya contended that the C words "or part thereof" refer to the register and from there he went on to argue that the number of the voter by itself was insufficient, and that the registration centre number and the serial number must also be marked on the counterfoil. We think that Mr. Rutashobya is in error and we agree with the trial judge that the Elections Act requires only that the D number of the voter be recorded. This ground of appeal also fails.

That would dispose of all the grounds of appeal preferred by the appellant. However Mr. Rutashobya also raised an issue not disclosed in the petition of appeal. He referred to an alleged act of corruption in which one relative of the 1st E respondent by the name of Justina d/o Patric was involved, in respect of the campaign for the 1st respondent. P.W.5 Oswald had testified that, as head of a Ngoma group, he was approached by Justina who allegedly gave him Shs.5,000/= and a gallon of "gongo", an illicit liquor. P.W.5 stated that he met Justina in her house as he was called F there. He was accompanied by among others, R.W.13 John Kijiko, R.W.16 Abdul Rwekaza (Secretary of CCM Branch) and R.W.14 Marco Kahwa, treasurer of his ngoma group. Justina was present and handed Shs.5,000/= to R.W.14 Marco the group treasurer saying that was given by the 1st respondent for the campaign. P.W.5 was the only G witness produced by the appellant concerning that alleged incident.

The 1st respondent denied having had anything to do with that alleged act, and called R.W.13 John, R.W.16 Abdul and R.W.14 Marco, who all denied that there was any such meeting or handing over of money and so on. Justina was not H called.

Mr. Rutashobya has urged before us that the Court must draw an adverse inference from the failure on the part of the 1st respondent to call Justina, as Justina was a very important witness. I

MUSTAFA JA

A We agree that Justina was an important witness, and we are surprised that she was not called. However the other three witnesses called to refute the story of P.W.5 Oswald were also important, as they were alleged by P.W.5 to be with him when the incident took place. Justina was a relative, while these 3 others were not. We think in this case the 1st B respondent had adduced credible and sufficient evidence which the judge accepted and believed to rebut the evidence provided by P.W.5. Each case has to be judged on its own facts, and we are satisfied that in this case, the failure to call C Justina did not call for any adverse inference to be drawn against the 1st respondent.

We were referred to an unreported judgment being C.A. No. 4/82 Abel Mwanga v Elisaph Lima, where because an important and crucial potential witness was not called by Abel Mwanga, the Court drew an adverse inference against D Mwanga. However the facts in that case were different. Mwanga in that case denied knowing the person who was not called, and Mwanga's acquaintance with that person became a matter of prime importance in the course of the trial. There was sufficient evidence adduced which showed that Mwanga knew that person, and the onus was on Mwanga to E refute that evidence. His failure to call that person in the circumstances resulted in the adverse inference being drawn.

In his judgment the trial judge had "assumed" on several occasions. He "assumed" that if, for instance, the 100 students F were improperly prevented from voting, that number should have been taken into account, to the prejudice of the 1st respondent. Based on such "assumptions" he arrived at the figure of 117. He stated, in view of the majority of 370 in favour of the 1st resplondent, even if the 117 votes were taken into account, that would not have affected the results.

G Mr. Rutashobya had, not unnaturally, tried to rely on these "assumptions", as if they were findings of fact. We venture to think that perhaps the trial judge had meant that if he was wrong on certain issues, then the appellant should have had the advantage of 117 votes, and even then, the election results would not have been affected. H

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

MWALUSANYA J
[zJDz]Judgment
A Mwalusanya, J.: The appellant, the Nyabioyonza Rural Primary Cooperative Society Ltd., was successfully sued by the respondent Cosmas s/o Rumanyika at Bukoba R.M.'s Court in a claim of Shs. 18,200/= being arrears of half-salary for the period the respondent was interdicted from service starting from 12/6/1980 to the time of B filing the suit on 16/10/1984. In its written statement of defence the appellant cooperative society has denied that the respondent had been its employee.
The respondent's case at the trial was that on 1/6/1976 he was employed by the Nyabioyonza Farmers Cooperative C Society Ltd. as a Secretary. This cooperative society was allegedly formed by some 13 villages close to Nyabioyonza village in Karagwe District, Kagera Region. It was not long when the aforesaid cooperative society, alongside with other cooperative societies in the country, was dissolved by the government vide GN. 1137 of 1976. The liquidators were D appointed by the government to look after the interests of the employees as well as settling the assets and debts of the defunct cooperative societies. With the demise of the cooperative societies there was a temporary vacuum as to who would handle the peasants' crop for sale to the marketing boards.

E However in due course the problem was solved. There existed villages which were registered under The Villages and Ujamaa Villages (Registration, Designation and Administration) Act No. 21 of 1975. Now some crop marketing boards like Coffee Authority of Tanzania, Tanzania Cotton Authority and National Milling Corporation appointed some of the F registered villages to undertake the duty of crop-buying from the farmers. In the case at hand some 13 registered villages which had earlier comprised the defunct Nyabioyonza Farmers Cooperative Society were appointed agents for buying crops from the farmers by the aforesaid marketing boards. The services of the respondent were retained at a salary of G Shs.700/=. In the course of time the villages which employed the respondent dwindled from 13 villages to five villages - namely Ahakishaka, Nyabioyonza, Bukangaza, Kijumbura and Chamchuzi. On 12/6/1980 the accused was interdicted from employment when he was charged in court for theft of money from his employer vide Karagwe Criminal Case No. H 204/80 (it was later withdrawn and now it is Karagwe Criminal Case No. 64/1984). That case is still pending.

Then came the enactment of the Cooperative Societies Act No. 14 of 1982. By virtue of s. 29(1)(f) of that statute, rural cooperative societies may be formed for the purpose of collecting agricultural products from its members and to deliver I those products

A for sale to the marketing boards. Pursuant to that statute on 5/12/1983 the appellant society, was duly registered as a cooperative society vide registration No. 3584. It was submitted by the respondent that this new cooperative society known as Nyabioyonza Rural Cooperative Society Ltd. comprised all or almost all of the 13 villages which had formed B the cooperative society which was dissolved in 1976. So the respondent submitted that he was in fact in a continuous employment by the same employer from 1/6/1976 to this day. However counsel for the appellant cooperative society Mr. Kahangwa argued that the members of the appellant cooperative society are individual human beings and not villages C vide s. 24 of Act No. 14/1982. And so it was Kahangwa's submission that respondent had not been employed by the same employer but by three distinct employers since 1/6/1976,

Be that as it may, it was the respondent's case at the trial that by virtue of s. 29 of the Security of Employment Act Cap. D 574 (as amended by s. 17 of Act No. 1/1975), he was entitled as of right to half salary from his employer from the day of his interdiction. And he argued that the appellant is his present employer who is liable because he has taken over all the liabilities and assets of the registered villages which had employed him after the dissolution of the former cooperative E society.

The learned trial Resident Magistrate capitulated to that argument of the respondent and held that the appellant cooperative society was indeed liable because under s. 181(g) of the Cooperative Societies Act No. 14/1982, it took over all the assets and liabilities of the former cooperative society. At the hearing of this appeal the respondent conceded F that the trial magistrate was wrong to invoke s. 181(g) because it only talks of inheriting immovable property of the former cooperative societies but not all assets and liabilities. So the judgment of the trial court cannot be supported. G

Undaunted the respondent submitted at the hearing of the appeal as did his counsel Mr. Katabalwa at the trial that s. 181(e) of the Cooperative Societies Act No. 14/1982 holds the new rural cooperative societies liable as they inherit all the employees of the former cooperative societies. This s. 181(e) reads: H

Notwithstanding the provision of s. 180 (which repeals the Cooperative Societies Act No. 27 of 1968), all orders, directions, appointments and other acts and things lawfully made or done under any of the provisions of the Act and in force immediately I before the commencement of this Act shall be

A deemed to have been made or done under the corresponding provisions of this Act and shall continue to have effect accordingly.

As the emphasized words clearly indicate, the appointments which have been saved are only those which were made B under the Cooperative Societies Act No. 27 of 1968. But as amply demonstrated above the appointment of the respondent was not under Act No. 27 of 1968 but under Act No. 21 of 1975, which allowed the formation of registered C villages. And s. 5 of the Muungano wa Vyama vya Ushirika Act No. 9 of 1979 clearly stipulates that registered villages are deemed to be cooperative societies not under the Cooperative Societies Act No. 27 of 1968 but under s. 13 of Act No. 21 of 1975. And in any case I have serious misgivings as to whether the appointments mentioned in s. 181 (e) of D Act No. 14/1982 include employees of the various cooperative societies formed under Act No. 27 of 1968. The most reasonable interpretation would appear to be that the appointments envisaged are only those specifically spelled out by the statute in its provisions e.g. Secretary-General, Registrar, Deputy Registrar, Assistant Registrars, etc. That sufficiently E disposes of the respondent's argument that he was in fact an employee of the appellant cooperative society.

Then the respondent had another arrow in his armoury and he contended that his employment must be taken to be under the cooperative Societies Act No. 27 of 1968 because he was in 'continuous employment' from 1976 to this day. In F fact the Labour officer Mr. Hamisi s/o Mrimi (PW 3) supported him at the trial on that line whereof he cited s. 8A(i)(d) of the Severance Allowance Act No. 81/1962 (Cap. 487), which he said recognised 'continuous employments' of the kind G the respondent had found himself in. However I note that the contention is misconceived. In fact the relevant section is s. 8A (3) which states that where an employee ceases to be in the employment of one employer and enters or is deemed to enter the employment of another employer who takes over the business, the employment of that employee shall be H deemed to be continuous employment by one employer and the last employer will be that one employer who will be liable for the severance allowance demanded.

The short answer to this contention is that the Severance Allowance Act does not lay a general rule as to when an employment can be said to be continuous or not. That provision pertains to the I
A claims of severance allowance only. And in any case the section in question says that the employment shall be deemed to be continuous and not that the employment is in fact continuous. That statute clearly recognizes the naked fact that in the circumstances obtaining here, the employment is not in fact continuous or automatic and hence its use of the word B 'deemed' for the purpose of claims of severance allowance only.
Therefore in my considered opinion, at no time was the respondent an employee of the appellant cooperative society. Let it be noted that the appellant cooperative society is quite distinct from the former respondent's employer (the 13 C registered villages) because its membership is drawn from individual members and not from registered villages. The remedy of the respondent lies in suing the 13 registered villages jointly or severally, because these were his employers. The appellant cooperative society (this time uncooperative society) was not his employer. Therefore this appeal is allowed with costs. D

Chipeta, J.:This is a ruling in respect of objection proceedings. The background of the matter is that sometime in 1983, the plaintiff in these proceedings, A.D. Mashoto, successfully sued one A.H. Kaunga for a principal D sum of Shs. 112,129.20.

Meanwhile, the said A.H. Kaunga, hereinafter referred to as the judgment-debtor, entered into a written agreement with the objector in these proceedings, Fifi M. Fifi, for the sale of the judgment-debtor's house on Plot No. 93, Block G., E Kazeh Hill, Tabora, to the objector for Shs. 200,000/=. The purchase amount was duly paid, and the objector was given possession of the premises as well as the title deed. Besides the judgment-debtor gave the objector another document to enable the objector to transfer the property into his own name. Thereafter, the objector embarked upon the F process of effecting the transfer, a process that is yet, to be finalized.

Some two years later, the plaintiff instituted execution proceedings in execution of his decree against the judgment - debtor and the house in question was attached. Hence these objection proceedings. G

Mr. Kwikima, learned counsel for the plaintiff contended that since the consent to transfer by the Regional Land Officer was yet to be obtained, the property was still that of the judgment-debtor and so is liable to attachment, and that the objector was no more than a mere occupier.

H Mr. Ntabaye, learned counsel for the objector, countered by submitting that since the objector has taken all the necessary steps to effect the transfer and as consent has not been refused, the objector has a claim to the property.

I Since the agreement was with a consideration, and possession of both the property and the title deed passed, it seems to me

A that as long as consent has not been refused the objector has some interest in the property, an interest which, in my opinion, a court of law ought not to disregard with abandon.

I am fortified in this view by a commentary in the Indian Transfer of Property Act by B.B. Mitra (11th Edition) where the B author states:

> But if the contract of sale is followed by delivery of possession and payment of purchase money, then, though there is no registered conveyance, the transaction is more than a mere contract. ... In such a case the vendor cannot say that the buyer has C obtained no interest in the property. Nor can the property be attached as the property of the vendor in execution of a decree against the vendor.

D With respect, I fully associate myself with that statement. To hold otherwise in such cases would be to encourage unscrupulous people to "sell" their properties as many times as their whims would permit.
On these grounds, the objection succeeds. The property in question ought not to be a subject to attachment in execution E of a decree against the judgment-debtor. The attachment thereon shall forthwith be raised. The objector shall have his costs.
Objection succeeds.

F Bahati, J.: This is an appeal by Josephat Lugaimukamu against the judgment and decree of the District Court at Morogoro in which it was decided that the sum of shs.13,000/= plus costs and interest should be paid to the respondent, Father Canute Mzuwanda by the appellant.

G The facts deposed at the trial were that the appellant Josephat Lugaimukamu wanted a loan of shs.13,000/= from Father Mzuwanda the respondent and that Father Mzuwanda paid this sum of shs.13,000/= to the appellant and a document was prepared in which the appellant acknowledges receipt of shs.13,000/= for business purposes and that H every time the appellant makes a sale he would pay 10% interest. Then at the conclusion of the business transaction the shs.13,000/= was to be refunded to the respondent. This was on 1/6/77. According to the evidence of the respondent I this agreement meant that there was a promise to repay the loan plus 10% profit. On 15/2/78 the respondent wrote the appellant asking for repayment of the loan. The appellant replied that he

A would soon pay back. The replies of the appellant were in writing (exhibit P2(a) and P2b). Since no money was forthcoming from the appellant the respondent filed this suit.

The defence denied receipt of any loan. The appellant however said that he was a Director of Morogoro Salt Packing B and Supply Industries Limited which was a private business. The appellant denied also writing exhibit P2(a) and P2(b). He also denied writing the agreement (exhibit P1) which he described as not a legal document because it was unstamped.

The learned trial magistrate found as a fact that the respondent lent shs.13,000/= to the appellant and that it was the C appellant who wrote exhibits P1,P2(a) and P2(b). He however found the interest of 10% to be too high and reduced it to 9% and with that he entered judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of shs.13,000/= plus interest and cost.

D The appellant has appealed against this judgment and decree of the trial Magistrate. At the hearing of the appeal Mr. Muccadam, learned counsel for the appellant applied for, and was granted leave to add, additional grounds to his memorandum of appeal. His additional grounds of appeal were that the document (exhibit P1) was not stamped and E therefore inadmissible and that the respondent had no locus standi in this case. Arguing the appeal, Mr. Muccadam said that the respondent should have brought the suit in the name of the R.C. (Church) Parish because in his evidence he clearly said that the money belonged to the parish. Since he produced no documents before the court that he had the F power of attorney so that he could sue on behalf of the parish, he had no locus standi in the matter according to the learned-counsel. He submitted further that the whole course of action was misconceived. Concerning the document purporting to be the agreement Mr. Muccadam submitted that it was unstamped and as such it was not admissible by G virtue of section 46 of the Stamp Duty Act, 1977. The document was still unstamped to date and it did not even have a signature. The agreement is denied by the appellant and it was not proved that he had written it. Even the other chits (exhibits P2(a) and P2(b) were denied by the appellant. There was no proof of the handwriting on these documents to H be of the appellant. Mr. Muccadam concluded by saying that once these documents are excluded, there is nothing to prove the loan and therefore the appeal should be allowed.

With regard to the question of the identity of the owner of the money, Mr. Haule submitted that the respondent was a I priest who

BAHATI J

A was the principal officer of the church. He also said that the question of locus standi should have been raised at the hearing of the case and not on appeal. He also submitted that since the respondent as principal officer could according to long standing practice deal with the money as he wished, the question of power of attorney did not arise. He went on to B say that the case was proved on the balance of the probabilities by exhibit P1 and P2(a) and P2(b), when these documents are taken together with the oral evidence. He further agreed with the way the trial magistrate dealt with the exhibits. He asked the appeal to be dismissed. In a short reply Mr. Muccadam submitted that since the money did not C belong to the respondent he could not be classified as a recognized agent of the Parish within Order 3 Rule (2) of the Civil Procedure Code. He further submitted that the question of wrong cause of action was obvious on the face of the record and that the court could not allow it to remain so. He also submitted that it was for the plaintiff to prove the D existence of the document as envisaged by s.110 of the Evidence Act and that a court could not rely on a document which was denied by the other party.

I propose to deal with each point raised in this appeal separately. I will at the outset deal first with the point of locus E standi. I can see no force in this argument because the simple answer to it is that in any case the respondent was a special owner of the shs.13,000/= even if the money did not belong to him. In any case this was not an issue before the trial court and it would be rather late now to bring it on appeal. F

With regard to the admissibility of exhibit PI which was the agreement for the loan, the authority cited by Mr. Haule Sunderji Nanji Ltd. v Mohamedali Kassam Bhaloo clearly shows that the respondent should have been given an G opportunity to pay the requisite stamp duty and penalty. Since in this appeal the ruling of the trial court was only in the judgment and the ruling was that no stamp duty was required, the respondent had no opportunity to pay the stamp duty and the penalty.

H There is no doubt but that the ruling by the trial court on the admissibility of the agreement (Exh.PI) was erroneous because section 46 of the Stamp Duty Act 1972 clearly stipulates that under no circumstances may an unstamped document which requires to be stamped be admissible in evidence. This agreement being an agreement in respect of a I loan was no doubt liable to stamp duty in terms of section 42 of the Act. Going by the holding in Sunderji's case cited above what is to be done now is to allow the respondent if he

A so wishes to pay the stamp duty plus the penalty so that exhibit PI may form part of the evidence. Once that is done then the record should be brought back to this Court to determine whether on the strength of that document together with the rest of the evidence on record oral and documentary the learned trial magistrate was correct in coming to conclusion C to which he came. There cannot be any question of sending back the case file to the District Court as was done in Sunderji's case, because in this case the trial magistrate acted on exhibit P1 whereas in Sunderji's case the trial Magistrate did not act on the unstamped document and the file was remitted back to him to consider the evidence of the unstamped document which was made admissible by the payment of the stamp duty by the party who was relying on it. The Registrar of the High Court is to assess the amount of stamp duty payable on exhibit P1 together with the penalty due.

D It is so ordered accordingly, and order as to costs to await final determination of the appeal.
Ordered accordingly,

G Administrative Law - Judicial Review - Prerogative Orders - Mandamus - Conditions to be fulfilled before the order may issue.

-Headnote

H The applicant was one of suspected economic saboteurs. He was arrested in March 1983 and a substantial part of his property valued at Shs.11,675,680/= was seized (excluding beer and Konyagi). He was charged with hoarding property but the special tribunal acquitted him and ordered that the seized property be restored to the applicant. The government I officials involved did not comply with the order hence the application for an order of mandamus to issue.

1986 TLR p74

A Held: (i) Five conditions must be proved in order for an order of mandamus to issue:

(a) the applicant must have demanded performance and the respondents must have refused to perform;

(b) the respondents as public officers must have a public duty to perform imposed on them by statute or any other law but it B should not be a duty owed solely to the state but should be a duty owed as well to the individual citizen;

(c) the public duty imposed should be of an imperative nature and not a discretionary one;

C (d) the applicant must have a locus standi, that is he must have sufficient interest in the matter he is applying for;

(e) there should be no other appropriate remedy available to the applicant;

D (ii) in this application all the five conditions have been proved;

(iii) the applicant deserves an immediate order for redress because the injustice already done to him is substantial and unwarranted.

[zJDz]Judgment

E Mwalusanya,J.: Judicial review is an important weapon in the hands of the judges of this country by which an ordinary citizen can challenge an oppressive administrative action. And judicial review by means of prerogative orders (certiorari, prohibition and mandamus) is one of those effective ways employed to challenge F administrative action. It is my conviction that the courts should not be too eager to relinquish their judicial review function simply because they are called upon to exercise it in relation to weighty matters of state. Equally however it is important G to realise that judicial review is not the same thing as substitution of the court's opinion on the merits for the opinion of the person or body to whom a discretionary decision-making power has been committed. It is for the executive to make administrative decisions. Parliament has empowered the executive to decide what it thinks necessary. It has to make H political and economic judgments. It may make a sound one or a bad one. The courts might have been able to make a better one than the executive made; but it must be remembered that parliament, no doubt for good reason, has not entrusted guidance to the courts.

I In the case at hand we are called upon to exercise judicial review by way of an order of mandamus. The applicant appeared

A in person and fought the case gallantly. The respondents were represented by counsel a State Attorney one Mr. Tendwa. At this juncture it should be pointed out that leave to apply for an order of mandamus was granted by Munyera J. in Misc. Civil Cause No. 14 of 1986. For all that we know mandamus is the procedure whereby a citizen B with sufficient legal interest may apply to the High Court to compel a public officer to perform a public duty entrusted to him. It is said it will be granted if the duty is in the nature of a public duty and especially affects the rights of an individual, provided there is no more appropriate remedy. The person or authority to whom it is issued must be either under a C statutory or legal duty to do something or not to do something; the duty itself being of an imperative nature. From the foregoing discussion it has been said there are few conditions to be proved in order for an order of mandamus to issue. These are:-

D 1. The applicant must have demanded performance and the respondents must have refused to perform.

2. The respondents as public officers must have a public duty to perform imposed on them by statute or any other law but it E should not be a duty owed solely to the state but should be a duty owed as well to the individual citizen.

3. The public duty imposed should be of an imperative nature and not a discretionary one.

4. The applicant must have a locus standi: that is, he must have sufficient interest in the matter he is applying for.

F 5. There should be no other appropriate remedy available to the applicant.

There has been a tendency by some of our judges to regard the above mentioned rules as immutable and fixed. With G respect, that is not true. The law on the prerogative orders is on the move to meet the changes of modern government. What was the position in 1960 as regards the contents of those rules is not the same now. The law has been constantly H changed by judges to see how effectively the law can protect an individual citizen from oppressive administrative actions. Lord Diplock of the House of Lords has soundly reminded us in the case of I.R.C. v Small Business: [1982] A.C. 617 at p.641 that:

I The rules (on prerogative orders) were made by the judges and by judges they can be changed; and so they have been

A over the years to meet the need to preserve the integrity of the rule of law despite changes in the social structure, methods of government and the extent to which the activities of private citizens are controlled by governmental authorities, that have been taking place continuously sometimes slowly, sometimes swiftly, since the rules were originally propounded. Those changes have B been particularly rapid since World War II. Any judicial statements on matters of public law if made before 1950 are likely to be a misleading guide to what the law is today.

C So in England the rules of procedure on prerogative orders has been greatly changed by case-law and some rules have been now embodied in the U.K. Supreme Court Act of 1981.

In Tanzania no rules of procedure have been made by the Chief Justice as he is empowered so to do under s.18(1) of the D Law Reform (Fatal Accidents and Misc. Provisions) Ordinance (Amendment) Act No. 55 of 1968. We follow the common law as developed and expounded by the case-law in England and our Tanzania judges. That is a blessing in disguise for if we had fixed and immutable rules, that would have fettered the judges to develop the law to meet changing E conditions. As it is now the law on prerogative orders is constantly being developed by our judges. They often take relief from decisions of other Commonwealth countries and in this respect the decisions in the 'Law Reports of the F Commonwealth - the section on Constitutional and Administrative Law Reports (Professional Books Ltd.) published since 1985 is useful and commendable. An example of the changing nature of our laws in this field is as follows. For a long time past it was thought that there could be no judicial review by means of prerogative orders for administrative G actions as distinct from judicial and quasi-judicial acts: see Reide J. in Re an Application by Bukoba Gymkhana Club: [1963] E. A. 478 (T); De Souza v Tanga Town Council: [1961] E.A. 377 (C.A.) and Mwesiumo J. in Northern Tanzania Farmers' Coop. Society Ltd. v W.H. Shellukindo: (Merits) [1978] L.R.T. n. 37. However now the H distinction between judicial proceedings and administrative proceedings is gone. The distinction has been "scotched" as a 'heresy' if I may be allowed to use the fine words of Lord Denning in the case of R. v Gaming Board ex-parte Benaim and Khaida: [1970]2 All E.R.528 (C.A.) And in Tanzania the distinction was scotched by the decision of the Tanzania I Court of Appeal in the case of Patman Garments Industries Ltd. v Tanzania

A Manufacturers Ltd: Civil Appeal No. 15 of 1981 (unreported) delivered on 8/3/1982 by Mwakasendo J.A. on behalf of the Court.

It will be seen therefore that our judges have a heavy responsibility in this field to see that the law takes the correct direction that will benefit the individual citizen. That great American judge Benjamin Cardozo in his 'The Nature of the B Judicial Process' has underscored the judge's responsibility when he said:-

That court best serves the law which recognises that the rules of law which grew up in a remote generation may, in the fullness of experience, be found to serve another generation badly, and which discards the old rule when it finds that another rule of law C represents what should be according to the established and settled judgment of society.

D And for Tanzania the role of the judges is particularly pressing as pointed out by the former Chief Justice of Tanzania P.T. Georges in the foreword to the book "The Doctrine of Precedent" T.P.H. (1971) at p.viii that:

E In a society which is changing as rapidly as the Tanzania society of today, lawyers and judges should keep under constant critical examination their basic approach to the process of decision-making. If they stand still while the rest of the society moves, the unhappy result may well be that they will have failed to incorporate into the new pattern of progress the idea that the rule of law has F a necessary place in any community where the equality of all men and their human dignity are greatly valued. Failure in this important task would be a tragedy for the new society. This work is of the greatest importance in helping those engaged in the moulding of the law in this task of critical self-examination. G

Now it will be recalled that in 1984 by the Fifth Constitutional Amendment Act No. 15 of 1984 the Bill of Rights has H been incorporated in our 1977 constitution. The rest of the society has moved forward. So it will be a tragedy if our courts don't mould the rules on prerogative orders to match the changes in our constitution which lean in favour of the protection of individual citizen against an oppressive government. It is in that light that I proceed to discuss the rules of I procedure on mandamus on how they relate to the facts of this case

A The background facts to this case are that in early 1983 the government decided that all suspected economic saboteurs be arrested and their property seized. They were to be tried before special tribunals. For the purpose of carrying on the duty of implementing the policy decision in question there was enacted the Economic Sabotage (Special B Provisions) Acts Nos. 9 and 10 of 1983 which incidently Prof. Issa G. Shivji has described it as a very 'notorious' piece of legislation (see page 12 of his paper 'Notes on the Status of Legal Rights in Tanzania: A Jurisprudential Treatment' one of papers presented at a Seminar to Commemorate 25 years of the Faculty of Law which was held between 20th to 25th C October, 1986 at University of Dar es Salaam). It was the Regional branch of the government that had to decide who were the suspected economic saboteurs. That means that it was the Regional Commissioner and his supporting staff who made the appropriate decisions and the implementation of the Law. As regards the present applicant it is said he was D arrested on 30/3/1983 and some substantial property of his was seized. He was charged with hoarding property before the special tribunal in Case No.9 of 1983 and he was acquitted. That tribunal ordered that the sum of Shs.1,189,871/20 E realised from the sale of 2014 cases of beer be paid to the present applicant in a month's time from the day of judgment which was on 27/8/1984. The tribunal also ordered that the 79 cartons of Konyagi or its value (at the then current price) be paid to the accused within the same period of one month from the date of judgment which was on 27/8/84. But F todate the applicant has not been paid any of those items as ordered by the special tribunal. Concerning the value of the 79 cartons of Konyagi he said they were worth Shs.568,800/= (the value of Shs.7,200/= per carton) and the same has yet to be paid to him.

G Besides the beer and the Konyagi there were other property seized from the applicant but which was not a subject matter of the charge of hoarding in Case No. 9 of 1983. It was a variety of property that was seized and it included cement, lime, kerosine, a generator, a radio-call, pipes, sponge-mattresses etc. which together with the beer and Konyagi the police in their charge sheet of 20/5/83 estimated the property to be valued at Shs.10,000,000/=. But applicant H submitted at the hearing of this application that the property seized was worth Shs.11,675,680/= excluding the beer and the Konyagi.

I Again the applicant told this court that in February and May, 1984 a number of house-hold goods were taken away from his house

A by the government and he said these were worth Shs.5,000,000/=. He prays this court to order payment of the same to him.

Then again he stated that at the same relevant period some ten vehicles of his were impounded and grounded at Oyster B Bay Police Station Dar es Salaam pursuant to an order issued by Regional Commissioner of Kagera that applicant was an economic saboteur facing criminal charges in Bukoba. When he was acquitted the vehicles were returned to him but a number of spare parts had been stolen from them. He said that the stolen spare parts were worth Shs.14,948,365/=. He prayed this court to order payment to him that sum the equivalent value of the stolen spare parts. C

The applicant also stated that the government officials had seized and used his house for one year from May, 1983 to 4/5/1984. It is said the house was occupied by some policemen. The applicant prays to the court to order payment to him a reasonable compensation for the use of his house by the government agents. D

All in all the applicant asked the return of his seized property or compensation in lieu of the same. He estimated the value of his claim to be Shs.33,123,980/65.

On the other hand the two respondents through their State Attorney Mr. Tendwa made a feeble resistance to the claim. E They did not file any counter-affidavit. However Mr. Tendwa made an oral submission stating that the respondents were ready to pay Shs.1,435,112/70 to applicant which is lying in the suspense account of National Bank of Commerce in Bukoba. He said that, that sum represented the beer sold (being Shs.1,189,870/20 as ordered by the special tribunal) F and some money realised from the sale of cement and kerosine. Then Mr. Tendwa conceded that his clients had seized a lot of property as per the list which is an annexture to the chamber application but they cannot account for the same. G They cannot tell if all the seized property was sold and if it was sold they cannot tell how much was realised and if there is any money they cannot tell where it is lying. If I may be allowed to interpose here, it beats my comprehension if what Mr. Tendwa told this court is true as to how such very high government official had the temerity to inform the court the way H they did notwithstanding the fact that both the Regional Commissioner and Regional Police Commander are new to that station. I cannot imagine any better example of the height of irresponsibility and the utter disregard to the rights of an I individual citizen whom they are supposed to serve. Be that as it may, concerning the house of the applicant, the respondents through their counsel denied that it was converted to government use for a

A year. Concerning the property allegedly seized in February and May, 1984 which the applicant said it was worth sh.5,000,000/= the respondents denied to have had seized it. As regards the stolen spare parts from the applicant's vehicles the respondents through their counsel denied responsibility on the ground that the same were lost through the B negligence of the police of Oyster Bay Police Station of Dar es Salaam and not Kagera Region. All in all the respondents admitted liability only for sh.1,435,112/70 representing the value of beer and some cement and kerosine.

Now let us see if the applicant has succeeded to prove the five elements which ought to be proved if an order of C mandamus is to issue. The first condition to be met is that the applicant must have demanded performance and the respondents must have refused to perform. This condition is a non-issue in this case, as it is conceded by the respondents that the applicant has demanded for his things since late 1984 but up to this day, he has not been given the D same. There are numerous letters to the respondents and other arms of the government whereof the applicant demanded to be given back his property but the prayers landed on deaf ears. Even if the demand for performance is made to the successors in office it is o.k. as pointed out by the East African Court of Appeal in the case of D.C. of Kiambu ex-parte E Ethan Njau [1960] E.A. 109 C.A. which cited the English case of R. v Mayor of Rochester (In the Parish of Strood) 119 E.R. 1490. In here the demand for performance was made to successors in office and that was proper. Therefore the first condition has been met without any controversy. F

The second element to be proved is that the respondents as public officers must have a public duty to perform imposed on them by statute or any other law but it should not be a duty owed solely to the state but should be a duty owed as well to the individual citizen. For example in Kenya in the case of Re Application by Mwau [1985] L.R.C. (Const.)444 G Simpson C.J. held that an order of mandamus could not issue against the Principal Immigration Officer to return a passport to the owner because under the Kenya Immigration Act, Cap 172 the duty to issue and withdraw passports is given to the Minister of Home Affairs and not the Principal Immigration Officer who merely acts on the instructions of the H Minister. Mandamus does not lie to a public officer who is acting purely as agent of the state for a duty owed to the state and not to the individual citizen. This is because the granting of mandamus would be tantamount to giving relief I against the government which could not have been obtained in proceedings against the government

MWALUSANYA J

A under the Government Proceedings Act No. 16 of 1967. In this respect Wade and Bradley in their book Constitutional Law 7th Ed. (1965) Longmans at p.664 state:-

The order does not lie against the Crown. If a government department is acting as agent of the Crown and is responsible only to B the Crown having no duty to the subject in the matter, it is not amendable to the orders of the court in the exercise of its prerogative jurisdiction in granting or refusing it.

C And the following passage from Judicial Review of Administrative Action by S.A. de Smith (2nd Ed. p. 462 was cited with approval by Goudie J. of the High Court of Uganda in the case of Shah v A.G. of Uganda (No.3): [1970] E.A. 543, he said:

D In mandamus cases it is recognised that when a statutory duty is cast upon a Crown servant in his official capacity and the duty is one owed not to the Crown but to the public any person having a sufficient legal interest in the performance of the duty may apply to the Courts for an order of mandamus to enforce it. Where however a duty has been directly imposed by statute for the benefit of E the subject upon a Crown servant as persona designata and the duty is to be wholly discharged by him in his own official capacity, as distinct from his capacity as an adviser to or instrument of the Crown, the Courts have shown readiness to grant applications F for mandamus by persons who have a direct and substantial interest in securing the performance of this duty. It would be going too far to say that whenever a statutory duty is directly cast upon a Crown servant that duty is potentially enforceable by mandamus G on the application of a member of the public for the context may indicate that the servant is to act purely as an adviser to or agent of a Crown, but the situations in which mandamus will not lie for this reason alone are, it is thought, comparatively few.

H Like Gourdie J. I adopt the reasoning in the above extract.

And it has also been pointed out that mandamus does not lie against a public officer as a matter of course. The courts are reluctant to direct an order of mandamus against executive officers of a government unless some specific act or thing which the I law requires

MWALUSANYA J

A to be done has been omitted. In this respect Mr. Prem in his work Law of Writs in India, England and America 2nd Ed. at p. 385 tells us that:

Courts should proceed with extreme caution for the granting of the writ which would result in interference by the judicial B department with the management of the executive department of the government. The courts will not intervene to compel action by C an executive officer unless his duty to act is clearly established and plainly defined and the obligation to act is premptory.

That is the statement on the law as regards the second element for the granting of an order of mandamus.

In the case at hand, concerning the 2nd respondent (the R.P.C.) there can be no doubt that there is a clearly defined D public duty cast upon him under the Police Force Ordinance Cap 322 first to the state and also to the individual citizens. He is empowered to arrest offenders and send them to court. After the finalisation of the case he is obliged to return the E seized goods to those who have been cleared by the courts. The police officer has an obligation and not a discretion to return the seized goods to the owner once he has been acquitted in court and no other charges are envisaged against him.

As regards the 1st respondent (the R.C.) it could be argued that ordinarily no public duty is cast upon him by law of F arresting offenders and seizing their goods and then returning the goods to the owners who have been cleared by the courts. However if we consider the implementation of the relevant legislation that is the Economic Sabotage (Special Provisions) Acts no. 9 and 10 of 1983 it will be found that its implementation was equally cast upon the regional branch G of the government. The regional authorities under the R.C. would sit down and decide who was the suspected economic saboteur and then instruct the police officers to arrest the suspect and seize his goods. The suspect would then be sent for trial at the special tribunal. It will be seen therefore that under the relevant legislation the R.C. had a heavy H hand in the arrest and seizure of the goods of the suspected saboteurs and so he is equally obliged to have a heavy hand in the return of the goods to the suspects who have been cleared by the courts. If the R.C. found that the acquittal, was I against the weight of evidence, he could advise the government to nationalise the seized goods on payment of compensation. In

A fact the Kagera R.C. once used that weapon in case of vehicles of a certain suspect who was acquitted by the court, and he accordingly advised the government to nationalise the vehicles. The government conceded and by virtue of the Kagera Transport Assets (Acquisition and Regrant) Act No.1 of 1984 the vehicles in question were nationalised but the B owners were to be paid full, fair and adequate compensation. That shows how the R.C. had a hand in the matters and therefore he is equally duty bound to see to it that the innocent victims get their seized goods as soon as possible.

If there is any doubt as to the obligation of the law enforcement agencies and other members of the executive branch of C the Government in returning the seized goods to the suspects who have been cleared by the courts I wish to point to Article 17(2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948 which provides that no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property. By Article 7(1) of our Constitution as amended by Act No. 15 of 1984 the government and all D it is agencies having executive, legislative or judicial functions are obliged to take into account and implement all the provisions of Part II of the 1st Chapter of the Constitution which includes the Universal Declaration of Human Rihts of 1948 as provided by Article 9(f) of our Constitution. The Tanzania C. J. F.L. Nyalali in his address on the 'Bill of E Rights' to Law Society of the University of Dar es Salaam published in the Daily News of 7th September, 1985 said inter alia on effect of Article 7(1) of the Constitution:

F It can thus be said that although the failure by any person or state organ to observe any of the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights will not attract legal censure or invalidation by courts, I have no doubt that the courts are required to G be guided by it in applying and interpreting the enforceable provisions of the Constitution and all other laws.

It goes without saying that the R.C. and R.P.C. were duty bound in performing their duties to be guided by the provisions H of the Universal Declaration on Human Rights which includes the duty not to arbitrarily deprive someone of his property. And I may also point out that in our Bill of Rights in our Constitution under Article 24 the right to property is guaranteed and can only be taken away by law providing adequate compensation. Although justiciability of the Bill of I Rights comes into force on 16/3/1988, yet the implementation of the provisions of the Bill of Rights by every

MWALUSANYA J

A organ of the government started on 1/3/1985 by virtue of Act No. 16 of 1984. And so the R.C. and the R.P.C. had and still have an obligation in law to return the seized goods or its value to the owners.

It cannot be said that the duties which were cast upon the R.C. and R.P.C. by the law on economic saboteurs were owed solely to the state. They had a duty as well to perform which they owed to the affected individual citizens. The B situation here is analogous to the facts in the case of Shah v A.G. Uganda (Supra) where it was held that the Treasury Officer in his duties of making payments out of the State Coffer was not acting simply in his capacity as a servant of the state for a duty owed solely to the state but was also acting on the fulfilment of the duties cast upon him to the affected C citizen who had a right to payment from the government funds by a decree of a court as a decree holder. And so an order of mandamus was issued. And a similar case from England to the same effect is the case of R. v Commissioners for Special Purposes of the Income Tax (1888) 21 Q.B.D. 313 (per Lord Esher at p. 317) which held that mandamus D will lie to compel a Treasury Officer to make payments to a citizen who had sufficient interest - in here it was a refund to a taxpayer who had overpaid tax. Now in the same breath, in the case at hand I am satisfied that the two respondents E have a legal duty to the aggrieved citizens who have been cleared by the courts to have the seized property returned to them.

Now the third condition that has to be fulfilled in order for mandamus to issue is that the public duty imposed on the public officer should be of an imperative nature and not a discretionary one. And the learned author Dr. Peter A. F Oluyede in his book of Administrative Law in East Africa (1973) E.A. Literature Bureau at p. 192 quotes the decision of the former Chief Justice of Tanzania Mr. Justice P.T. Georges in the case of In the Matter of an Application by G Mohamed Aslam Khan: Misc. Civil Cause No. 22 of 1966 (unreported) as authority for the preposition that there can be no order of mandamus for a discretionary duty. In that case Georges C.J. refused to issue an order of mandamus to compel police officers to prosecute trespassers on somebody's land on the ground that the police were exercising a H discretion. It was said the police had a discretion of prosecuting an offender or not prosecuting him. However on my part I do not agree with Dr. Peter A. Oluyede that the case turned out on the matter of discretion. All it decided was that a charge of criminal trespass cannot arise until the ownership of the land is clearly established in a civil court. A bonafide I belief that the accused is asserting a claim of right to

MWALUSANYA J

A property that belongs to him (though mistaken) is a complete defence to the charge of criminal trespass - see Saidi J. in Saidi Juma v R. [1968] H.C.D. n.158 and Mapigano J. in the case of R. v Mohamed s/o Salehe: [1975] L.R.T. n.32. Therefore all what Georges C.J. decided in that case was that an order of mandamus could not issue because the B charge of criminal trespass could not mature until first the question of ownership of land was established in a civil case.

On the question as to whether the police have a discretion or not to prosecute offenders I would prefer to follow the C decision of the Court of Appeal of England in the case of R. v The Commissioner of Metropolitan Police ex parte Blackburn: [1968] 2 Q.B.118(C.A.). Lord Denning held in that case that in the carrying out of the duty of enforcing the law the police have a discretion whether to prosecute or not with which the courts would not interfere; but that if the D police are guilty or persistent and serious failure to ensure that the law is enforced in relation to any significant part of the law an order of mandamus will issue. This is because failure to act would be an abuse of the discretion cast upon them. So the position in law today is that the courts will intervene by an order of mandamus where there is an abuse of a E discretion; but the court will not dictate the decision but will compel the officer to hear and determine the matter in accordance with the law. And in this regard I find that Sir Kenneth O'Connor C.J. correctly stated the law in this field in F the Kenyan case of ex parte J.C. Patel (1954) 27 K.L.R. 140. In that case the Principal Immigration Officer refused an entry permit to an applicant because he was satisfied that the said applicant was not a 'person intending to carry on a trade, business or profession other than a prescribed profession, on his own account in the Colony'. In an application for an order of mandamus it was argued on behalf of the Principal Immigration Officer that mandamus will not issue to G enforce the performance of a statutory duty, the performance or non-performance of which is a matter of discretion. However Sir Kenneth O'Connor C.J. on behalf of the court stated that while it was true that the court cannot dictate the H decision in a matter in which a discretion to decide is conferred by a statute, yet in such cases mandamus will go to the body to compel it to hear and determine according to law. Therefore the existence of a discretion is no longer a bar to issuing an order of mandamus. In the case at hand there is no contention that the two respondents were exercising a discretion which they have under the law. On my part I find that it is crystal clear that the two respondents have a public I duty of an

MWALUSANYA J

A imperative nature to return the seized goods to the owners. The two respondents have no power to nationalize the goods. If it is argued that they had a discretion to decide as to what next step to take, I would answer that, that is an abuse of a discretion, because they have been dilly-dallying for the past two years and half without any action; and so they cannot any longer be allowed to continue to abuse their discretion if any. B

The fourth condition which must be met if an order of mandamus is to issue is that the applicant must have a locus standi: that is he must have sufficient interest in the matter he is applying for. In the case at hand there is no controversy that the applicant has sufficient interest in the matter because it was his property that had been seized by the two C respondents. He is therefore not a mere crank or busybody. However at this juncture it will not be out of place to make certain observations as regards the trend of the law in this field. There are two Schools of though on the matter. One D school of thought takes the narrow view and it is represented by the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Gouriet v Union of Post Office Workers and Others: [1978] A.C. 435. This school holds that only the plaintiff with an interest in the subject matter can sue but no other citizen as a member of the public can do that. In short the plaintiff E must have a private right or must suffer a damage peculiar to him. It is argued that it should be so to avoid liability of the respondents to an indeterminate number of people. The other school of thought to which I subscribe takes a liberal or F extended doctrine of locus standi; and the same was taken by Lord Denning in the Court of Appeal in England in the case of Gouriet v The Union of Post Office Workers (supra) and more recently by the Court of Appeal in New Zealand in the case of Finnigan v New Zealand Rugby Football Union (Incorporated) [1986] L.R.C. (Const.) 877 G by Cooke J. This school stands for the proposition that a member of the public can impugn an important decision affecting the nation as a whole i.e. of national and public interest, though it does not personally affect him. However it is said the matter must have a national or international implications. This school of thought can be supported on policy and H legal grounds. On policy grounds it is a useful doctrine because public interest litigation is for the benefit of the whole community at large. On legal grounds it cannot be accepted that respondents may be liable to an indeterminate number of people, because the courts are there to exercise control of the unruly horse. As Lord Denning pointed out in the case I of Enderby Town Football Club v The F.A. [1971] 1 All E.R.215 that:

A With a good man in the saddle, the unruly horse can be kept in control. It can jump over obstacles. It can leap fences put by fictions and come down on the side of justice.

Therefore there is no reason as to why we should stick to the narrow school of thought which denies protection to large B section of the community.

Lastly the fifth condition that has to be met in order to secure an order of mandamus is that the applicant should have no other remedy. It is said that when there is no specific remedy, the court will grant a mandamus that justice may be done. C So it is argued that mandamus does not lie against a public officer as a matter of course and as of right. For example in Re an Application by the A.G. of Tanganyika [1958] E.A. 482 (K) Cram Ag. J. held that prerogative orders will not issue if there is a statutory remedy by way of appeal. And in Tanganyika a similar stand was taken by Lowe J. in the D case of In Re Patel, (1956) 2 T.L.R.(R) 227. And the learned author Dr. Peter A Oluyede in his work Administrative Law in East Africa (1973) E.A.L.B. at p.192 holds similar views expressed above and finds support in the decision of the former Chief Justice of Tanzania P.T. Georges in the case of An Application by Mohamed Aslam E Khan Misc. Civil Cause No. 22 of 1966 (unreported). However on my part I would prefer the view of judge of the High Court of Kenya, Chanan Singh J. in the case of Shah Vershi Deushi & Co. Ltd. v The Transport Licensing Board: [1971] E.A. 289 (K). In there he held that the existence of a right of appeal is only a factor to be taken into F account in the exercise of the discretion and cannot be a bar to an application. In Tanganyika a similar stand was taken by Sir Ralph Windham C.J. in the case of Re an Application by Fazal Kassam (Mills) Ltd: [1960] E.A. 1002 (T). G Therefore in the case at hand even if it may be said that the applicant has an alternative remedy of an ordinary suit or action in damages, I would hold that, that factor is only one point to be taken into account in exercising my discretion as to whether I should issue an order of mandamus or not.

H It may be argued and in my view very correctly so, that the applicant has no alternative remedy at all. The right to damages by a suit against the government is illusory and is as good as zero. As rightly argued by Mr. Michael K.B. Wambali a suit against the government requires the written consent of the Minister for Justice, and such consent may not I be forthcoming. Mr. Wambali has argued in his paper 'The enforcement of the Bill of Rights against the

A Government', which was one of the papers presented at a Seminar held between 20th to 25th October, 1986 to Commemorate the Silver Jubilee of the Faculty of Law of the University of Dar es Salaam at pp. 3-4 that:

B The intricacy comes because, the overall effect of the requirement is to request the government to allow itself being sued in an open court over breaches of fundamental rights which very often might be touching very sensitive state matters, which in most cases might sound politically justifiable. Thus in most cases, the Minister would most likely defend State interests at the prejudice C of an individual interest, to bring the matter in an open court of law on the basis of the Bill of Rights. The Minister could easily make use of Article 30 (1) of the Constitution which puts a proviso to the enforcement of individual rights that they may be overrode in public interest. D

And so the Minister of Justice may refuse consent for what he considers to be public interest; and he may do so for any other reason he thinks fit. So a suit against the government is a great risk, and one does not wish to run the hazard of E such action.

However as I stated earlier my stand is that even if there is an alternative remedy, that is only a factor to be taken into account in my exercise of the discretion entrusted upon me. Now how should I exercise the discretion? A helpful guide F can be gathered from the observations made by Gourdie J. of the High Court of Uganda in the case of Shah v A.G. of Uganda (No.3): (supra) where at pp.550 - 551 he said:

G I have been unable to find many English authorities on the principles which the Court should adopt in deciding whether or not to exercise a discretion in favour of mandamus, assuming that there may be a discretion in this case. The English courts are always loath to 'crib and confine' the exercise of a discretion. Viewed broadly however, I see no reason to disagree with an American H Court statement of principles to the effect that the court should take into account 'a wide variety of circumstances, including the exigency which calls for the exercise of its discretion, the consequences of granting it, and the nature and extent of the wrong or I injury which would follow refusal... and it may be granted or refused

A depending on whether or not it promotes substantial justice - see the case of People v Board of Education of City of Chicago 323 U.S. 733.

Now applying the principles enunciated above which I adopt I find that this is a fit case which loudly cries for exercising B the discretion in favour of the applicant. The applicant has been deprived a substantial part of his property since he was acquitted by the special Tribunal on 27/8/1984. It is now two years and half that the respondents have denied him a C redress. Indeed he has been greatly wronged. I hold that he deserves an immediate order for redresss, because the injustice already done to him is substantial and unwarranted. I will accordingly issue an order of mandamus.

Finally I note that the applicant has inter alia claimed some special damages for the wrong done to him. For example he D claims damages of Shs.14,948,365/= for the alleged spare parts of his vehicles that were stolen; and he also claimed damages for the use of his house by the government. These claims are improper as this is not the appropriate forum. Those claims should be a subject of a separate suit in an ordinary action for damages. An order of mandamus can only E be made for the return of the seized goods for compensation for the value of the same. And as regards the claim of Shs.5,000,000/= for domestic items allegedly seized in February and May, 1984 I do not find it proved that it was so. That should be a subject of a separate suit as well.

F I would order that the respondents should immediately hand over to the applicant his goods that were seized as listed on annexure A to the summons of Chamber application or if they don't have the goods they should pay him the value of the same which is Shs.11,675,680/=; they should pay him his beer and kerosine or their value Shs.1,435,112/00 which is G allegedly lying in the suspense account of N.B.C. Kagera; and they should also give him his 79 cartons of Konyagi or pay him Shs. 568,800/= the value of the seized Konyagi. Consequently the applicant is to be given by the two respondents all the mentioned goods and if they are not there, they should pay him the total value of Shs. 13,679,592/70. H An order of mandamus to issue accordingly. The application is allowed with costs.

I Application allowed.

C The plaintiff sued the defendant claiming arrears of salary. The suit was dismissed on a preliminary point that it was time-barred. On appeal the plaintiff contended that the lower court erred in that it non-directed itself to an D acknowledgement that had been made by the defendant employer. E Held: by virtue of s.28(4) of the Law of Limitation Act, 1971, no acknowledgement shall be operative for the purposes of s.27 if it is made after the expiration of the period of limitation prescribed for the proceeding in respect of the right of action to which the acknowledgement relates.

[zJDz]Judgment
G Mapigano, J.: This is a claim for arrears of salary. The learned resident magistrate dismissed the suit on the preliminary point that it was time-barred, citing the provisions of Order 7 rule 6 of the Civil Procedure Code, section 3(1) of the Law of Limitation Act, 1971 and article 7 of the First Schedule to that Act. The plaintiff Alfons Mohamed Chilumba is dissatisfied and has lodged this appeal, contending that the learned magistrate erred in that he non-directed H himself to an acknowledgement that had been made by the defendant employer on 15 June 1984. It is common ground that the period of limitation in relation to this action is six years.
I In my view the learned magistrate cannot be faulted. Order 7 rule 6 C.P.C. provides that where the suit is instituted after the

A expiration of the period prescribed by the law of limitation, the plaint shall show the ground upon which exemption from such law is claimed. In other words, where but for some ground of exemption from the law of limitation, a suit would prima facie be barred by limitation, it is necessary for the plaintiff to show in his plaint such ground of exemption. B If no such ground is shown in the plaint, it is liable to be rejected under rule 11(c) of the same Order.

Similar provisions are to be found in the Indian Code of Civil Procedure and the two learned commentators Chitaley and Rao make the following observation:

C The plaintiff will not be allowed to show the ground of exemption at the trial by putting in evidence any documents such as acknowledgements of liability. But the Court may, save in exceptional circumstances, allow the plaint to be amended by making the necessary allegations. It is sufficient that the ground of exemption is apparent on the face of the plaint. It is not necessary that D the plaint should specifically, and in so many words, claim the ground of exemption.

E I like and will adopt this exposition. I am not quite satisfied that acknowledgement as a ground of exemption from the law of limitation is sufficiently pleaded or shown in the plaint in this case. And for the reason I am going to give presently, it would have been pointless for the learned magistrate to allow the plaint to be amended in that regard. F

By the appellant's own pleading, vide para 7 of the plaint, his employment with the respondent was determined on 30 October, 1977. I take that as the date on which the cause of action arose i.e. the date from which the period of limitation G started to run. He instituted the proceeding on 28 June, 1984 i.e. over six and half years after the accrual of the cause of action. As observed, he now contends that the period of limitation should commence from 15 June 1984 the date on H which the respondent wrote him a letter marked annexure K, which he describes as an acknowledgement of the claim.

We should advert to the provisions of the Law of Limitation Act, 1971. Under section 27(3) of that Act, where a right of action has accrued to recover a debt or the pecuniary claim and the person liable or accountable therefore acknowledges I the claim, the right of action in respect of such debt or pecuniary claim is deemed to have accrued on, and not before, the date of the acknowledgement.

A However, by section 29(4) of the Act, no acknowledgement shall be operative for the purposes of section 27, if it is made after the expiry of the period of limitation prescribed for the proceeding in respect of the right of action to which the acknowledgement relates.

The letter in question strikes me as vague. Quite possible that it contains a sufficient acknowledgement within the meaning B of section 27 of the Law of Limitation Act. Even so, it is ineffectual under law, for it is evident that at the date the said acknowledgement was made, the 15 June 1984, the claim so acknowledged had already become barred by time with effect from 30 October, 1983.

C In the circumstances I am constrained to uphold the decision of the lower court and dismiss the appeal. As the respondent did not appeal I make no order as to costs.

Appeal dismissed. D

Miss Mlaki for the petitioner
[zJDz]Judgment
Luvuba, J.: This is a petition in which the petitioner one Basiliza Gobret Nyimbo is seeking the E marriage to be declared null and void, to be granted custody of the children, maintenance of the children by the respondent and condemnation of the respondent to pay the costs of the proceedings as well as other further reliefs as the court may deem just. As the respondent could not be served in the normal manner, substituted service was effected by F publication in the issue of the daily News. The petition was thus proceeded exparte in proof.
From what I have heard of the petitioner's exparte evidence as well as the petition itself supported by her affidavit, the G historical background of the matter can briefly be stated.

That on 22nd May, 1965 the petitioner went through a Christian Marriage with the respondent at St. Joseph Cathedral Dar es Salaam. That at the time of that marriage H ceremony, the petitioner did not know that the respondent still had a subsisting marriage with another woman. That prior to that marriage the petitioner was made to understand that the previous marriage of the respondent to Alaneja had validly been dissolved. From the marriage with the petitioner, four children were born respectively in 1966, 1969, 1971 and 1973 by the names of Caroline, Antwelukye, Anna and Veri. The originals of the birth certificates' were produced in court for verification. It is further alleged by the petitioner that as from, 1971 on-wards, her I

LUVUBA J

A marriage with the respondent was unfortunately characterised with regular domestic problems and squabbles which according to the petitioner were attributed to the respondent's behaviour of drunkenness and involvement with other women. In such predicament, the petitioner found out from the Registrar of Marriages that the respondent's previous B marriage which had been officiated in a Christian Lutheran Church in Dar es Salaam on 13th December, 1959 had not bee validly dissolved. The said previous marriage of the respondent to one Alaneja Mtekele was purported to have been dissolved before a Kadhi on 8th May, 1965 in Dar es Salaam. With such finding on the part of the petitioner in regard to C the marriage between the respondent and the said Alaneja Mtekele, the petitioner decided to leave the matrimonial home. She has since been living on her own together with three of the children of the marriage as the fourth child has lately been staying with the respondent attending school. On the basis of such evidence, Miss Mlaki learned counsel from D the Tanzania Legal Corporation who appeared for the petitioner argued that as the petitioner at the time of their marriage was not aware of a subsisting marriage, the marriage between the petitioner and the respondent was a nullity. Miss Mlaki's submitted further that prior to the enactment of the Law of Marriage Act, 1971, a civil marriage could only be dissolved validly by the High Court in which case the respondent's purported dissolution of his christian monogamous E marriage before a Kadhi was of no legal validity. The respondent having gone through a ceremony of marriage with the petitioner at a time when there was an existing marriage with Alaneja, such a marriage was a nullity under Section F 38(1)(c) of the Law of Marriage Act, 1971, it was submitted by learned counsel Miss Mlaki. She urged the court to declare the marriage a nullity and grant the custody of the children to the petitioner as well as providing for the maintenance of the children by the respondent. G

In regard to a void ceremony of marriage, section 38 (1)(c) of the Law of Marriage Act, 1971 provides:

H ... A ceremony purporting to be a marriage shall be a nullity if either party is incompetent to marry by reason of an existing marriage.

Kadhi as defined under Section 2 of the Law of Marriage Act, 1971 means a Muslim priest or preacher or a leader of a I Muslim Community who has been licenced under the Act to celebrate

LUVUBA J

A marriages in Islamic form. From this definition, it is quite clear that a Kadhi is properly authorised under the law to officiate in marriages of Islamic form. In other types of marriages he has no power to officiate. In the instant application, B from the ex parte evidence, the marriage of the respondent to Alaneja was Christian in form. Such a marriage could not validly be dissolved before a Kadhi as the respondent purported to do on 8th May, 1965. The purported dissolution was of no legal validity. The marriage and indeed civil marriages as a whole could validly be dissolved at that time by the C High Court as provided for under Section 2 of the Matrimonial Cause Ordinance, Chapter 364, of the Laws which was repealed by the Law of Marriage Act, 1971. In these circumstances, with a futile dissolution of the marriage between Alaneja and the respondent before an improper minister of religion, the Kadhi, the respondent was incompetent to marry D by reason of the said existing marriage. That being a Christian, monogamous marriage, the respondent could not legally undergo another ceremony of marriage as he did with the petitioner on 22nd May, 1965. As rightly submitted by Miss Mlaki, the subsequent marriage of the respondent to the petitioner was therefore in my view, not only void but a nullity on E account of the existing undissolved previous marriage of the respondent to Alaneja.

In the result, from the ex-parte evidence as adduced by the petitioner in addition to her affidavit as well as the submissions made on her behalf, I am inclined to believe that her claim in the matter is sufficiently credible and would F accordingly allow the petition with the following attendant order as prayed:

1. The marriage celebrated between the Petitioner and the respondent on 22nd May, 1965 illegally is declared null and void.

G However, with such finding and the resulting declaration of the marriage as null and void, that would not mean the end as well of the responsibility over the children born of the marriage, on the part of the parents. It is common knowledge H that in any proceedings for divorce, nullity or judicial separation, on conclusion of such proceedings, one aspect of paramount concern to the court is to ensure that satisfactory arrangements are made for the care and welfare of the children born of the marriage until they reach the age of 18. Therefore, the question of the maintenance of the children is I unavoidably the responsibility of the parents and the marriage having

A been a nullity is no valid excuse for evading this onerous task. Section 129 of the Law of Marriage Act 1972, provides specifically on the duty to maintain the children. Under this provision, unless it is otherwise provided by agreement, it is the duty of the father of the children to maintain the children whether such children are in his custody or B the custody of somebody else. In this petition, evidence has been led to show that except for a short period lately when the 3rd born of the marriage has been taken in the custody of the respondent attending school, the rest of the children have otherwise been in the custody of the petitioner.

Consequently, as the petitioner has applied to be granted the C custody of the children, I am satisfied that it is in the interest and welfare of the children to make the following orders as well.

II. Except for Coroline who was born in 1966 and is at liberty to chose, custody of the other children Atwelukye, Anna and Veri is granted to the petitioner with reasonable access to the respondent. D

III. The respondent to pay maintenance for the Children in arrears from 1975 to the date of judgment at the rate of 1,500/= per month and thereafter at the end of every calendar month i.e. 30th through the court. E

IV. The respondent to pay the costs of this petition.

F As for the distribution of the property which was jointly acquired during the purported marriage, such an aspect though it was referred to by the petitioner at the hearing of the petition was however not specifically pleaded and brought out in the petition. This valid though it may well be, is fundamental issue which should be taken up right from the time when the G petition is filed. Among other reasons, this is due to the fact that if a fundamental issue is taken up from the time the petition is initiated the respondent is afforded the opportunity to know of it in advance and in that way he would have H had the chance of raising any defence on the matter if any. I would therefore not pursue it any further at this stage.

Order accordingly. I

Customary Law - Repugnancy to natural justice and public policy - Custom requiring a parent to settle the debts of his adult C independent son - Whether just and in accord with public policy.

-Headnote

The respondent had obtained judgment against the appellant's son. Accordingly, the latter was required to pay 30 bag D s of millet or its equivalent value in money. In settlement of the judgment debt the respondent applied to court for the attachment of the appellant's cattle. The court allowed the application on the basis of a custom said to exist among the Sukuma that a father could be required to settle the debts of his son. Dissatisfied, the appellant appealed to the High Court. E

Held: (i) Before the court applies any customary law, it must first be proved by adducing evidence that such a custom exists and is practiced in the particular area and by the community concerned; in this case no evidence was adduced to F show the existence of the custom whereby a parent is bound to settle the debts of his adult independent son;

(ii) any custom whereby a person is punished or is made to part with his property on account of the independent acts of another adult person is contrary to the principles of natural justice which must override any such custom; G

(iii) the custom alleged in this case also cannot stand for being contrary to public policy which requires every adult to live on his own sweat and to be accountable and responsible for his actions.

Mushi, J.: One Juakali Degula instituted proceedings against one Shipiling Kazungu claiming about 30 bags of a kind of millet called uwele, worth about Shs.1,900/=? Judgment was entered in favour of Juakali to B be given 30 bags of uwele or its equivalent value in money. Shipilingi did not settle the decree and so the decree holder applied to the court for the attachment of the cattle of the judgment-debtor. The Primary Court Magistrate C granted the order to attach the cattle of one Kazungu Lushinge. The attachment order was dully executed and a number of cattle belonging to the appellant, Kazungu Lushinge, were attached. After the attachment, Kazungu complained to the Court in the following terms and I quote from page 2 of the Primary Court Proceedings: of 20/5/81: D

"Kazungu Lushinga: Mdeni - Muhukumiwa ni mtoto wangu. Kwa wakati huu anajitegemea anao watoto na kazi anayofanya kupokea mshahara na kupeleka kwake. Ng'ombe zilizokamatwa ni zangu mdeni Mhukumiwa yeye hausiki". E

After this complaint, the Primary Court correctly commenced objection proceedings by serving notices on the other parties and hearing date was fixed. On the date set for hearing the objector gave evidence in which inter alia stated and I quote:- F

SM 1:Kazungu Lishinge, Miaka 50, Msukuma -Amethibitishwa: Mdeni mhukumiwa ni mtoto wangu alikuwa akifanya kazi kwa mdai - mhukumiwa. Kazi hiyo alikuwa walipeana wenyewe wakati mdeni-mhukumiwa kwangu alikuwa katoka na alikuwa na G wake na watoto wake. Mdeni - mhukumiwa mshahara alikuwa akitumia peke yake na familia yake. Baadaye wamegombana na kushtakiana na sikuelewa kesi hiyo. Mara nimeshtukia ng'ombe wangu wanawagwa hapo nyumbani. Mimi sikuwa na kosa na H mdai - mhukumiwa. Hapo mimi nilishangaa sana.

Also at the same hearing the judgment-debtor - Shipilingi Kazungu stated and I quote: I

A Mdeni-Mhukumiwa:- Shipilingi Kazungu, miaka 26, Msukuma - Amethibitishwa: Ng'ombe waliokamatwa sio zangu. Haitoshi kwa mzee (Mpingaji) nimehama kuanzia mwaka 1975 na kuwa na mji wangu. Nikiwa na mji wangu mdai-Mhukumiwa, alinijia kwenda kufanya kazi kwake. Nimefanya kazi kwake hadi 1979 an kuomba pesa zangu. Kwa wakati huo nilikuwa nikichukua B kidogo kidogo idadi sasa niliyokuwa nikidai ni Shs.2,000/=. Mara nilianza kudai naye akisema angenipa. Nilienda hata kwa balozi. Mara mdai-mhukumiwa aliniwahi kunishtaki Mahakamani.

C After hearing the evidence as to the ownership of the attached cattle, the Primary Court made a finding on the objection raised by the objector. The Primary Court rejected the complaint without deciding on the ownership of the cattle. The Primary Court dwelt on the number of cattle attached which was not an issue at least in accordance with the D court records. The principal issue was whether the cattle which were attached belonged to Kazungu Lushinge or to judgment-debtor. The objector appealed against the Primary Court decision to the District Court. The District Court decision was that the appeal had no merits because, although the cattle belonged to the appellant as the judgment debtor E was his son, he had the obligation customarily to settle the debt of his son. The whole judgment is very short and for easy reference I reproduce it here and it reads:

F AMRI "Haya ni maombi ya kukataa kukamatiwa mali: Mjibu rufani Shipilingi s/o Kazungu alidaiwa na mjibu rufani Juakali Degula madai ya magunia 30 ya mawele thamani shs.1,900/= na alihukumiwa kushindwa, na baada ya kushindwa kulipa, mdai alikaza G hukumu na ng'ombe 15 zilikamatwa toka kwa Boma la mpingaji Kazungu s/o Lushinge. Ushahidi uliotolewa unaonyesha kuwa mdaiwa ni mtoto wa mpingaji na ng'ombe zilizokamatwa ni za baba wa mdaiwa, na kwa kufuata mila na desturi ya Wasukuma mtoto akidaiwa deni hulipwa na baba yake, na kwa kuwa mila hiyo inatumika katika sehemu hii na inakubalika, H ingawa ng'ombe zilizokamatwa ni za baba wa mdaiwa, naona rufaani haina msingi na inakataliwa, na gharama zote ni juu ya .....".

A Haki ya kuomba rufani katika Mahakama Kuu imeelezwa.

(Sgd). G.B. Kajuna

HAKIMU (W) 29/1/82

B It is against this decision that the objector/appellant is appealing against the District Court decision. Among the grounds of appeal which I consider most relevant are grounds Nos. 1 and 6 which read as follows:-

C 1. Mdai alichukua kwangu ng'ombe 15 bila mimi kuwa na kesi na wala mdai tulikuwa hatudaiani naye.

6. Hakimu alionekana kuingiza mambo ya mila eti kuwa kwa vile ni mtoto wangu mimi ninaweza kurudisha madai yake. Sijui kama ubaguzi huo ulikuwa wa kweli na haki.

D There are two questions to be considered and they are:-

1. Who is the owner of the cattle which were attached in execution of the attachment warrant to settle the decree in which Shipilingi Kazungu/judgment - debtor was a party? E

2. Does a parent of an adult child have any legal obligation to settle his/her child's debts incurred while leading an independent and separate life?

F The answer to the first question is not difficult to get. It is already stated above that the Primary Court Magistrate did not decide the issue. The District Court decision clearly states that the cattle which were attached belonged to the appellant. This conclusion is correct even though the learned District Magistrate did not discuss the evidence. The fact is G that both the appellant and judgment - debtor stated that the cattle belonged to the appellant and there was no other believable evidence to the contrary. Quite correctly therefore the evidence established that the attached cattle belonged to the appellant.

H Regarding the second question although the learned District Magistrate found that the cattle belonged to the appellant, he nevertheless found that the appellant was legally bound to settle the debt of his son in accordance with Sukuma customary law. Although I have reproduced the whole District Court judgment, the relevant portion reads: I

MUSHI J

A "Ushahidi uliotolewa unaonyesha kuwa mdaiwa ni mtoto wa mpingaji na ng'ombe zilizokamatwa ni za baba wa mdaiwa, na kufuata mila na desturi ya Wasukuma - mtoto akidaiwa deni hulipwa na baba yake, na kwa kuwa mila hiyo inatumika katika sehemu hii na inakubalika, ingawa ng'ombe zilizokamatwa ni za baba wa mdaiwa, naona rufani haina msingi ....." B

This is a bold statement with far reaching consequences. It is unfortunate that the learned magistrate did not state the C source and authority of this bold assertion. There is no evidence on record of the existence of such customary law. The courts are to apply the customary laws applicable to a particular community at a particular place but before the court applies the custom it must be proved by evidence that such custom exists and it is practiced by those concerned. In this D case, the appellant has protested right from the Primary Court that he has no legal obligation to settle the debts of his adult son who is leading an independent life. The appellant stated that judgment-debtor had his own homestead with wives and children and that the judgment-debtor was employed and earning his own living. Judgment-debtor confirmed E that he had his own homestead and he was earning money for himself. In his petition of appeal ground No. 6 which I have quoted above, the appellant has challenged the existence for such custom its truth and fairness. As the learned District Magistrate's judgment was not supported by any evidence nor did it disclose the source of his assertion, the F challenge posed by the appellant cannot be answered from the judgment. There is therefore no evidence at all that a parent is legally obliged to settle the debts of his adult independent son. Even if, it had been established that such custom, ever existed, the answer to the second question would still be in the negative. This is so because to punish a person or to G make him part with his property on account of another adult person whether such adult is a son of the person so punished would be repugnant to the principles of natural justice and contrary to public policy. By public policy I mean H that it is the declared policy of this nation, and indeed it is the practice of any civilized community that every person and more so, every adult should live on his own sweat and should be accountable and responsible for his acts. Fortunately this court has on several occasions dealt with similar points. One of these cases was Mwanza High Court I Miscellaneous Criminal Cause No.22 of 1984. (unreported). In this case I said and I quote from pages 2 and 3:

MUSHI J

A "It is unimaginable that a person can legally be forced to part with his property for an act he has not done but done by another person".

Again on page 3 of the same judgment I said: B

"This is not the first time that this Court has refused to recognize the existence of such law. Among the cases which this Court has considered involving a point of similar nature are:

Meta Tebera v Isakwe Rongoya; [1967] H.C.D. 119: Masero Mwita v Rioba Masero [1968] H.C.D. 199: Mariba Wanyangi v C Romara. [1977] L.R.T. No.7:

Then there is the most recent decision of this Court. This is Mwanza (PC) Civil Appeal No. 88 of 1982 (unreported), D Rashid Neyura v Athuman Mayunga. In this appeal I discussed the principles which in my view make it impossible for this Court to accept the concept of taking away a man's property for a wrong done by someone else. I wish to reiterate what I said by quoting the extract from the case of Gwao Bin Kilimo v Kisunda Bin Ifuti (1938)1 T.L.R.(R) 403 E quoted at page 16 of the judgment:

"It is against our general ideas of justice that a man should suffer or be punished directly either in person or in property for some wrong which he has not done himself, though of course in the nature of things it is often impossible to avoid the infliction of F indirect suffering or loss in such cases".

It is, I think, common knowledge and no doubt, a laudable principle that every grown up person should be personally G held responsible and accountable for his actions.

It is for the above reasons that this appeal must be allowed. The appeal is allowed. Both the District and Primary Court decisions are set aside. It is substituted with an order upholding the objection by the objector/ appellant, and that the H cattle attached in execution of the warrant in which Shipilingi Kazungu was the judgment-debtor should be returned to the appellant/objector.

Appeal allowed. I

This was an action for damages for adultery involving the second respondent who had contracted a Christian marriage with the appellant. The action was commenced in the Primary Court. There was also an impression that long separation D of the spouses brings about automatic dissolution of marriage.

Held: (i) Under s.75 of the Law of Marriage Act, 1971, primary courts have no jurisdiction to entertain claims for E adultery where the parties involved contracted a civil marriage or a Christian marriage: the appellant in this case therefore took his claim to the wrong court;

(ii) a marriage may only be dissolved by a court of law and not by long separation of the spouses; until the F marriage is properly dissolved, the second respondent is still the appellant's wife, their separation notwithstanding.

[zJDz]Judgment

Mwalusanya, J.: This is a second appeal. In both courts below appellant John Kahamila lost. He H was claiming shs. 800/= as damages for adultery from the 1st respondent Paschal s/o Jonathan. If he had sought the services of a lawyer no doubt he would not have been caught wrong footed as it were in that both the suit and the appeals were misconceived. This again underscores the importance of legal services in our society and I am at a loss for I those characters who hold the lawyers in contempt. For example in

A the 17th century England William Shakespeare (1564 - 1616) in Henry VI Part 11 - Scene IV had prayed that:

'The first thing we do, let us kill all the lawyers'.

B And yet another English novelist John Gray (1685 - 1732) in his 'The Beggar's Opera 1 Chap. ... did not spare the lawyers when he said:

'A fox may steal your hens, Sir, If lawyers' hand is fee'd, Sir, He steals your whole estate'.

C

But I think the bitterest criticism was that unleashed by a citizen of England to his 'monarch' Cromwell when he said of lawyers: D

'------ lying lawyers whose heads are full of mischief and their pens dipped in gall and wormwood; their teeth as swords and spears, and their throats open sepulchers, to devour and swallow up the poor and needy from amongst men'.

E And yet another has attempted with sarcasm to define as who is a lawyer. He is Ambrose Bierce in the 'The Devil's Dictionary' by Doubleday & Co. Inc. Delphin Books at p. 118.:

'Lawyer - one skilled in circumvention of the law' F

And as if that was not enough there is a classical joke on lawyers that a typical textbook for every law student has the following chapters:

G Page 1 - 10 (Chap.1) : Libel laws.
Page 11 - 24 Chap.2 : Divorce Laws.
Page 25 - 36 Chap.3: Criminal Laws.
Page 37 - 500 Chap. 4 : Loopholes

H But I am satisfied that the picture of a lawyer is wrong. Those who think that way are misguided. Lawyers play a very useful role in society. We read in Boswell: 'Life of Johnson' Vol. 5 pp. 28 - 29; also quoted in Soonavala: 'Advocacy' 2nd Edn. at p. 921:

I 'As it rarely happens that a man is fit to plead his own cause,

1986 TLR p106

MUSHI J

A lawyers are a class of the community, who, by study and experience, have acquired the art and power of arranging evidence, and of applying to the points at issue that the law has to settle. A lawyer is to do for his client all his client might fairly do for himself, if he could. If by superiority of attention, of knowledge, of skill and a better method of communication, he has the advantage to which B he is entitled'.

And we have an incisive commentary from that eminent English lawyer Lord Denning M.R. in Pett v Greyhound C Racing Association Ltd: [1969] 1 Q) 1 Q.B.125 at p.13:

'It is not every man who has the ability to defend himself on his own. He cannot bring out the points in his own favour or the weakness in the other side. He may be tongue - tied or nervous, confused or wanting in intelligence. He cannot examine or cross D - examine witnesses. We see it every day. A magistrate says to a man: 'You can ask any question you like'; whereupon the man immediately starts to make a speech. If justice is to be, he ought to have the help of someone to speak for him. And who better E than a lawyer who has been trained for the task? I should have thought, therefore, that when a man's reputation or livelihood is at stake, he not only has a right to speak by his own mouth. He also has a right to speak by counsel'.

F I associate myself with these views that lawyers play a very useful part in society. And as I said earlier if appellant in this appeal had sought lawyer's advice, this suit would not have been filed in the first place.

G This was a suit for a claim of damages for adultery. Appellant had contracted a Christian marriage on 12/8/1973 at Kashasha Lutheran Church in Kagera Region. But under s.75 of the Law of Marriage Act No. 5 of 1971 a Primary Court shall have jurisdiction to entertain a suit for a claim of damages for adultery, where the parties were married in H accordance with the customary law or Islamic law. If the parties contracted a civil marriage or Christian marriage then they have to file a suit for claim of damages for adultery at the District Court. So it is obvious in this case that appellant filed the suit at the wrong forum. For that reason the appeal fails.

I There is another misapprehension which I must set straight for the benefit of the parties. The trial court and the respondents

A harbour the impression that a marriage may be dissolved by long separation of the spouses. That is wrong. A marriage may only be dissolved by a court of law - s.107 of the Law of Marriage Act No. 5/1971. As the position stands in this case the 2nd respondent is still the wife of the appellant until their marriage is dissolved by a court of law. If B she persists to cohabit with the 1st respondent without divorcing the former husband, 1st respondent will be definitely liable in damages for adultery.

Be that as it may, for the reasons I have attempted to set out above, this appeal is dismissed with costs C

Appeal dismissed.

[zJDz]Judgment

B Mwalusanya, J.: This is a suit for damages for defamation concerning a libel. The two plaintiffs namely Haji Associates Company (T) Ltd. (1st plaintiff) and Haji s/o Mugishagwe (2nd plaintiff) are claiming general damages in the sum of Shs.1,500,000/=.

C The preliminary point raised by the defendants in their Written Statement of Defence is that the incorporation of the 1st plaintiff is null and void because the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the company were signed inter alia by two minors; and because the incorporation was obtained by false pretenses and/or fraud.

D I don't agree that the incorporation is null and void. I stick to what I held in the case of Haji Associates Co. (T) Ltd. v Registrar of Companies Mwanza Misc. Civil Application No. 9 of 1985 (unreported) that once a certificate has been granted no one can question the regularity of incorporation. That is the import of s. 16 of the Companies Ordinance, E Cap. 212. I suggested in that case following the decision of the House of Lords in Powman v Secular Society [1917] A.C. 406 at p. 439 that the only way to challenge the incorporation of a company is by way of prerogative orders, e.g., certiorari, mandamus and prohibition. Therefore the preliminary point fails. F

Now what are the issues to be proved to establish the tort of defamation concerning libel? These are:-

1. First there should be communication to third parties.

G 2. Does the publication or communication refer to the 1st plaintiff as well?

3. Whether the statement or publication is calculated to injure the reputation of another by exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule.

H 4. If the communication was made while on qualified privilege then malice must be proved.

5. Is the defence of justification available to the defendants?
6. Is the defence of fair comment available to the defendants?

I The first issue as regards communication to third parties I find it uncontroverted. The letter which defendants wrote is Exh.

A B2 in Court and clearly indicates that it was communicated to nine different people or organizations. So I answer the first question in the affirmative.

Concerning the second issue I also answer it in the affirmative as the letter exh. B 2 is self-explanatory. The heading of that letter reads: "Re: M/S Haji Associates Company (T) Ltd." and therefore it cannot be gainsaid that the 1st plaintiff B was not the subject matter of that letter.

On the third issue I also answer in favour of the plaintiffs. The publication reads:

C It appears that Haji Mugishagwe has presented himself as the only qualified Architect in Mwanza and has a successful 'practice' in Mwanza which is illegal. He has even swindled clients by charging them up to 1000% of legal fees. Haji's claim is for sh.588,060/40 which should also come to sh.40,000/= has reached me by coincidence from my client who has disputed his D claim.

I agree with plaintiffs' counsel Mr. Kahangwa that those words in their natural and ordinary meaning import that the E plaintiffs are operating an illegal practice, they are swindlers and overcharging their clients. And obviously that is a very bad reputation of the company and its Managing Director. The publication obviously tended to lower the plaintiffs in the estimation of right-thinking members of society generally. F

We go to the fourth issue. Was the publication made under qualified privilege? In my view only the communication to the Registrar of Board of Architects, Quantity Surveyors & Building Contractors was privileged because there was reciprocal interest. I agree that the defendant as an architect and a registered member of the National Board of G Architects, Quantity Surveyors and Building Contractors was duty bound and had an interest in informing the Board or making it aware of any practices that may not appear acceptable practices and procedures of the profession and in particular as in this matter where the issue of calculation of fees is concerned. However that qualified privilege was H destroyed by malice as he was reckless in his publication. By publication of a false statement like - that the plaintiffs were operating an illegal practice obviously destroyed the qualified privilege - see Chimala Stores v Zambia - Tanzania I Road services Ltd [1970] H.C.D. n. 232. The plaintiffs are in fact doing their business legally. They

A are registered and have their business licence alright. And again the qualified privilege is destroyed because the communication was made to persons other than the Board. That communication to unconcerned people like Town Director Bukoba or Municipal Director Mwanza was not privileged at all - see the case of Jonathan v Athuman Khalfan [1980] T.L.R. 175 by Lugakingira J. That sufficiently answers issue number four. B

Now issue number five says, is the defence of justification available to the defendants? I don't think so. As this Court stated in the case of Novati s/o Joseph v Sebastian Muzo [1978] L.R.T. n. 14 (Mfalila J.) for the defence to succeed C the defendant must prove that the allegations were true, made in public interest and not motivated by malice. As I have mentioned above it is not true that the plaintiffs are operating an illegal practices; they are operating legally. Therefore the defence of justification equally fails.

D Finally is the defence of fair comment available to the defendants? For the defence of fair comment to succeed it should have been made in good faith and without malice upon a matter of public interest namely the professional conduct of the plaintiffs. As I have said above the defendant in this case was motivated by malice because he was reckless in his E language. It was not fair comment to state that the plaintiffs operate an illegal business a fact which is not true. I accordingly reject that defence.

In the event, I find the defendants liable. Now to what relief are the plaintiffs entitled to? Libel is actionable per se in that F you don't have to prove damages. And general damages are compensatory in nature; they are intended to take care of the plaintiffs loss of reputation as well as to act as a solatium for mental pain and suffering. The plaintiff's have stated that their otherwise successful business was substantially affected by that defamation. Many potential clients began to decline G to offer them business, e.g., Kauma as evidenced in their letter Exh. E. And the interesting thing is that the defamatory letter was addressed mostly to the plaintiffs' clients. The other effect of the letter was that Mwanza Municipal Council refused them a business licence for two months (see Exh. C and Exh. D) until it was clarified that the plaintiffs were in fact H operating legally. It is said the turnover per year of the 1st plaintiffs' company is about sh. 60,000,000/=. The defendants themselves have conceded in their defamatory letter that plaintiffs were conducting a 'successful practice' though an illegal one. For the reasons given, I find that a compensation of sh.1,500,000/= is a I

A reasonable one. I accordingly enter judgment for the plaintiffs as prayed plus costs of the suit.

Order accordingly.

[zJDz]Judgment

Mwalusanya, J.: The plaintiff Joshua Shija Kisendi is claiming damages against the defendant Paulo Katoto Building Contractors for trespass on his land. It is alleged that the defendants trespassed on his land situated on I plot No. 195 A Block

MWALUSANYA J

A U, Rwagasore Street in Mwanza Municipality. He claims shs.25,000/= as general damages for the trespass. And he also claims mesne profits of shs.1,000/= p.m. from the day the trespass started in July 1975 to date, and the same amounts to shs. 233,000/=. The mesne profits arise because it is alleged the plaintiff was deprived opportunity to use B and develop his plot of land when defendant occupied it. The trial of this case proceeded in the absence of the defendants as is allowed under Order 17 rule 3 of the Civil Procedure Code Act No. 49 of 1966 because the defendants declined to proceed with the case when they were not ready. Anyway in the written statement of defence, the defendants C assert that the plot in dispute is their property which they bought at a public auction in Mwanza on 5/11/1975. And they assert that they have the relevant receipts to establish the sale to them of the plot.

In his testimony in court the plaintiff produced a certificate of right of occupancy (Exh.A) to indicate that he is the lawful D owner of the plot in dispute. However on perusal of the said certificate I notice that the grant of right of occupancy of 99 years started to run from 1/7/1978. And the plaintiff conceded at the trial that defendant had bought a hut and some E timber lying on that plot on 5/11/1975, and that the purchase was at a public auction from the former owners the Geita General Store.

Now assuming that the facts as narrated by the plaintiff are correct, was there any trespass on 29/8/1977 when this suit F was filed? Certainly not. This is because the grant of right of occupancy to the plaintiff started to run on 1/7/1978. Therefore prior to 1/7/1978 the defendants were in lawful occupation of the said plot either as licencees or with a deemed right of occupancy. Therefore it is crystal clear that when the suit was filed there was no cause of action. On this ground alone, this suit must fail.

G Can I uplift the cause of action to start to run on 1/7/1978? Certainly not, because I will be amending the plaint contrary to the view of the plaintiff himself. I am not allowed in law to amend the plaint contrary to the wishes of the plaintiff himself. The plaint as it stands cannot prevail nor succeed.

H Now it is not disputed that from 1/7/1978 the plaintiff became the legal owner of the plot in dispute, the question arises, did the defendant become a trespasser thereon? Certainly not. The land office had bungled the whole thing. It was wrong for the land office to allocate that piece of land to the plaintiff without taking the appropriate legal steps to I evict the occupier who was a licencee and not a trespasser. They had an obligation to revoke the licence first.

MWALUSANYA J

A A person unlawfully using and occupying public land may be evicted at the instance of the land officer acting on behalf of the President in whom the control of public lands is vested. Prof. R.W. James in his book Land Tenure and Policy in Tanzania (1971) E.A.L.B. at pp-102-103 tells us that entry on the land by the Land Officer may be made peaceably or B by commencing a civil action for possession. The practice of the land officers is to serve a notice upon the unlawful occupier requiring him to quit and deliver up vacant possession of the public land on or before a stated date. If the notice is ignored the officer then files a plaint in the R.M.'s Court where the land is situated asking for (a) a declaration that the C defendant is in unlawful occupation of the land and (b) an order for him to surrender the land to the government within such period and upon such terms as the court shall deem fit as per s.23(1) of the Land Ordinance Cap. 113. The proof that his occupation is lawful rests upon the defendant, the averment that land is public land being sufficient proof of that D fact by virtue of s.23(3) of the Land Ordinance. The Court may make an order requiring the occupier to vacate the public land and it may allow him to remove buildings and other items on the said land. A squatter who remains in occupation of public land after the date when he was ordered to surrender the land or who having surrendered the same, E renews his unlawful occupation thereof, is guilty of an offence and is liable to a fine not exceeding shs.2,000/= and in the case of continuing offence an additional fine not exceeding shs.5,000/= for every day during which he continues to occupy the land - see s.23(2) of the Land Ordinance. However very often the Land Office thinks that that procedure is F slow and cumbersome and so they do not utilize it. That is wrong and it is exactly the same mistake they committed here.

It is the view of Prof. R.W. James who is an authority on land law in Tanzania that such an occupier after the land is G allocated to another person is more or less not a trespasser. He says at p.103 of his book cited above:

> It is arguable that squatters have a 'reasonable excuse' for the unlawful use and occupation of public lands. Moreover the Land Ordinance is not entirely unambiguous on the legality or illegality of African's rights on crown lands. It is also doubtful, to say the least, whether squatters can be said to enter upon enclosed lands of another, when they were the former owners of the land and have effected some improvements under a claim of ownership. I

MWALUSANYA J

A And Winfield on Law of Tort (1963) 7th Ed. by J.A. Jolowicz and T. Ellis Lewis (Sweet and Maxwell) at p. 378 holds the same view that in such circumstances the defendant was a licencee and that it is only after revocation of the licence that a licencee becomes a trespasser. I am in agreement with that view and I adopt it. So it is fallacious to hold B the view that defendant was an outright trespasser when the licence was not revoked by the land office.

Now suppose it is accepted that defendant was a trespasser, is the plaintiff entitled to such colossal sums claimed as damages? Certainly not, notwithstanding the fact that the tort of trespass is actionable per se and therefore there is no C need to prove the damage done, such a huge sum of sh.25,000/= as general damages would only be awarded in the clearest and most flagrant cases of trespass. That was not the case here. So if the plaintiff was successful I would have awarded only a nominal sum of sh.2,500/= as general damages. D

The claim of mesne profits amounting to sh.233,000/= is equally misconceived. It is true that the owner of land is entitled to damages for having been deprived possession and opportunity to develop his land. But at the same time I am of the view that the owner of land has an obligation to mitigate his loss. The owner of land has the right to remove the things on E his land and also the right of entry on that land. The right to remove the things on ones land is known as 'distress damage feasant'. He has the right to seize and distrain the things on his land and he keeps them as security for the F damage done to his land but he is not entitled to sell them - see the Tyrringham's Case (1584) 4 Rep. 4b., 38b; see also Winfield on Law of Tort at p.383 (supra). And right of re-entry is recognised by law. The person entitled to possession of land can enter or re-enter the premises though the law requires him to do so in a peaceable manner, G otherwise he commits a crime punishable by imprisonment. But whatever his criminal liability may be, he is not civilly liable if he uses no more force than is necessary - see the English case of Hemmings v Stoke Poges Golf Club [1920] 1 K.B. 720 which I adopt. So in this case at hand, if the plaintiff had distrained the goods on his land early enough and H entered on his land, such a huge claim of mesne profits would not have arisen. And so even if the plaintiff had succeeded in his claim I would have awarded him only a token sum of sh.2,500/= as mesne profits.

In the event the suit fails and I enter judgment for the defendant with costs. I

Order accordingly.

Contract - Assignment of a debt under the doctrine of novation.

-Headnote

Musoma Foodstuff Trading Co., owned by the sons of the first defendant, were indebted to the plaintiffs for timber C supplied to the company. The defendants by a letter undertook to pay the plaintiff the company's debt by supplying them 720 bags of cement. Of this amount the defendants defaulted to supply 300 bags of cement.

D Held: (i) By virtue of the letter there was created a new contract between the plaintiff and the defendant instead of the original contract between the plaintiff and Musoma Foodstuffs Trading Co.

(ii) the doctrine of novation recognizes that one party to a contract can release the other and substitute a third person who then undertakes to perform the released person's obligations. E

Judgment for the plaintiff

Case referred to

1. Settlement Funds Trustees v Nurani [1970] E.A. 562 (C.A.) F

Mwalusanya, J.: The plaintiff is claiming a sum of sh.42,000/= from the defendant being the value of 300 bags of cement which defendant defaulted to deliver under a contract between them. G

It is common ground that the defendants by their letter dated 1st June 1981 which is Exh. A in Court, agreed to supply 720 bags of cement to the plaintiff without any further payment from the said plaintiff. The plaintiff testified that the supply of cement was without payment because he had already given some timber to the said defendant company. However the H defendant stated that he had just undertaken to pay the debt of his sons who own the Musoma Foodstuffs Trading Co. which owed the plaintiff for the timber he had supplied them. The defendant denied that the timber had been supplied to him. I

Whatever the case, it is obvious that the defendant was in

A breach of the contract for the debt that was assigned to him under the doctrine of novation. This doctrine recognises that one party to a contract can release the other and substitute a third person who then undertakes to perform the released person's obligations. Thus by agreement, a new contract replaces the original contract. That doctrine is recognised in our country and it is under s. 62 of the Tanzania Contract Act. Cap. 433, which reads: B

If the parties to a contract agree to substitute a new contract for it or to rescind or alter it, the original contract need not be performed. C

That is exactly what happened here. By virtue of the letter Exh. A there was created a new contract between the plaintiff and defendant instead of the original contract between the plaintiff and Musoma Foodstuffs Trading Co. Therefore as to D what transpired earlier between those two old contracting parties is irrelevant here. We are only concerned with the new contract. The doctrine of novation was a subject matter of discussion and approval by the East African Court of E Appeal in Settlement Funds Trustees v Nurani: [1970] E.A. 663 (C.A.) whereof it was held to be a sound principle of law, though it was found in that case not be applicable as no new contract had been substituted. And a distinguished legal writer Prof. R.W. Hodgin in his book Law of Contract in East Africa (1975) E.A.L.B. at pp. 176 - 177 states that the doctrine of novation is applicable in East Africa in the circumstances just discussed. I agree. F Therefore even if there was originally no privity of contract between plaintiff and defendant, yet I am satisfied that by the doctrine of novation a new contract between them was created on 1/6/1981. The defendant is bound by that contract G If those who assigned the debt to him have defaulted on their part, then defendant can sue them. But that is not the concern of the plaintiff.

In the event I enter judgment for the plaintiff as prayed.

Order accordingly. H

B Customary Law - Legitimization of children - Legitimization by a man not mentioned by the mother's child and not natural father of the child - Whether possible - Customary Law (Declaration) Order 1963, G.N. 279/1963, rr. 181 A and B.

-Headnote

C The appellant married the respondent's daughter when the said daughter had a suckling female baby. He claimed that he paid the respondent cattle as bride price and for legitimization of the child. When, after a few years, the marriage relationship grew sour the marriage broke. The appellant then sued the respondent claiming the female child on the D ground that he had already legitimized her. There was no evidence to show either that the mother of the child had named the appellant as the father or that the appellant was the natural father of the child.

E Held: (i) The appellant was never the father of the child nor did he try to assert himself in that direction; therefore he had no competence to legitimise the child;

(ii) to allow an extension of the application of rules 181 A and B of the Customary Law (Declaration) Order, 1963 and allow a man to acquire children on mere payment of cattle or cash would introduce child purchase which would F be repugnant to our system and jurisprudence.

[zJDz]Judgment

Katiti, J.:In Musoma Urban Primary Court, Chacha Malima the appellant herein sued Mwita Kitogo hence the H respondent, claiming a female child, from the latter party, founding the claim on the alleged legitimisation of the said child, by payment of eight heads of cattle, upon marrying the child's mother. The Primary Court was unanimously of the view that as the child was never fathered by the appellant the question of legitimatization did not arise. They instead ordered I that the appellant be compensated

1986 TLR p118

KATITI J

A sh.8000/=. The respondent successfully appealed to the District Court, which allowed the appeal on two main grounds, namely, (1) that while the appellant had in law been entitled to legitimatize the child by payment of cattle, his demand of, and being refunded the same derogated from his claim, and therefore he ceased to have any rights over the B child, and (2) that, as the appellant deliberately and voluntarily entered into a marriage relationship with the respondent's daughter, who at the material time had a suckling baby, he assumed the responsibility of maintaining the child, the liability for which could not be attached to the respondent in the absence of evidence, or agreement for so doing. The District C Court disallowed the compensation.

The appellant has appealed to this Court, against such a verdict. The facts of the case, fall within a narrow compass. The appellant Chacha Malima amorously fell into the embrace of the respondent's daughter, who already had a baby D daughter, by some other man, and decided to marry her. The respondent's daughter had a suckling female baby, and with such full knowledge, the appellant married the respondents daughter who because of the extreme infancy of the child, had to go with the baby to matrimonially live with the appellant. It was claimed by the appellant, that what was E agreed upon between him and the respondent, was that the appellant pay twelve heads of cattle as bride price, and eight heads of cattle as child legitimisation payment, the latter part of evidence being denied by the respondent. It is all the same undisputed that, the appellant only paid eighteen heads of cattle. The wear and tear and corrugations of marriage F having intruded into the marriage irreconcilably, the appellant and the respondent's daughter parted and were divorced. The appellant was refunded all the bride price he had paid, but he still wanted the child founding his claim on the claimed legitimization of the said child. G

This appeal does in my view raise two issues that serve to dispose of the appeal. They are (1), whether a man, not a father, nor named as a father, has competence to legitimate an illegitimate child, and acquire legal paternity. And (2), H whether the Primary Court was entitled to award compensation for the upbringing of the child for three years (1981 - 1984) an aspect that was not pleaded, and disallowed by the District Court, but still being harped upon in this appeal, by the appellant. The first issue, it seems to me seeks the application of the provisions of Rule 181 A and B, of the I Customary Law (Declaration) Order 1963, G.N. 279/1963.

KATITI J

A According to the provisions of Rule 181 A and B, of the Customary Law (Declaration) Order 1963, there are two ways, either of which may serve to legitimate an illegitimate child, but each being tied to one constant common denominator condition precedent, and that is, it is the father of the child, whether named by the mother, or is acceptably B the natural father, who may legitimate the illegal child - (1) by either marrying the mother, or (2), without marrying the child's mother, by paying Shs.100/=, which may also be in kind, to the child's mother's father; - the condition precedent, in either way, being that he must be the father of the child, either, as named by the mother, or as commonly accepted as the natural father. I seek support on one of the ways, under Rule 181 B of the Customary Law (Declaration) order 1963 C from the case of Hamis Ungaunga v Omari Said [1973] L.R.T. No. 37, which held that, it was the father of the child born out of wedlock, who could legitimise the child by payment of Shs.100/=, if he does not marry the mother. In this case, the appellant was never the father of the child, nor, did he try to assert himself in that direction, and had D therefore no competence to legitimise the said child, and to allow an extension of this rule, to allow any man to acquire children, on just payment of cattle or cash is to introduce child purchase which would be repugnant to our system and E jurisprudence. I would therefore and hereby, dismiss the appellant's claim on this aspect.

The second issue, is about the compensation aspect for upbringing the child. This was unpleaded, but conceived by the Primary Court and disallowed by the District Court on appeal. With due respect to the Primary Court, the compensation issue was never pleaded, nor otherwise demanded in the course of adducing evidence by the appellant. Thus not only F was this offensive of the rules of pleadings - see rule 15 of the Primary Courts Civil Procedure Rules, and not only did the element of surprise, deprive the respondent the right or reply thereto, but the figure was also arbitrarily fixed, in favour of G the appellant. The trial Court, should not have gone out of its way to consider what was not pleaded.

But, even if compensation had been pleaded, and was an issue, it seems to me, the same would raise demanding H questions. First, it seems to me that where a man decides and marries, a woman who is suckling an illegitimate baby by another man, and takes both of them, because essentially out of love and affection for the mother, he has thereby voluntarily assumed the responsibility, and when the marriage is shattered beyond repair and the child is taken away I , there cannot be the basis for liability of the father-in-law, in the

A absence of customary law, or contract to that effect, and such we do not have. Second, for quite a while, the baby is suckling its mothers' milk and how to quantify that milk and computerise the same into cash and apportion the same into refundable labour to the appellant is very difficult. Third, the child's mother's work, care and, contribution, etc, for we B know rural women are the chief producers of food and cash crops, and chief carers of children, and it would be, difficult to quantify into monetary language, and show how great or greater was the contribution by the appellant. Unfortunately during the heat of love such consequential details are never worked out. From the above, it seems to me, compensation C under the circumstances, must have been pleaded, and strictly proved, and basis for liability established. In this case it was not, and the District Court was right to disallow it, and it is by this Court equally disallowed. The appeal is hereby dismissed with costs.

On 7/3/83, vide Muhutwe Primary Court civil case No. 13/1983, the appellant Leonce Mutalindwa, filed this case E against, Bi. Mariadina Sindano Edward, and Mohamed Abdallah, then first and second respondents respectively, complaining that the former sold and the latter bought clan land without clan sanction, arguing further here and before this F Court that Bi. Mariadina Sindano Edward had no right to sell clan land, but to only enjoy the usufruct of the same in her life time.

The Primary Court unanimously held against the appellant. What is particularly intriguing, are the assessors opinions, which I quote hereunder for posterity to easily appreciate. The first assessor Simon Chememe, inter alia, but importantly said:- G

Alipofariki marehemu Mr. Edward Sindano 1965, P.W.1, na P.W. 3 hawakuweza kushughulikia ugonjwa wa D.W.1, walimwacha na alishughulikiwa na Ndugu wanaukoo (wengine), waliojirani na shamba hili. H

Jambo moja la kujiuliza ni je, ni kweli huyu D.W. 1 ugonjwa wake, unaeleweka kwa wanaukoo wake wa "ABANU"? Jibu linajibiwa, na barua kielelezo "A", iliyotolewa na D.W.2, kuwekewa na wanaukoo (5) watano, kumwidhinisha D.W. 1 auze shamba hili kwa I shida ya ugonjwa ....

Hivyo mdai D.W.1 ameshindwa na wadaiwa wote wawili wameshinda, shamba liendelee kuwa ni mali ya mdaiwa B No. 2.

The second assessor Bi. Rugenia's opinion was concurrently on the same line. The apellant's appeal to the District Court, did not meet any fortune, as the case, or appeal, was dismissed on the grounds (1) that the appellant's action, C after seven years had been time barred, and (2) that the clan had the competence to sanction the sale and hence the appeal to this Court.

On appeal before this Court, the respondent was represented by a Bukoba based advocate Mr. Rweyemamu, who tried D to pound home and support the lower Court's verdicts based first on time limitation. Mr. Rweyemamu further submitted that the female disability in disposing of clan land is overriden and yields to the ultimate authority of the clan in which clan land title is ultimately vested, to even authorize a female to sell clan land, if there are compelling reasons. The E appellant on the other hand was not sloth to repeat the biblical time traded biased concept hence crystallised into, para 20 of the Customary Law Declaration G.N. 536 of 20/4/1963, that the 1st respondent, a female was not competent to dispose of clan land by sale. I have, on my part enjoined as I am, considered the issues in this case. Discernibly and with F the assistance of the Primary Court assessors' opinion, I am verily satisfied, that the issues involved are (1) whether a female has legal competence to dispose of clan-shamba, (2) whether the clan may legally and competently sanction a female inheritor to dispose of the clan shamba so inherited, and (3) whether the appellant was time barred. G

The first issue, whether a female has legal competence to dispose of clan land, is to both professional and lay members of this zone, susceptible to easy answer, an answer that is particularly attractive, covetously and jealously guarded by H chauvinistic males, but the envy of females from Kagera Region. The answer as expected is that para 20 of the Customary Law Declaration G.N. 536, does operate to deprive the first respondent a female the power to sell clan land. The first issue is therefore answered positively. But I would like to add, may be in passing, that at any one time, we may I have bad as well as good law, and I venture to say, without

KATITI J
A qualms, that this piece of customary law is bad, it discriminates against women, encourages expansionist greed on the part of males against female relatives, and deprives females, important resources for self-assistance, when as in this case, they are in serious trouble, while like wild birds of prey, men, greedily look on, or however, either for the woman to B expire, or die, or abandon that shamba, - in this case, this ugly position is with clarity put by the appellant's witness, P.W.4 thus:

Hasa kusudi letu kubwa mlitaka D.W.2 awarudishie shamba hili, bila ninyi kumrudishia fedha Czake. C

So much for the ugly aspects, but what is encouraging is that the grave for the same is being dug, for the contemptuous burial of the same for the sake of equality, when the Fifth Constitutional Amendment 1984, takes its rightful place, in D 1988.

The second issue is, whether the clan members may legally and competently sanction a female shamba inheriter, to dispose of, or sell the clan shamba. In the perspective of things, it seems to me, that under customary law, obtaining in E the area the case hails from, the parlance clan shamba, should mean, that title in clan land in that Customary Law sense, is generally vested in the clan. Since such title is so vested, the said clan may sanction, individual clan mates, to dispose of the clan-land, or even for good cause, refuse to so sanction. It has never been contentiously debated, that, a female is not as much a member of any clan, as any male. And if the ultimate authority for sanctioning sale of clan property, is F vested in the clan, and I am sure it is, it does not seem to me, that, the exercise of such power, is subject to any sex qualification - discriminating against women. For good cause, such sanction will or should ordinarily be given to males, as well as females. I would in the circumstances answer the issue, that, since the clan has the title vested in it, and can G sanction sale, of clan property, such sanction can be given to both male and females. In this case, the clan as Exhibit A, shows and as the assessors' opined, sanctioned for good reasons, the first respondent, to sell the clan shamba. As the appellant alone does not constitute his clan, his objection cannot override the clan as a whole. It is my view, that a clan H may legally and competently allow and sanction its female clanmates to sell clan property, and in this case it did, and I cannot impute illegality, or absence of jurisdiction thereto. It is my confident view, that the shamba was legally and I competently sold, there is no question of
KATITI J
A sex discrimination, nor is it judicious to let a single ill-motivated person with a get it free mentality to override the majority. As it was held in the case of Leopold Bakubezi v Gordian Ikwabu (1953) App. No. 12/1953, (unreported), Central Court of Appeal Digest No. 58, a woman lawfully in possession of clan land shamba, as was the respondent in B this case, subject to normal conditions governing such sales, like clan authority is entitled to sell clan land. I would and hereby answer the 2nd issue positively, and the appellant cannot be heard seeking to over-ride clan authority.

Casting nets wider, and without prejudice to the conclusions above, we have the third issue of limitation. It is common C ground that while the shamba was sold in January 1977, and while as per the evidence of P.W.4, three years thereafter, reconciliation between the appellant and the buyer in respect of the said shamba failed the appellant filed an action resultant in this appeal, seven years later, when admittedly the buyer had effected improvement worth Shs.73,000/=. As D aforesaid, the question is whether without prejudice to the conclusion that the clan was competent to sanction the sale, and so did rightly the appellant was otherwise time-barred. The issue of time limitation within which to nullify the sale of clan land or redeem the same, I must confess, has over a period of time undergone serious Judicial vicissitudes - three E sets of different views -(1) the three customary months limitation period, as from the date of knowledge of sale, as per Cory and Hartnoll - Haya Customary Law, before the promulgation of the Magistrates Courts Act 1963 to be referred to as the Act, see Shumbusho v Nyamwiza d/o Magayane (1954) App. No. 21/1954 Central Court of Appeal, and F (2), after the Act above, same three months limitation period, was canvassed in Pancras Elias v Gratian Pancras [1968] H.C.D. No. 411 in which Seaton, J. as he then was, was influenced by the holding in the case of Garasiani G Kaberu Murefu and Farijala Katemara v Bushaija, in which it was held that, the Courts should always demand:

> strict proof of all the conditions enabling a relative to nullify the sale of clan land and should apply these conditions equally strictly H since to do otherwise would strictly all initiative and enterprise on the part of a purchaser of a clan-land.

Again in the case of Mzee Madrisa v Rwanturaki Mulagirwa [1977] L.R.T. No. 57, it was held that the limitation I period remained the Customary one of three months - that begins to run as from the

A time the intending redeemer, or sale nullifier becomes aware of the sale. The reasons given for the holding, are in my view sound, consonant and consistent with, not only the developmental speed, that is at this juncture advocated but also with what has hitherto been the customary law on the aspect. The solidification of the hitherto customary law on the B aspect into three months was development oriented, well and rightly conceived by those forefathers, and it is my view, that holding land for twelve years, being dogged and nagged by the fear that the shamba would be redeemed or the sale nullified, would be a negation to fast land development. C

The second view, - the twelve years limitation period, is held in Evarister Martin v Apolinary Eustad and Tefunwa Tibishubwamu [1968] H.C.D. 412 and Abel Rwebogora v Raphael Mukaja [1970] H.C.D. 100 that severally with the advent of the Customary Law (Limitation of Proceedings) Rules 1963 under the Magistrates Courts Act, 1963 D G.N. 311 of 1964, that construed that item 6 in the schedule reading "proceedings to recover possession of land, or money secured on mortgaged land - 12 - years", - meant that the period of limitation for setting aside an alienation of E land, which includes sale nullification and redemption, was extended to twelve years. The above view has found attraction in a number of cases if not many.

But it all seems to me, that the construction that advocates twelve years limitation period, particularly after, the Magistrates Court Act, 1963, and the attendant Customary Law (Limitations of Proceedings Rules, does I think, F emanate from the construction of the wording, - proceedings to recover possession of Land, or money secured on mortgaged ... 12 years". It is my submission that, relevantly applicable here, is the first leg of the wording - "to recover possession of land." If this phrase, is intended to mean, to re-acquire to enter into land, and exercise physical possession, G over the land sought, by the party to the proceedings, then, the nullifier of sale of, or redeemer of clan land, does not unfortunately, fall into the acquisitive embrace of the above phrase - for the following reasons - first, because the said H nullifier, redeemer does not necessarily become the owner of the shamba redeemed, nor physically enter into possession of the shamba, and it may not even fall into his possession at all, if the redeem/purchase price is paid to him by, any clan member immediately, and second, he acts on behalf of the clan, and the original owner may get the said land by refunding I the redeemer, or sale nullifier by refunding the sum to the latter, without

A the party to the proceedings getting into possession. What seems to be the case, is that the redeemer or sale nullifier brings the clan land back into the control of the clan, without necessarily personally taking possession. It would therefore seem to me, that while the individual clan member may be said to be in possession of clan land he/she is occupying and may be he or she has sold the same, and hence the question of redemption or sale nullification, the clan in general can B only be said to be in control of clan land. And since the redeemer or sale nullifier of clan land all he does is to bring back the clan-land into the fold of the clan, and does plead the interest of the clan, and therefore acts for the clan, he cannot be C said to be recovering possession, of the said clan land, because such land never necessarily falls into his possession. It would therefore seem to me, that an action for redemption, or nullification of sale of clan land, is an action less for possession of, than the control of the same by the clan, I would for reason thereof, hold that the three months limitation D period, was never affected by Customary Law (Limitation of Proceedings) Rules, and the appellant was therefore time barred. Further under rule 5 of the Customary Law (Limitation of proceedings rules) the test of "unwarrantable delay", would apply to qualify the appellant as time barred. It seems to me, that, in either case, seven years delay in bringing this E action, the appellant was hopelessly time barred.

I would in finality conclude, that the severalty of one clan - sanction to sell, two, time limitation, or the accumulative effect thereof urge the dismissal of the appeal, and it is accordingly, with costs. F

Mwalusanya, J.: The applicant Cosmas M. Mukoji has lodged two combined applications before E this court. First is the application under s.14(1) of the Law of Limitation Act, 1971 for leave to lodge an application for review out of time. Second is the application for review under Order 42 and section 48 of the Civil Procedure Code Act No. 49 of 1966 as amended by Act No. 11 of 1976.

F As for the application for leave to apply out of time I note that the application for review should have been lodged within 30 days from the day the judgment was delivered on 24/4/1986. This application was lodged on 7/8/1986. A delay of about two months. That is not a very inordinate delay. The applicant says that the delay was due to the fact that G he is ignorant of law and so he had to go around to persuade friends to help in drafting the necessary affidavits and chamber summons. The explanation given is understandable. In view of the fact that the delay was not too inordinate, I granted orally the leave to lodge the application for review out of time. H

As regards the application for review the facts are as follows. In April 1986 the applicant who is a judgment-debtor applied to raise the attachment of his house allegedly because it was under a mortgage. The application was dismissed as it was found as a fact that the house in question was not under a mortgage as claimed. He now states in the present I application for review that in fact he should

MWALUSANYA J

A have applied to raise the attachment on the ground that the house was a residential one used by him and his family.

It is common ground that under s.48(a) of the Civil Procedure Code Act No. 49 of 1966 as amended by Act No. 11 of 1976, a residential house used by the judgment-debtor and his family is not liable to attachment. Counsel for the B respondents Mr. Rutabingwa feebly argued that the applicant is not using the house for residential purposes but renting it out. I adjourned the case for a day to give the respondent's counsel time to bring evidence as to whether the house was indeed rented out or not. The respondent's counsel failed to bring such evidence and in fact during the hearing he C intimated that he was withdrawing the contention that the house is rented out. So the position is that it is uncontroverted that the house in dispute is being used as a residence by the judgment-debtor and his family. It is therefore not liable to attachment.

D It is conceded by this court as ably argued by respondent's counsel that the application for review is irregular in that there is no affidavit accompanying the application but a mere statement of facts. But I hold that the irregularity is not fatal. There is no magic in affidavits and so we should not tend to canonize them. The oral statements which applicant made in court were sufficient to support the chamber application instead of the affidavits. E

Counsel for the respondent also argued that for any application for review there ought to be a discovery of a new fact which was not within the knowledge of the applicant at the first trial. He said that in here the fact that the house in dispute F is a residential one was within the knowledge of the applicant at the first trial and so the application for review is incompetent and ought to be rejected.

I agree that the fact that the house is residential was within the knowledge of the applicant at the first trial. But nevertheless the application is competent. There are two other legs under which an application for review can be made: G

(a) If there is an error apparent on the face of the record;

(b) If there is any other sufficient reason.

H I would and do hereby allow this application under any of these two legs. I ought on the earlier judgment of 24/4/1986 to have had taken judicial notice of the fact that the house was residential and thus should have raised the attachment. I correct that mistake now. I

I wish to make one last but vital observation. I find that these

A two applications were in fact unnecessary. The applicant ought to have simply filed an application for an order to raise the attachment of the house under s. 48(e) of the Civil Procedure Code. This application would not have been res judicate as the matter in the former application concerned a different matter that is whether the house was under a mortgage or not. The issue in the present case is patently different. The applicant was obviously wrongly advised. B

Be that as it may, the application is granted. The attachment of the house is raised as prayed. Each party to bear its own costs of this application.
Order accordingly. C

Lyimo, for the Republic
Judgment
Lugakingira, J.: The accused persons, Elirehema Nicolaus and Mwajuma Waziri, were licencee and barmaid respectively of Meru Bar in Kongwa. At 3.30 p.m. on 12/12/82, a Sunday, the police arrived at the bar which they B found open and five customers were consuming beer therein. The accused, who were in attendance, were arrested and charged with allowing the consumption of intoxicating liquor on licenced premises after authorised hours c/ss 14(2), (3) C and 91 of the Intoxicating liquors Act, 1968. Upon conviction they were fined Shs. 500/= each. The proceeding attracted the attention of my brother Maina, J. who admitted it to revision and minuted:

The second accused was a barmaid. In view of section 14 (3) of the Intoxicating Liquors Act, was the second accused's conviction D sound?

E I will shortly come to this matter. Presently, another and equally important matter comes to mind. Where exactly is Meru Bar?

The above question is a fundamental one considering that the law relating to drinking hours makes a deliberate distinction between urban and rural areas. In urban areas the holder of a retailer's on-licence may supply liquor for consumption on F or off the premises from 6 pm to 11 pm on Mondays to Fridays and from 11 am to 2 pm and 6 pm to 12 midnight on Saturdays, Sundays and public holidays. In rural areas the corresponding hours are from 3 pm to 8 pm on Mondays to Fridays and from 2 pm to 11 pm on Saturdays, Sundays and public holidays. There is a considerable uncertainty in this G case as to the location of Meru Bar. As per the charge sheet the alleged offence was committed "at Meru Bar Ugogoni area within the sub-district of Kongwa, Mpwapwa district in Dodoma Region" In the evidence of PW 1 the place is given as "Ugogoni in Kongwa area" and in the evidence of PW 2, the only other witness in the case, it is H "Ugogoni area Kongwa". In his judgment the trial magistrate refers to the place simply as "Ugogoni area".

It is evident that neither of the above descriptions or a combination of them places the bar anywhere with that distinctness I so crucial in a case of this kind. I perused the relevant Government

LUGAKINGIRA J

A Notices which appeared in 1968, 1970 and 1972 lists among others a place called "Kongwa" (perhaps for Kongwa) and it may well be that Ugogoni is in Kongwa urban area. If that be the case then the charge sheet and the evidence, at least the former, should have distinctly named Kongwa urban area as opposed to the very vague expressions to which I B have referred. It is common knowledge that many of our towns and other urban centres bear the same names as the districts in which they are situated. And to talk of Ugogoni in what is Gogoland is definitely to compound the mystery. It is therefore important in a case like the present to be specific about the area of crime. The trial magistrate and the public C prosecutor probably knew the place in question, but it is different with me and I cannot in law assume facts where the statute labours to make a distinction. It is thus uncertain where Meru Bar is. If it is in an urban area, an offence was D committed; if it is in a rural area, no offence was committed having regard to the operating hours stated above. In short, the evidence was insufficient to found the convictions.

The foregoing suffice to dispose of the case but I feel duty bound to deal with the question raised by the admitting judge. E To recapitulate it is whether the second accused, a barmaid, was rightly convicted under s. 14 (3). The subsection states:

(3) Any licencee who contravenes or permits a contravention of this section shall be guilty of an offence.

F There can be no doubt that this provision is intended for and directed against licencees as opposed to servants like a barmaid. Mr. Lyimo, learned Senior State Attorney, drew my attention to the provisions of s. 14 (2), in particular to the clause "nor shall any intoxicating liquor, whenever or wherever obtained, be consumed on such part of the premises as G aforesaid", and argued that the second accused was equally guilty and punishable under s. 91 as she was found buying and even admitted consuming beer after authorised hours. In Mr. Lyimo's view s. 14 (2) prohibits even the very act of drinking. I was at first inclined to agree with him but after reflection I have felt constrained to differ. If Mr. Lyimo's H argument is pursued to its logical conclusion it would mean that even customers would be guilty of an offence. It would also mean that any person would be guilty of an offence if, coming along with his beer, he broke into a bar after I authorised hours, settled there and consumed the beer. But that cannot be correct for the act as a whole does not seek to

LUGAKINGIRA J

A prohibit the consumption of alcohol at any time, and to attempt to do so would be a stupendous task indeed; what it seeks to do is to regulate the hours when consumption may be permitted on licenced premises. Hence s. 14 (2) first requires the premises to be closed to the public at all times other than those which are authorised. Secondly, it stipulates that no person other than the licencee, his family or servants shall be allowed to remain on or be permitted to the premises B after authorised hours. The operative words are "close", "allow" and 'permit" read in their proper grammatical context. When, therefore, the subsection is read as one whole, it is clear to me that the phrase "nor shall intoxicating C liquor ... be consumed" means that consumption shall not be allowed on the premises. Prohibition is so fundamental an issue that the legislature could not in its wisdom have tucked it away in the body of a subsection which is addressed to the licencee and I am unable to read any prohibition therein. D

In my opinion, therefore, the guilt of the second accused was constituted not by her own consumption of alcohol as such but being a servant at the bar, by permitting consumption to take place. There were five customers in the bar when the police arrived and she even took an order in their very presence. But as earlier stated s.14 (3) does not create an E offence as regards servants: it does so as regards licencees only. A proper charge against a servant should cite s. 90(1) apart from ss. 14 (2) and 91. It is under s. 90 (1) that it is an offence for a servant to do that which would be an offence if done by the licencee. The provision was not cited in this case but there can be no doubt that the second accused F understood the charge and was not embarrassed in her defence; but having regard to what has already transpired it is neither necessary nor desirable to decide whether the omission was fatal or curable.

For the reasons first above stated I quash the convictions, set aside the sentences and order that the accused persons be G refunded the fines.

Alimwike, for the appellants.

Lyimo, for the Republic

[zJDz]Judgment

E Lugakingira, J.: I found this case rather difficult, and took time considering the judgment, on account of a number of mysteries.

The appellants Mohamed Katindi and Lucas Mazengo were convicted of corrupt transaction with an agent and sentenced to five years' imprisonment each. It was alleged that on 14/8/82 the two corruptly gave shs. 6,000/= to the F Dodoma Regional Crime Officer, one SSP Fridolin Mdendemi Julius, as an inducement to forbear further investigations against Lucas Mazengo who was suspected of being in unlawful possession of Government trophy. I will refer to SSP Julius simply as the Regional Crime Officer. Following conviction and sentence the appellants appealed here through G learned counsel Mr. Alimwike who had also represented them at the trial. Mohamed Katindi was at the trial the first accused and Lucas Mazengo was the second accused. I will where necessary retain those designations in this judgment. H

There were five witnesses for the prosecution at the trial but, in the final analysis, the appellants were convicted solely on the evidence of the Regional Crime Officer. It is therefore necessary to review that evidence and that of the appellants and to highlight the mysteries I have just alluded to. I

The Regional Crime Officer was between 30/6/82 and 18/7/82

A at Ilangali village pursuant to reports of illegal hunting in the area. While there he received information that the "second accused" was such an illegal hunter but he could not find him. He later gathered that the "second accused" was at Iringa. On 22/7/82, after returning to Dodoma he dispatched PC. Nicolaus (PW4) to Iringa to look for the "second accused". B We now meet the first mystery. PW4 testified that he was dispatched to look for one Charles Mazengo and not Lucas Mazengo. He was also not told the reason why this Charles Mazengo was required. Be that as it may, his mission was unsuccessful.

C The first accused was on his part a frequent visitor to the Office of the Regional Crime Officer. For reasons we do not know his cattle had been rounded up on the orders of the RCO and used to see the Regional Crime Officer in that connection. On 12/8/82 he thus went to see the Regional Crime Officer. On this occasion he also had another message. D He told the Regional Crime Officer that he knew the whereabouts of the second accused and offered to produce him. And therein lies the second mystery: Firstly, the Regional Crime Officer had not previously spoken to the first accused E about the second accused. Secondly, the Regional Crime Officer declined the offer and said it was up to the second accused to deliver up himself or not. Still, and I think to the Regional Crime Officer's surprise, the first accused turned up the following day, accompanied by the second accused. In the words of the Regional Crime Officer, "The first accused F then informed me that the person in his company was Lucas Mazengo the man he (sic) was being looked after (sic) by the police. By then I did not know the second accused....". The first accused then allegedly asked the Regional Crime Officer to forgive the second accused. The Regional Crime Officer asked the first accused to leave, which the latter did.

G Thus left alone, the Regional Crime Officer began to interrogate the second accused. In the course of the interrogation, the second accused allegedly admitted to be in possession of a gun and to have killed eight elephants and sold their tusks at Iringa. Hearing this the Regional Crime Officer directed one Insp. Ntobi to take a statement from the H second accused. This was done and the statement was handed over to the Regional Crime Officer. Then another mystery: In spite of the second accused's alleged admission and in spite of the alleged search for him, the Regional Crime Officer told him he could go home and return the following day. But as if liberty meant nothing to him, the second I accused did not leave. He allegedly hung on, begging for forgiveness, and offered to give

A "something".The Regional Crime Officer resisted but the second accused allegedly insisted and in the end they settled for sh. 6,000/=. The Regional Crime Officer told the second accused to bring the money the following day.

Meanwhile the Regional Crime Officer arranged a trap. On 14/8/82 a civilian, one Barnabas Tendeka (PW2), was planted behind a shelf somewhere in the Regional Crime Officer's Office. Inspt. Ntobi (who did not testify) and D/Sgt B Semunyu (PW3) were planted in an adjoining room. Shortly both appellants entered the Regional Crime Officer's Office. The Regional Crime Officer inquired whether he could be of any help. The first accused put on a jacket and C carried the money. He took it out stating: "Tumekuja kwa shughuli zetu za jana". At the request of the Regional Crime Officer the first accused started to count the money. The Regional Crime Officer gave the signal whereupon PW3, PW3 and Insp. Ntobi entered. Insp. Ntobi asked the appellants what business they had there. The first accused replied: D "Tumemletea fedha Mzee kwa sababu ya matatizo ya kijana huyu" and, in another mystery, he continued counting the money, quite unperturbed. The other details are unnecessary. The appellants were there and then arrested and charged as aforesaid. E

Both appellants gave unsworn statements. The first accused said that on 12/8/83 the second accused, a relative, called at his house. The first accused took that opportunity to inform him that the police were looking for him. The second accused replied that he had already heard of that and intended to see the Regional Crime Officer the next day to know F what it was all about. He asked the first accused to give him company. The latter agreed. It can safely be said that it was after this meeting that the first accused went off to inform the Regional Crime Officer that he could produce the second accused. Hence on 13th August 1982 both appellants called at the Regional Crime Officer's Office. The first G accused introduced the second accused and was asked to leave. He left, going home straight. Next day, the second accused called at his house again and told him that he was off to see the Regional Crime Officer again. Since the first accused similarly desired to see the Regional Crime Officer in connection with his own problems, they set off together. H On the way, the second accused told him that the Regional Crime Officer had demanded payment of shs. 6,000/=, the expenses incurred in looking for him, and he was taking the money. He asked the first accused to hold the money for the I latter had a jacket. The first accused obliged. When they entered the Regional Crime

A Officer's Office the first accused asked the Regional Crime Officer whether it was true he had required the second accused to refund expenses. The Regional crime Officer agreed. He then produced the money which he was asked to count. The rest of what transpired is again unnecessary.

B The statement of the second accused was substantially the same. The additional part of it was that when they were left alone with the RCO on 13th, the RCO told him that he had been looked for illegal hunting. The second accused denied being an illegal hunter. An argument ensued in which the RCO told him that he had been named by his colleagues at Ilangali and threatened that he would be beaten like them if he persisted in his denial. Indeed we gather from the C evidence of the RCO that he had made several arrests at Ilangali and that it was from some of those arrested that he had gathered information against the "second accused." The second accused still denied but he was forced to sign a D statement. The RCO then told him that the police had looked for him extensively and had incurred shs. 6,000/= which he had to refund. He took the money the following day accompanied by the first accused. The rest is again the same.

E In a reasoned judgment the learned trial Magistrate came down with a number of findings. Most pertinently, he found that the second accused was being looked for by the police; that he had delivered himself at the Police Station; and that both appellants gave shs.6,000/= to the R.C.O. However, he held to be false the story about the money being a refund of F expenses. His reasons were that the story was not put to the RCO in cross-examination; that if it were true no trap would have been laid; and that the RCO was a witness of truth. But he also observed that the RCO was an accomplice and therefore required corroboration. He observed that the conversation which ensued during the actual transaction did G not suggest that the money was a bribe. There was in particular an incriminating statement which was attributed to the first accused but he held it inadmissible since it was made to a police sergeant. I will come to that statement presently. In the end, after duly warning himself on the danger of convicting on uncorroborated accomplice evidence, he believed the H RCO that the money was given as a bribe. He therefore proceeded to convict.

I will conveniently start with the statement attributed to the first accused in answer to a question by PW3, a Police I sergeant. PW3 testified that when he entered the RCO's Office he asked the first accused: "Fedha hizi ni za nini? The first accused allegedly

A replied: "Fedha hizo nimepewa na mshitakiwa wa pili ili ambembeleze RCO ikiwa ni chai ili amsamehe mshitakiwa wa pili katika kesi ya meno ya tembo ambayo alikuwa anaishughulikia RCO". He went on to claim that the second accused then confirmed that statement. The trial Magistrate was of the view that it was a confession. I B agree; if that statement were ever made it amounted to a confession. The problem is that the magistrate then disallowed it for having been made to a police officer. I am of the view that he misdirected himself in disallowing it on that ground. A confession made to a police Officer of or above the rank of corporal, as PW3 was, is admissible against the maker if it is C made voluntarily, the onus being on the prosecution to prove its voluntariness. In this connection the attention of the learned magistrate is drawn to s. 27 of the Evidence Act as repealed and replaced by Act No. 19 of 1980. If therefore the statement was ever made, and although there were in attendance three Officers, all of whom ranked above corporal, it was admissible if it was voluntarily made. D

However, I am on my part inclined to disallow the statement on a different ground. It is difficult to believe that the statement was made. Looking at it, it sounds like a quotation from a charge sheet, complete with the usual and necessary E ingredients of corruption. I am not prepared to believe that the first accused, a man appearing on the record as a 51-year old peasant, could have made such a professional statement. I think, with respect, that it was an ambitious contribution by the police officer who must have been not a little anxious to assist the prosecution. I reject it on that F ground. Moreover, there were other statements attributed to the appellants, and similarly incriminating, which the trial magistrate rejected for being contradictory and incredible. Most outstanding was this: "Mnaelewa kuwa hii ni rushwa?" "Ndio, tunaelewa." This came from PW2, the civilian, but it never featured in the evidence of PW3 to G whom PW2 attributed the leading question. Mr. Lyimo the Senior State Attorney who appeared for the Republic, conceded that what was alleged by the prosecution witnesses to have transpired at the giving could not be relied upon. I accept that concession. In so doing, I consider justifiable the finding by the learned trial Magistrate that what transpired H at the giving did not disclose a corrupt transaction.

From here we can go to what transpired on 13/8/82 between the RCO and the second accused. The RCO claimed that the second accused offered a bribe, but the latter claimed that the RCO ordered him to refund Police expenses. The trial I Magistrate found the RCO

A truthful but not before observing that he was an accomplice for "taking part in the offence of corruption." The Magistrate therefore felt obliged to look for corroboration before falling back to the RCO's word. I think it is desirable B to clear up this issue first. Was the RCO an accomplice? Mr. Lyimo was reluctant to support the assessment of the RCO by the trial magistrate and submitted that he was merely a decoy whose evidence did not require corroboration. He supported his argument with R. v Heziron Magori [1970] HCD n. 148 in which Georges, C.J. said:

C "It is my view also that even in cases where it could be said that a Police agent has instigated an offence by being responsible for the suggestion that it be committed this agent could not be described as an accomplice, in the ordinary sense of the term, whose evidence needs corroboration. This is so because ... the complicity goes only to the actus reus. There is never any intention on D the part of the agent to commit an offence ..."

I agree. If therefore the RCO is to be believed, as the learned trial magistrate did, and considering the trap he went E ahead and laid, it is then apparent that he was merely a decoy without any intention on his part to commit an offence. In that case he was not an accomplice in the strict sense and his evidence did not, as a matter of law require corroboration.

F The problem in this case is whether it was safe to believe the RCO regardless of whether he was an accomplice or not. In matters of credibility the trial court is undoubtedly the best judge and there is a host of decisions to that effect. An appellate court will only reassess the credibility of witnesses if there are circumstances of an unusual nature which appear G in the record. From my view of the evidence in this case I think there are circumstances which warrant the reassessment of the RCO's credibility. Firstly, if the second accused is to be believed it would mean that the RCO acted in bad faith. He deceived the former intending to trap him in a bribery charge. A person of such dishonesty would H require corroboration. Secondly, I agree with Mr. Alimwike that the RCO was not a disinterested witness. He had camped in a village for over two weeks and had even sent an envoy to Iringa. He therefore had cause to see his efforts rewarded. It was held in Peter Kasembe v. R [1967] HCD n. 338 that a police decoy, even though not an accomplice, I is not a disinterested witness and his evidence must be examined

A closely. The court said: "Though corroboration would not be required as a matter of law, it would hardly ever be safe in practice to convict unless there was corroboration." Thirdly, we have those mysteries which I have highlighted and to which the learned trial Magistrate made no reference at all. In these circumstances, there is every justification to B reexamine the RCO's credibility and the only way is to look for corroboration. I will do so as I now proceed to consider the case of each appellant in turn.

The first accused was not present when the RCO was interrogating the second accused. What transpired between the two was therefore unknown to him. Further, no one else, but the appellants alone, knows what transpired between them C on the morning of 14th. The RCO conceded both factors and said: "The conversation between myself and the second accused was never witnessed by any other person. It is difficult for me to know what the first (sic) accused told the second (sic) accused outside." I believe he meant to say, and could have said, that it was difficult for him, to know what D the second accused had told the first accused outside. That being the case, the story of the appellants remains unchallenged, namely, that the second accused told the first accused that he had been ordered to refund Police expenses. E The first accused could therefore not have associated the money with bribery. It was argued by Mr. Lyimo that the first accused knew the money to be a bribe and suggested two reasons. First, he pointed out that on 13th the first accused allegedly asked the RCO to forgive the second accused. Secondly, that the appellants were together at the taking of the F money. On my part, I find it difficult to infer guilty knowledge from any of those factors and I think, too, that the first factor is doubtful. In the first place, the first accused never admitted asking the RCO to forgive the second accused. On the other hand, it is doubtful whether he could in seriousness have done so. What transpires is that the first accused had G an interest in the apprehension of the second accused. It occurs to me, and I think I am correct in saying, that he was a treacherous character who was desirous of exchanging the second accused as ransom for his impounded beasts. That explains why on 12th he went off fast and triumphantly to tell the RCO that he would produce the second accused after H learning of the latter's intention to see the RCO. It is unlikely that a man of that attitude and ambition could honestly, if at all, ask the RCO to forgive the second accused. On the other hand, I think the act of going together on 14th can be differently explained. The first accused had his own problems for which he had become a frequent I

A visitor to the office of the RCO. Indeed he stated that, "I also told Lucas that I was also going to the same place as I had some matters with the RCO." Since the existence of these "matters" was not a tale but a fact featuring in the prosecution case, the first accused was entitled to the benefit of the doubt. All in all, I am unable to find corroboration in B the factors suggested by Mr. Lyimo.

There was then a factor which went some way to suggest innocence on the part of the first accused. It was one of those mysteries. Even after the police officers had entered on signal, and while hostile questions were being shot from every direction, the first accused continued counting the money without worry. The first accused is an old peasant, true, but he C certainly knows what is a bribe, and that is why he denied the charge. I think that this conduct was inconsistent with guilty knowledge and puts one to inquiry. It is significant that the trial magistrate never referred even to this incident. Had D he done so, and generally directed himself as I have endeavoured to do, I cannot be certain that his decision must in reason have been the same.

Regarding the second accused, Mr. Lyimo argued that corroboration could be found in the following factors: that the E second accused was a wanted person and knew it; that he therefore surrendered himself to buy his freedom; and that money was given in fact. I think, with respect, that these arguments beg the question as they presuppose the existence of facts, themselves requiring demonstration. We can begin with the question whether the second accused was the wanted person. That question appears highly debatable. It was an undisputed fact that the RCO did not know the person he F wanted. Secondly, those who named that person to him did not appear to confirm that it was the second accused. They were named persons so there was no secret about it. Finally, the wanted person was Charles Mazengo and not Lucas Mazengo. It is not unlikely that some enthusiasts or sympathizers, wrongly but in good faith, decided to tip the second G accused. The possibility of this is inferable from the conduct of the RCO. After he had seen and interrogated the second accused he still allowed him to go home. I think that this belittles his allegation that the second accused admitted being an H illegal hunter. It borders on the incredible, and I am not persuaded to believe, that a person so much sought after, a person who fortunately admitted the offence, a total stranger to the RCO, could still be allowed to go home - and where? - without further ceremony. It could well be true, as claimed by the second accused, that he did not admit the offence I and the RCO might have

A realised that he had the wrong man on his hands. I am unable to interpret his conduct more reasonably and, therefore, I feel bound to distance myself from the finding of the trial magistrate.

Mr. Lyimo's other suggestion was that the second accused surrendered himself to buy his freedom. That is of course interesting - a free person surrendering to buy his freedom! I think it accords more with reason to say that the conduct of B the second accused was consistent with innocence. He might have wanted to see the RCO, and so he said, to protect his innocence, and went ahead without invitation. He therefore does not appear to have had a motive to offer or give a bribe. In Alli Kassam v. R. [1972] HCD n. 186, to which Mr. Lyimo referred, Onyiuke, J. characterised motive as C "something that animates an intentional act - the ulterior intention with which an intentional act is done." In that case there was this ulterior intention - something that animated Kassam's intentional act of giving money. He was desirous of D travelling abroad and wanted a certificate of good character. The certificate did not attract a fee. Yet Kassam gave money to a police Officer to be issued with one. It was argued by his counsel that he acted out of ignorance and out of fear of the police. In Onyiuke, J's view if Kassam did not know that he was entitled to the certificate, his motive was to E buy it - to get the Police Officer to give him one for a bribe. If he acted out of fear, his motive was to worm himself into Police confidence by buying their loyalty. The learned Judge held that the transaction was corrupt because, either way, Kassam gave the money to compromise the Police Officer in the honest and impartial discharge of his official duties. F There are cases indeed where the briber's motive may not be apparent. It was therefore held in Rashid v. R. [1971] HCD n. 33 that in a charge of corruption it is not necessary to prove an offence on the part of the briber. It is nevertheless evident that even in that case Rashidi had a motive. For reasons best known to himself, he was toying with G his conscience. When he saw a Police vehicle he suddenly reversed his own vehicle and sped off like a madman. That alerted the Police who gave chase. He was only caught because his vehicle was disabled after colliding into a gatepost. H He then anxiously offered shs.20/= praying to be let off. There was therefore something that animated his intentional act of offering the money. Motive is thus an essential ingredient and a charge of corruption which is devoid of motive appears to be academic. For without motive an intention to corrupt can hardly arise. As stated by the Court of Appeal in Mandia v.R. [1966] E.A. 315, 318: I

LUGAKINGIRA J

A "... the appellant's state of mind, which in our view included motive and intention, seems to us to be an essential and material factor in determining whether, in making the payment, he was acting corruptly or not. This had always been the approach adopted by the courts in East Africa, and in our opinion it is the correct approach..." B

The Court further said (at p. 319):

We consider that the motive prompting the giving of a bribe is a relevant consideration in deciding whether or not the bribe was C given corruptly.

The court was then considering s. 3(2) of the Kenya Prevention of Corruption Act (Cap.65) which is in pari materia with s. 3(2) of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1971 of this country. In that case the appellant, who was a Magistrate, D had in fact given a bribe to a Police Constable, his motive being to test the constable as he had "heard of these things and wanted to know if it was real." He was convicted by the trial judge who held that it was not necessary to prove a corrupt motive but merely an intention to corrupt. The Court of Appeal reversed that decision and acquitted the E appellant holding as set out in the passages quoted above.

In the case before me, I have not found it conclusively established that the second accused was the wanted person. I have also held, on a reasonable interpretation of his conduct, that he might have delivered himself to the RCO to F demonstrate his innocence. There is therefore no definite evidence that he had a motive to offer or give a bribe. As found by the trial Magistrate, and now demonstrated, the evidence of the RCO is thus bereft of corroboration. While in G no way alluding to the integrity of the RCO, but having in view the principles of the Criminal Law, I am thus bound to give the second accused the benefit of the doubt on what transpired between him and the RCO. It then becomes unsafe to sustain the conviction. And that in my view is sufficient to dispose of the Appeal but there is one other matter which H demands the attention of the court.

The omission by the defence counsel to put the appellants' prospective defence to the RCO during cross-examination was a decisive factor in the decision of the learned trial Magistrate. He expressed himself in relatively strong terms on this I matter and I consider it desirable to cite the pertinent part of his judgment:

LUGAKINGIRA J

A I have observed that ample opportunity was offered to the defence to cross-examine the PW1 but never at any moment was the PW1 asked a question about having told the second accused to pay the Police expenses. This would have been one of the most crucial questions to ask the PW1. No accused in his full senses would have fortune to ask this question, let alone an experienced and qualified counsel as in this case. B

I agree that the omission was a disturbing one. It is the obligation of a defence counsel, both in duty to his client and as an Officer of the court, to indicate in cross-examination the theme of his client's defence so as to give the prosecution an C opportunity to deal with that theme. For to withhold the position of the defence and thereby take the prosecution and the court by surprise, does to my mind, portray a poor appreciation of the meaning and purpose of any trial. I have no reason to suspect that the omission was deliberate in this case and I accept Mr. Alimwike's explanation that it was D oversight on his part. It would certainly be deplorable if such omission were to be identified as a deliberate mischief. There also appears to be a price for it, whether it be deliberate or accidental. In the case of Browne v Dunn (1894) 6 E R. 67, the House of Lords held that the witnesses had not been cross-examined on a material matter the jury could not afterwards be asked to disbelieve their testimony on that matter. That decision, as well as a similar decision in R. v Hart (1932) 23 Cr. App. R. 202, were followed by the High Court in England in O' Connell v Adams (1973) Crim. L.R. F 113 where it was held that if it is part of the client's case to challenge a witness as not speaking the truth at a trial on an indictment, the professional advocate has to put the matter fully and fairly to the witness and, if that is not done and the advocate in his speech tries to rely on the falsity of the witness's evidence, the court should check him at once. In G R. v. Hart (above) the Court of Criminal Appeal similarly said:

In our opinion, if, on a crucial point in the case, the prosecution intend to ask the jury to disbelieve the evidence of a witness, it is right and proper that witness should be challenged in the witness box, or at any rate, that it should be made plain, while the H witness is in the box, that his evidence is not accepted.

This passage was cited with approval by the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa in Rex v Shija Mkina (1945), 12 I EACA 64, at p. 66.

LUGAKINGIRA J

A It is evident, however, that this apparently strict rule has since received clarification, and impliedly criticized, as revealed by the views expressed in O'Connell v Adams (above). It also transpires that case is distinguishable from the case before me. The court there went on to observe that in Magistrates' courts frequently one party was represented by B a person who was not a highly qualified professional advocate and was insufficiently skilled to appreciate the necessity of putting crucial matters to a witness for the other side. The court stated that it could not be said, as a matter of law, that justices must accept a witness's evidence merely because it was not challenged. In a commentary on the case - see C O'Connell v Adams [1973] Crim. L.R. pp.114 - 15 - the editors suggest that the rule in Browne v Dunn (above):

bars the party who has omitted to cross-examine from asking the jury to disbelieve the witness. Clearly it cannot bar the jury from D disbelieving him; and presumably it would be wrong for the judge to tell the jury that they must believe the witness; though he could of course point out that the witness's evidence was un-challenged. Though the Magistrates largely fulfil the role of the judge as well as the jury, it seems right that they, similarly, should be untrammelled by rules as to what they must or must not believe. E On the other hand, it is obviously desirable that it should be brought to the notice of any witness, before he leaves the witness box, that his evidence is doubted in some respect, since it is possible that he may be able to resolve the doubt. F

With these observations and comments, I am in agreement. While not attempting to lay down a general rule, therefore, I G think it can still be said that although it is undesirable to permit a party to canvass a point not raised in cross-examination, the court should not thereby be precluded from disbelieving a witness on a particular point merely because he was not cross-examined on that point. This proposition appears to accord with the realities of our own H environment where, in Magistrate's courts most accused persons do not have access to professional representation nor do they have the skill to conduct their cases. Not infrequently cases come up where there has been no cross-examination, at all, or, there has been poor and irrelevant cross-examination, but then the accused comes up with a I defence which could possibly be true. Injustice could therefore be occasioned if the court were to believe a prosecution

LUGAKINGIRA J

A witness on a particular matter merely because he had not been cross-examined on that matter.

I have also said that O'Connell v Adams is distinguishable. In that case the witnesses had not been cross-examined at all, but in the instant case that RCO was in fact cross-examined and it was brought to his notice that his evidence was B doubted in some respect. Learned defence counsel raised the question of identity -whether the second accused was the wanted person; he also raised the question of motive - whether the second accused had reason to give a bribe. I think that on a fair and judicious appreciation of this line of questioning, the defence was entitled to expect the court to construe the evidence of the RCO as not accepted. C

I think, finally, that this matter may be concluded by stating that it all boiled down to the onus of proof. The onus is, unless otherwise stated, on the prosecution to prove the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt. An accused D person may not be convicted on the weakness of the defence - which would include the omission to cross-examine on a crucial matter - but can only be convicted on the strength of the prosecution case. Not even lies proceeding from the mouth of the accused would absolve the trial court from ascertaining from the whole evidence whether the offence has E been proved beyond reasonable doubt: Longinus Komba v. R. [1973] LRT n. 39. In his judgment the learned trial magistrate stated that he had "no reason whatsoever to disbelieve the testimony of the PW1." I have already shown that there were not one but a number of reasons for doubting the RCO and it is unnecessary to repeat them. It follows in my F view that the appellants' guilt had not been established beyond reasonable doubt.

I allow the appeal, quash the convictions and sentences and order the appellants' immediate release from custody.

G Appeal allowed.

Court High Court of Tanzania - Mtwara
Judge Msumi J

23rd June, 1984.
CRIMINAL APPEAL 32 OF 1981
Flynote
B Evidence - Handwriting expert - Authorship of a piece of handwriting - Whether to be proved only by handwriting expert.
Criminal Law - Accused convicted and sentenced on both forgery and fraudulent false accounting - Illegal.
-Headnote
C The appellant was charged with and convicted on 22 counts of forgery, 22 of fraudulent false accounting and 23 counts of stealing. On appeal he argued that evidence on the disputed handwriting was not given by an expert. Moreover it was pointed out that the trial court was wrong in convicting the appellant on both forgery and fraudulent false accounting. D
Held: (i) For the purpose of enabling a court to decide the author of any piece of handwriting in dispute, the opinion of a person who is conversant with the handwriting of the disputing author is as good as, if not sometimes better than, that of a handwriting expert; E
(ii) it was wrong for the trial court to convict and sentence the appellant on both forgery and fraudulent false accounting.

[zJDz]Judgment
Msumi, J.:In the District Court of Mtwara the appellant, one Joseph Mapema, was charged with a total of 67 counts H under the Penal Code. These consisted of 22 counts of forgery, 22 counts of fraudulent false accounting and 23 counts of stealing. He was convicted and sentenced on all counts. This appeal is against both convictions and sentences.
I First let me dispose of appellant's complaint that the learned trial District Magistrate refused him adjournment of the case so as

A to enable him to contact his advocate. In other words the appellant is submitting that the trial court deprived him of his right to be legally represented. This is a weighty and serious allegation. The importance with which courts attach on the right of an accused to be legally represented was clearly demonstrated by the High Court of Uganda in Yusufu Gitta v. R. [1957] E.A. 211 at p.213 when it said: B

Every accused has the undoubted right to be defended by counsel. Galos Hired and Anor v R. and Kingston v R. regarded as authority for the proposition that if an accused is deprived of that right through no fault of his own and through no fault of his C counsel and a conviction follows, the conviction will be quashed on appeal.

D This observation was quoted with approval by this court in Joshua Nkonoki v R. [1978] LRT n. 24. Going by the record, what happened in the present case is that after several adjournments which lasted for over ten months the case was fixed for hearing on 16th June 3, 1980. But when the case came up on that day appellant was absent; and for the E first time the court learnt from his wife that he had gone to Dar es Salaam to arrange for an advocate. The case was thus adjourned to 3/7/1980 for mention. On that day appellant appeared with his advocate one Mr. Putika. Then it was mutually agreed by both the learned State Attorney and the learned Defence Counsel that the case should be fixed for hearing on 1st September, 1980 - i.e. about three months later. But without even the least courtesy of communicating F with the court, the learned defence counsel unilaterally absented himself on that day. Meanwhile as on the previous hearing day, almost all prosecution witnesses, including those coming from outside Mtwara Region, had turned up. G Appellant, who was then serving a six month jail term for jumping bail asked for farther adjournment to sometime in January the following year when he would have completed his sentence and hopefully be able to arrange for legal representation. The learned trial magistrate refused that application. With respect, I would not have done otherwise. H

Whether or not to grant an adjournment of a trial is a matter within the discretion of the court; of course like all other discretions, it must be exercised judiciously. In this case, appellant had more than enough time to look for an advocate; in I fact he managed to get one. In refusing the appellant's request, the learned trial magistrate

MSUMI J

A quite rightly pointed out the fact that no reason whatsoever had been communicated to the court why the learned defence counsel did not turn up. If I may be permitted to add that from the trend of the case, it is doubtful whether appellant would have been able to persuade Mr. Putika or any other advocate at all, to defend him even if his request for B such unreasonably long adjournment had been sustained. In the circumstances of the case I think the trial magistrate exercised his discretion quite prudently. In any case, the root cause of his failure to secure legal representation lies right within the exclusive precincts of the appellant himself and his, if I may respectfully be permitted to call him, carefree C advocate. I think I have said enough on this general complaint; let me turn my attention to the main aspect of this appeal.

The undisputed facts of the case were that the appellant was employed by Customs and Excise Department as an Accountant-Cum-Cashier. In the broad term, his work entailed the collection of sundry customs duties from various D clients. And for this, appellant constantly maintained the following books of account: Petty Cash Collectors Receipt Books, Revenue Cash Collectors Books and Bank Paying in Slip Books. The assessment of these duties were being done by other customs officials who were required to reflect the amounts due in what are called "source documents" E which included Sales Tax Entries and Import Duty Entries. Thus appellant was supposed to collect from the customers the amount of money shown in the respective source document. In acknowledgement of these payments appellant issued the customers with the original copies of the cash collectors receipts. The duplicate copies were attached (glued) to the F respective source documents; the triplicate copies were sent to the head office in Dar es Salaam, and the last copies i.e. the quadruplicates were retained in the receipt books which were kept here at Mtwara for office reference. Then at the G end of each day appellant was supposed to enter into Revenue Cash Collectors Book all the collections made on that particular day. And all the money so collected entered in the Revenue Cash Collectors Book was to be banked by the appellant by using Official Bank Paying in Slips. H

It is contended by the prosecution, and disputed by the appellant, that on various dates appellant altered the triplicate and quadruplicate copies of various cash collectors receipts by inserting in them less amount of money than what he had actually collected as reflected in the original and duplicate copies. And furthermore appellant failed to account for the I differences in these collections

A because in the respective Revenue Cash Collectors Book folios and Bank Paying in Slips he reflected the lesser amounts as inserted in the altered triplicate and quadruplicate copies. These allegations form the basis of the offences of forgery, fraudulent false accounting and stealing by public servant on which the appellant was convicted.

B Starting with the forgery counts, the alleged alterations are said to have been made on both triplicate and quadruplicate copies of collectors cash receipts. However, the only copies made available to the court were the quadruplicates which were retained by the collecting office at Mtwara. For unknown reason, none of the corresponding triplicate copies which C were supposed to be at the Customs headquarters in Dar es Salaam were availed to the court. It appears prosecution is assuming that since the obvious reason behind these alterations was to enable the appellant to pocket the differences between the money shown in the original copies and the lesser sums shown in the quadruplicate copies, it necessarily D followed that similar alterations were inserted in the triplicate copies in order to smoke-screen his fraud from the eyes of the auditors at the head office where the said triplicate copies were supposed to be checked for reconciliation of the appellant's account. With respect, appealing as it may sound, such reasoning has no room in criminal law parlance. E Whereas it may reasonably be assumed that appellant made some alterations in these triplicates, it will be taking the assumption too far to hold that those alterations are similar to the ones appearing in the quadruplicate copies. For this reason it would have been prudent if the prosecution had confined their allegations to the quadruplicate copies only. F However, this irregularity notwithstanding, I am of the opinion that appellant has not been prejudiced; he sufficiently knew the nature of the offences with which he was being charged. I think this is a justifiable situation for invoking the provisions of section 346 of the Criminal Procedure Code. G

Apart from the aforementioned irregularity, it is axiomatic that appellant fraudulently altered the quadruplicate receipt copies by showing less amount of money than what he had collected and reflected in the original copies. Evidence shows H amply that it is the appellant who made these alterations. One of the grounds of appeal advanced by the appellant is that prosecution ought to have called a handwriting expert in order to prove that the handwriting and signatures in these offensive quadruplicate copies were those of the appellant. It appears that appellant is no better than the majority of I laymen in harbouring the common erroneous view that the

MSUMI J

A authenticity of a disputable piece of handwriting can only be ascertained by professional observation of a handwriting expert. That is not the law. For the purpose of enabling a court to decide the author of any piece of handwriting in dispute, the opinion of a person who is conversant with the handwriting of the disputing author is as good as, if not B sometimes better than, that of a handwriting expert. In any case, Section 49(1) of the Evidence Act makes admissible opinion evidence of handwriting by anyone acquainted with another's handwriting. Sub-section (2) provides that for the purpose of sub-section (1) a person is said to be acquainted with the handwriting of another person when he has seen C that person write, or when he has received documents purported to be written by himself or under his authority and addressed to that person or when in the course of ordinary business, documents purported to be written by the person have been habitually submitted to him - see R. v Kundansari [1970] H.C.D. 273. Conscious of this provision, D prosecution in this case called as one of their witnesses one Fiden Hussein Rajabali (PW7) who among other things, testified that he was conversant with the handwriting of the appellant and hence identified that the handwriting and signatures in all the quadruplicate copies in issue were that of the appellant. As a basis of his acquaintance with the E handwriting of the appellant, the witness told the court that as the owner of M/S Abassi Clearing and Forwarding House he had close working relation with the appellant since 1978 when he was transferred to Mtwara. And for the whole of that period the witness had seen the appellant writing and signing various documents; and he had seen and dealt with F various documents written and signed by him. In the course of preparing this judgment I went through, leaf after leaf, all the quadruplicate receipt copies retained in the ten booklets produced to court as exhibits. Each booklet contained 50 G quadruplicate copies and for the ten booklets, I have found out that a total of about 60 receipts were issued to M/S Abbas Clearing and Forwarding House, and they covered the period between December, 1977 to September, 1979. No doubt this fact adds weight to the witness claim that he is quite conversant with the handwriting of the appellant. If I H may boldly say that in the particular facts and circumstances of this case, the opinion of this witness is more dependable than that of a handwriting expert. I am thus convinced, like the learned trial magistrate, that the handwriting and signatures in all the quadruplicate copies in question are those of the appellant. I Let me end my discussion on these forgery counts by saying

1986 TLR p153
MSUMI J
A that all the altered quadruplicate receipts are false documents as defined by law. The effect of these alterations is, as is commonly said, to make them tell lies about themselves. On the mere look of them one gets the impression that each of them is a copy of the respective original receipt and that all what is contained in each of them is substantially the same as B that contained in the respective original copy. In other words these quadruplicate receipt copies do not merely contain some false information but they also purport to be what they are not. This is what is technically known as automendacity.
C Now turning to the 22 counts of the fraudulent false accounting; it has come to my notice that the allegation in support of all of them is the same as that on which the forgery counts are founded. For just as in the forgery counts, the particulars of the offence for all these counts are that appellant fraudulently altered the quadruplicate copies of various cash collectors receipts by showing less amount of money than that which has been collected and reflected in the original D copies. What the prosecution is trying to do here is to charge the appellant with two separate offences but both of which are based on the same set of facts. This is wrong; it offends the well settled rule of principle against double E jeopardy as entrenched in section 48 of Interpretation of Laws and General Clauses Act, Cap. 1. The section provides:

48. Where any act constitutes an offence under two or more acts, the offender shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be liable to be prosecuted and punished under either or any of such Acts, but shall not be liable to be punished more than once for F the same offence.

Provision similar to this is embodied in the Kenyan Interpratation and General Provisions Act, Cap.2 as section 63. The G High Court of Kenya, whose decisions are of high pursuasive value to this court, had an occasion to consider this provision in Muiruri v Rep. [1973] E.A.86. In that case Trevelyan, J. was of the opinion that the provision did not only prohibit double punishment, but also double conviction. In other words where a person has been convicted and H sentenced on two or more offences all of which arise from the same set of facts, an appellate court is bound to quash both conviction and sentence on the superfluous count. With respect, this view is consistent with both law and common sense. Confusing as section 48 may seemingly appear, it would amount to compounding this I
MSUMI J
A apparent confusion if courts were to hold that the section prohibits only double punishment and tolerated double conviction. Such absurd interpretation cannot be imputed into the sober minds of our legislators.
Thus reverting to the present case, it was wrong for the trial Court to convict and sentence the appellant on both forgery B and fraudulent false accounting. In fact I have been unable to think of any situation in which a person may conjunctively be charged with forgery and fraudulent false accounting. Just as it is not proper to charge a person conjunctively with obtaining by false pretences and cheating; or receiving stolen property and being found in possession of property C suspected to have been stolen, the same applies to forgery and fraudulent false accounting. The common practice in such situation is to charge the accused in alternative counts. Of course once accused has been convicted on either of the alternative count, no finding should be made on the remaining one. D

It is obvious that in this case the convictions and sentences on the forgery and fraudulent false accounting counts cannot legally coexist with each other; either forgery or fraudulent false accounting has to be quashed. The question then is which one is to give way to the other. It appears that the normal practice is to uphold conviction and sentence on the E graver count. For the following two reasons I am of the opinion that fraudulent false accounting is more serious than forgery. Firstly, whereas the maximum penalty for forgery is imprisonment for seven years, it is fourteen years in the case of fraudulent false accounting. And secondly to constitute fraudulent false accounting, it must be proved, among other F things, that the perpetrator did the alleged offensive act with intent to defraud; whereas in forgery an intent to deceive is enough. These two terms i.e. an intent to defraud and an intent to deceive have different meaning; the former importing G graver criminal sentiment than the latter. Thus in Re London and Globe Finance Corporation [1903] 1 Ch.728, Buckley, J., defined these terms as:

To deceive is, I apprehend, to induce a man to believe that a thing is true which is false, and which the person practicing the deceit H knows and believes to be false. To defraud is to deprive by deceit: it is by deceit to induce a man to act to his own injury. More tersely it may be put, that to deceive is by falsehood to induce a state of mind; to defraud is by deceit to induce a course of action. I

A Hence guided by the general principle that the more serious offence outlives the lesser one, it follows that in this case the 22 counts of fraudulent false accounting must be sustained at the expense of the forgery counts.

Except for the last count, the evidence in support of the remaining 22 counts of stealing by Public Servant is grave and B weighty. The pattern of the appellant's device in all of them is consistent. On various occasions, appellant collected some money from customers and issued them with official cash receipts. But on each occasion he accounted for, and hence banked, less amount than what he had actually collected. He failed to account for the differences of which he was C charged with stealing. The allegation has been supported by the relevant collectors cash receipts, revenue collectors cash book folios, Government Paying in Slips and some "source documents," namely Sales Tax Entries and Import Duty Entries. But it is different with count 67.

D The allegation in this count is that between 29th day of May, 1979 and 24th day of September, 1979 appellant is alleged to have stolen a total sum of Shs.18,404/25 the property of the Government. The only evidence available in support of this allegation is that of one Simon Mukoma (PW14). It has transpired in his evidence that he is employed by E Customs Department and at that time holding the post of Senior Accountant and stationed at the head office in Dar es Salaam. Consequent to the report which led to this case, the witness came to Mtwara and audited the books of account which were being maintained by the appellant. He specifically checked the period from 25/5/79 to 24/9/79. After F totalling all the collections on one side and the amount of money which was either banked by the appellant or by the customers themselves, plus cash and cheques found inpossession, the witness found out that Shs.18,404/25 had not been accounted for. This is the sum of money which appellant is alleged to have stolen. But apart from showing that there was G such a shortage of shs.18,404/25, there is no evidence whatsoever which suggests that this amount was fraudulently converted by the appellant. In a charge of stealing, like the present one, it is not enough for the prosecution just to prove general shortage. All the four customs officials who gave evidence on this count viz. Mathew Kihio (PW1), Analius Mpili H (PW2), Nicetus Mrema (PW4) and Simon Mukoma (PW14) complained that the appellant's books of account were not kept clean and up to date. For example some of the collections were not entered in the Revenue Cash Collectors I book. When on 24/8/79 appellant was ordered to hand over all the

A money he had, he was found with about Shs.9,000/= cash and cheques. But four days later i.e. on 28/79 when PW2 checked him farther, a total of Shs.1,020,615/= both in cash and cheques were recovered from him. There could have been no clearer evidence than this to confirm that appellant's books were really in shambles. In such situation it is likely that the alleged shortage of Shs.18,404/25 might have been more apparent than real. In any case, it is hard to say with B any amount of certainty that appellant stole this sum; if anything I think it is just a shortage arising out of unsatisfactory manner in which appellant maintained his accounts.

C Bearing in mind that the total amount of money alleged to have been stolen is well over 60,000/=, as a whole I think the sentences imposed are but extremely fair. The substantive jail term of six years is well merited in the circumstances of the case. But after sentencing the appellant to the various terms of imprisonment which ranged from one year to the maximum of six years, the learned trial magistrate made the following order: D

Order:

The Republic to recover loss of money from the accused through a Civil Suit". E

Judging from the ranges of jail terms imposed on the 23 counts of stealing by public servant one is left with no doubt that the learned trial magistrate was aware that he was dealing with a case which fell under the Minimum Sentences Act. It is F thus surprising that the clear provision of section 7 of the Act escaped the magistrate's mind. The learned trial magistrate ought to have known that under the Minimum Sentences Act it was mandatory for him to order the appellant compensate the Government the total sums of money which he had stolen - see Republic v Ruth Mgitu [1975] LRT G n.14. Hence his order which purported to advise the Government to institute civil proceedings in order to cover this money is glaringly illegal. It cannot be sustained. Excluding count 67, the total amount of money which appellant stole is shs.60,128/50. Since this money belongs to a specified authority as defined under the Minimum Sentences Act, H compensation order for the same is but mandatory.

In the final analysis therefore, appeal on all the 22 counts of forgery and count number 67 of stealing by public servant is allowed and thus convictions and sentences on all of them are quashed. On the other hand appeal on all the 22 counts of I fraudulent false accounting and the remaining 22 counts of stealing by public servant
A is dismissed and thus appellant is to serve the substantive jail term of six years. The order advising the complainant to resort to civil proceedings in order to recover the money stolen is set aside and instead it is hereby ordered that appellant to compensate the Government of United Republic of Tanzania a total of Shs 60,128/50 being the amount of money which he had embezzled. H The pleading in this action included a "counterclaim" to a counterclaim. The "counterclaim" to the counterclaim in effect raised a distinct cause of action based on contract. In the hearing of the suit the trial judge entertained issues raised in the "counterclaim" to the counterclaim but his judgment was confined to issues other than those raised in the I "counterclaim" to the counterclaim.

A Held: (i) A counterclaim to a counterclaim is a creature unknown to our civil proceedings and pleading;

(ii) the whole trial is null and void because of the fundamental divergence between the improper form of pleading and the evidence adduced at the trial, and that between what was tried and what was finally decreed, and between the B sum decreed as due and the sum allowed in execution proceedings.

Y. Mchora, for the respondent

Mustafa, J.: The action in the High Court commenced with a simple claim. Sekulu Construction Co. Ltd. (the D respondent herein) filed a plaint against one Fubile and the National Insurance Corporation (the appellants herein) claiming that the appellants had unlawfully converted to their own use a concrete mixer and a vibrator machine, the property of the respondent, and claimed general and special damages for such wrong. The respondent prayed for (1) E general damages (ii) special damages amounting to shs.260,820/= (iii) costs of the suit (iv) interest at 9% from date of suit to date of payment (v) a declaration that the respondent is the owner of the said machines. The appellants in their written F statement of defence denied unlawful conversion of the said machines and asserted that they had the right to use them in terms of a contract made between the first appellant and the respondent. The first appellant filed a counterclaim with the statement of defence, and in the counterclaim alleged delay and defective work by the respondent in the construction of a G building in terms of a building contract made between the respondent and the first appellant and claiming from the respondent as a consequence of such breach of contract a sum of shs.722,070.30.

The respondent replied to the statement of defence denying the appellant's right to use the machines, together with a H defence to the counterclaim denying negligence or delay on its part and alleged that it worked properly and with due diligence. The respondent also called in aid an arbitration clause contained in the building contract and demanded that the dispute be referred to arbitration.

Then followed, in the same document, a most unusual claim I

1986 TLR p159

MUSTAFA J

A - headed "counterclaim to second defendant's (i.e. first appellant) counterclaim".

The respondent in this so called counterclaim to a counterclaim alleged that the first appellant had wilfully and unlawfully breached the building contract and claimed from the appellants:

(a) a sum exceeding shs.898,000/= for general damages B

(b) costs of this suit

(c) interest on above at 12% from date of counterclaim until final payment.

Apparently at that stage the pleading ended.

C It will be noticed at once that there is no such thing as a counterclaim to a counterclaim. Such a creature is unknown to our civil proceedings and pleading. We refer to the provisions of Order 8 in the Civil Procedure Code which deal with written statements, set offs and counterclaims.

D As English common law developed, in civil pleadings, briefly speaking, an action begins with a statement of claim, or what we call a plaint, then a written defence is filed, to which a reply is made. In the written defence, a counterclaim can be included, which can be rebutted in the defence filed with the reply. Thereafter, until the court gives permission, no other pleading can be filed. Further pleading may include a rejoinder and then the old ones of surrejoinder, rebutter and E surrebutter, the last three being now perhaps out of use.

In any event there can only be one counterclaim, which in fact is a cross suit, in an action filed. There cannot be two. In F the circumstances the suit in the High Court which resulted in the appeal before us, became very confused, both in its proceedings and in its final decision.

To us it is clear that the original claim was confined to a claim for damages for wrongful use of the respondent's two G pieces of machinery by the appellants. The appellants denied any wrongful use, and counterclaimed for damages for delay and negligent work arising from a building contract. All the respondent could do was to file a defence to the counterclaim denying such allegations: which in fact the respondent did.

H If at that stage the respondent had wanted to sue the appellants for damages for alleged breach of the building contract, the respondent should have applied for leave to amend its plaint and expand it to include such allegations and claims. Or the respondent could perhaps also have filed an action on the building contract alleging breach by the I appellants, and consolidate the two suits,

MUSTAFA J

A assuming the matters in dispute centred on the building contract. But the respondent could not have proceeded in the way he did, by filing a counterclaim to a counterclaim. He was in fact filing two distinct suits based on two separate causes of action, in the first one the respondent was merely suing for damages for wrongful use of his two pieces of B machines, and in the second the respondent was suing for damages for breach of a building contract.

We will examine briefly what happened after the pleading were closed. Three agreed issues were framed:

C 1. Did the 1st defendant convert the concreted mixer and vibrator of the plaintiff in persue (sic) of the contract?

2. Did any part suffer any damages after the termination of the contract.

3. Depending on answer to issue No. 2 - which party was at fault? D

In the course of the trial, and in view of the issues framed, it seems that in a claim for damages for wrongful use of 2 pieces of machinery, a claim for breach of a building contract was adjudicated upon, by a side wind, as it were. There E were averments and counter-averments of who was in breach, whether the appellants were right in determining the contract owing to delay and bad workmanship on the part of the respondent and so on and so forth. The trial judge was obviously confused from the way the trial went, perhaps in view of the state of the pleading. In the course of his judgment F , the judge stated inter alia:

After the termination of the contract, the technical officer (D.W.1) requested the plaintiff to present to the second defendants their claims and the plaintiffs duly complied with this advice and they demanded to be paid Shs. 903,860/= excluding the charges of G hiring machinery such as vibrator and concrete mixer the subject matters of this suit ... (underlining supplied)

H Even at the stage of writing the judgment the judge was of the view that the subject matter of the suit was the alleged wrongful use of the 2 pieces of machinery. Obviously, if that were so, the evidence adduced concerning the alleged breaches of the building contract were really not relevant. At another stage in the judgment the judge stated: I

MUSTAFA J

A The seizure of the machines and the building materials, was, therefore, wrongful and the defendants are liable to pay for damages as prayed and it is so ordered.

And finally towards the end of his judgment, the judge stated: B

The second defendant, therefore, cannot be heard counterclaiming that he spent a lot of money well over Shs. 1 million to complete the building ... Accordingly the counterclaim lodged by the defendants is hereby dismissed with costs. C

Because of the aforesaid, I enter judgment for the plaintiffs as prayed plus costs and interest.

In the evidence adduced at the trial, a number of issues were canvassed, issues not mentioned in the pleading nor specifically referred to in the agreed issues framed. For instance such issues included whether the agreed period for D completion of the building as contained in the building contract was extended by certain acts of the first appellant and what such extended period should be. It appeared that the issue of extension became one of the main bones of E contention between the parties, as it allegedly affected the validity or otherwise of the termination of the contract by the appellants.

In any event the judge in his judgment merely dismissed the counterclaim of the appellants with costs and entered judgment for the respondent as prayed with costs. He did not in fact finally decide on the other matters in controversy F relating to the building contract although he made certain observations in connection with some of them.

The decree as drawn up was consistent with and reflected the judgment and order of the judge. The decree reads: G

The plaintiff prays judgment and decree against the defendants jointly and severally for:

B (i) General damages;

(ii) Special damages amounting to shs. 260,820/=

(iii) Costs of this suit;

(iv) Interest on (i), (ii), (iii) above at 9% p.a. from the date of filing this suit until final payment and delivery.

C (v) A declaration that the plaintiff is the owner of the said machines.

(vi) Any other relief that this court might deem fit to grant.

This case coming on this day for final disposal before Hon.Mtenga, Judge in court in the presence of Mchora Esq., Advocate for the D plaintiff and Musati Esq., Advocate for the defendants.

E IT IS HEREBY ORDERED AND DECREE THAT:

There is no evidence to the effect that this new contractor spent any money in buying additional building materials. The second defendant therefore can not be heard counter claiming that he spent a lot of money well over shs. 1,000,000/= to complete the F building by paying to this second contractor. Accordingly the counter claim lodged by the defendants is hereby dismissed with costs.

Because of the aforesaid judgment is entered for the plaintiff as prayed plus costs and interest. G

"BY THE COURT"

Given under my hand and the seal of the Court this 16th day of June, 1983.

"REGISTRAR" H

It will thus be seen that the decree in favour of the respondent was only for shs. 260,820/= special damages, plus interest and I costs, and a declaration that the respondent is the owner of the said pieces of machinery, in terms of the prayer as contained in the plaint filed

1986 TLR p163

MUSTAFA J

A by the respondent. The appellant's counterclaim was dismissed with costs. There was no sum given for general damages awarded, and the inclusion of the item, general damages, was mere surplusage.

However in the application for execution of the decree dated 5.7.82 (the decree was extracted on 16.6.83) the sum shown as owing for principal was Shs.3,353,983.00. Interest was charged at 10% p.a. from 12.5.77 to 16.6.83 and B amounted to Shs.335,398.30 making a total sum of Shs.3,689,381.30. There was another sum of 2,041,426.10 for interest at 9% from 12.5.77 to 16.6.83. Costs were taxed at 91,037.50, making a total decretal sum of 5,821,844.90.

The application for execution was drawn up and signed by Mr. Mchora, Advocate for the respondent. C

It is crystal clear that the figures shown in the application for execution of the decree have not the slightest connection with the decree as drawn and with the judgment given. Mr. Mchora before us was unable to explain how the figures were arrived at. It is astoishing why there were two sets of interest charged, nor why interest was at 10% on one such amount. D The sums set down would seem to have been the figments of somebody's imagination.

To make matters worse Mr. Mchora stated from the Bar before us that both the Registrar of the High Court and the trial judge had seen and approved the figures in his application for execution. If that were true, we can only say that we find E the whole exercise inconceivable and beyond our comprehension. We thus have a strange state of affairs as revealed in the appeal. The pleading were in a form unknown to our civil proceedings, and were confused and confusing. At the trial F a number of issues were canvassed and evidence was given on them. Some such issues were related to matters vaguely raised in the so-called "counterclaim to a counterclaim". The trial judge in the course of his judgment made remarks and observations on some of these matters raised in the "counterclaim to the counterclaim", but made no final G decisions on them. The judge restricted his final finding to the prayer as contained in the plaint and to the counterclaim by the appellant. It seems to us that the judge in effect, in his judgment and decree, only finally dealt with the pleadings as contained in the plaint, the written statement of defence, the counterclaim and the reply thereto. But the judge did deal H copiously with other issues outside those contained in the pleading ending with the reply in the body of his judgment. In fact the judgment and decree, in a manner of speaking, was at variance with the evidence led and the case as conducted I at the trial as the trial judge did not make any finding on issues on which he

A had adjudicated. That is one unsatisfactory feature.

Then there is the variance between the decree as drawn and the figures contained in the application for execution of the decree. We understand that a garnishee order for the decretal sum as reflected in the application for execution was obtained.

B We had considered whether we could salvage this matter by dealing in this appeal only with the effective part of the proceedings, i.e. the judgment and decree as drawn and the evidence which concerned the matters contained in the pleading ending with the respondents reply and defence to the appellant's counterclaim. Such a step would necessitate the reconciliation of the decretal sum in the execution application with that as reflected in the decree. Such a C reconciliation seems impossible. And in any event, such a course may prejudice one or both the parties in respect of the other substantial matters in controversy in connection with the building contract, matters which the trial judge had heard D evidence on and adjudicated upon, but on some of which he had made no final decision.

We find ourselves in a quandary in this extraordinary and strange situation. We have decided that the only course open to us is to declare the whole trial null and void because of the fundamental divergence between the improper form of E pleading and the evidence adduced at the trial, and that between what was tried and what was finally decreed, and between the sum decreed as due and the sum allowed in execution proceedings.

F In the circumstances we allow the appeal, with no order as to costs. We quash and set aside the judgment and decree of the High Court, and declare the trial a nullity. We also declare, should the parties hereto desire to proceed to law in respect of the matters in controversy between them, that the period between 11th October, 1978, and the date of the G filing of the plaint to the date of this judgment be excluded for purposes of calculation of the period of limitation of actions.

E Rubama, J. :On a plea of guilty to selling goods above the prescribed maximum price c/ss 20 and 26 of the Regulation of Prices Act, 1973, Edward Giriki was convicted and sentenced to three months imprisonment.
F The accused was a first offender, young (18 years) and had readily pleaded guilty to the offence he stood charged with. He had sold two kilos of meat at above the prescribed price. He should have been given the opportunity of paying fine. The trial magistrate in not fining the accused had alluded to the fact that the offence was prevalent and serious and G further that those who get convicted of it readily paid fines. They should not be allowed to get away with it - they must feel the pinch by going to prison. I do not find much merit in the argument. If the fine was felt inadequate for the offence, the National Assembly would have changed the law and make the imposition of prison sentence on those found guilty mandatory. In cases where the courts have a discretion to impose a fine, then worthy cases must be dealt with H accordingly. There is no merit in exposing young ones, such as the accused, to hard core criminals.

The fact that fines are paid when imposed is not by itself reason to impose a prison sentence. It does not stand to reason I to argue that people do not feel the pinch when they pay fines. They
A pay because they want to avoid going to Prisons and this is a different thing from saying that they pay without difficulties. It all depends on the fine; and here the court must be careful not to impose a fine that would really make it unpayable. The purpose of the sentence must be borne in mind. History of sentencing has clearly demonstrated that draconian sentences do not by themselves achieve much. The present tendency of businessmen overpricing has much B deeper causes; one of which is market mechanism - the outcome of the law of demand and supply; courts must not just over react. It must be judicious and see what it needs to achieve. In imprisoning the accused in the case under review, I C see no reformative or deterrent elements in the sentence. It is too short for achieving either of the lofty objectives. As I point out above, the appropriate sentence would have been a fine calculated to meet the case. Granted that the offence was prevalent but the accused was only caught selling two kilos of meat above the prescribed price. The trial magistrate D was not told what was the prescribed maximum either, for all that, the overpricing may not have been much. I do not say this made it less of an offence. No, but it certainly should have been a factor when determining the sentence. I would have revised the sentenceon the lines intimated above if it were not for the fact that the accused had been sentenced on E 5/1/82 and has thus long finished serving the sentence. The proceedings are closed.

[zJDz]Judgment

Mustafa, J.A.: The deceased, Godfrey Enock, was found dead, and part of his body burnt. According to medical evidence, the deceased died of traumatic injuries, resulting from fractured ribs and skull, and the C secondary cause of death was due to burning. Three persons were charged with his murder. One was acquitted and two persons, appellant Elibariki and appellant Hussein Idd were convicted of the murder of the deceased. Both the appellants are appealing D against their convictions. We will refer to appellant Eribariki as Accused 1, and appellant Hussein as Accused 2 in the course of this judgment.

We will deal with Accused 1 first. The evidence against him was given by P.W.3 Jared, P.W.4 Jubilate and P.W.5 Verdiana. E

According to P.W.3, on the material day, i.e. 25.2.83 at about 11.00 a.m. the deceased, a tractor driver, was driving a tractor and came to P.W.3's father's place at Boma Ng'ombe. The tractor belonged to "Mwangi", presumably Shangali. Bricks belonging to Accused 2 were loaded on to the tractor, and P.W.3 helped to load the bricks. Accused 2 F was there also. The tractor left to off load the bricks at Accused 2's place. While off-loading the bricks P.W.3 saw Accused 1 arriving there. Accused 1 allegedly asked the driver, the deceased, to go and help Accused 1 pull his tractor. The driver left with Accused 1 and they went towards Rundugai, with Accused 2 also on board. G

P.W.5, also, on that same morning, saw the deceased and his tractor, on her way to the market. She saw the deceased driver and Accused 2 on the tractor and Accused 1 standing by its side. P.W.4 testified and stated that at about 12.00 H noon when he was on some business around Rundugai forest he saw a tractor coming from behind. He recognised the tractor, which belonged to Mr. Shangali. The tractor passed him, and he saw Accused 1 driving it, and Accused 2, and I another person who was acquitted, also on it. P.W.4 stated he knew them very well. He also saw Accused 2 and the other person sitting on another person who had a rope around his

A neck. P.W. 4 thought that, according to Masai custom, Accused 1 was going to throw the dead body away in the open. The following day, P.W.4 heard that Shangali's tractor and the driver were missing, and 3 days later he came to know that the missing tractor and the body of the dead driver were found. However P.W.4 did not make a report to the B Police until 10.3.81 of what he alleged he had witnessed.

Accused 1 put up a defence of alibi. He stated he was not on that day anywhere near Shangali's tractor. He went to Abisangai farm at Rundugai to plough Abisangai's 7 acres with Accused 1's tractor which was driven by Accused 1's C driver. He was there from morning until evening and was paid shs.1,400/= for the hire of his tractor.

Abisanga, who testified as D.W.1, fully corroborated the evidence of Accused 1.
D Mr. Mwale for Accused 1 submitted that the trial judge erred in allowing P.W.3 to testify without a voire dire. P.W.3 was marked down as 14 years old when he testified, and the judge swore him without a voire dire. In fact it transpired, in the course of P.W.3's evidence, that he was in fact 16 years of age, which means P.W.3 was not at the time he E testified, a child, of tender years. We are satisfied that no prejudice of any kind occurred, and Mr. Mwale's complaint on this point is without merit.
The judge found P.W.3's evidence credible. However he found P.W.3's identification of Accused 1 not reliable, as P.W.3 identified accused 1 only as a Masai. There was no identification parade. Similarly the judge found P.W.5's F identification of Accused 1 unreliable. However he found that PW.4 knew Accused 1 and Accused 2 in Shangali's tractor later at the Rundugai area. The judge found the evidence of P.W.4 highly suspicious, and was prepared to act on it only if P.W.4's evidence was corroborated. It seems that the judge held that the unsatisfactory identification by P.W.3, G and perhaps also P.W.5, corroboration of P.W.4's and perhaps also P.W.5, corroboration of P.W.4's evidence of having seen Accused 1 and Accused 2 on the tractor at the Rundugai area. H
However the judge dealt with the defence of alibi as follows:

P.W.3's evidence thus corroborates P.W.4's evidence that the 1st and 2nd accused were in Charles Shangali's tractor just about one hour after the tractor had been driven off by the accused Hussein from where P.W.3 helped off load bricks from the tractor I trailer. On the basis of this corroborative

A evidence I find that the 1st accused Elibariki and the 2nd accused Hussein Iddi had Charles Shangali's tractor in Rundugai area on 25th February, 1981 around 11.00 a.m. as testified by P.W.4. In view of this finding, it means that I reject the 1st accused's alibi although it is supported by D.W.1. The alibi is a well rehearsed lie. B
It seems clear to us that the judge dealt with the prosecution evidence on its own and arrived at the conclusion that it was true and credible and as a result he rejected the alibi put forward as a deliberate lie. In our view this is a serious misdirection. The judge should have dealt with the prosecution and defence evidence and after analysing such evidence, C the judge should then reach a conclusion. Here Accused 1 was deprived of having his defence properly considered by the judge. In the circumstances we think it unsafe to let the conviction of Accused 1 stand. D
As regards Accused 2, the evidence against him was given by P.W.2 Abdulla, P.W.3, P.W.4, and P.W.5. All these witnesses knew Accused 2 well and there could not be any question of doubt about Accused 2's identity. The judge believed the evidence of P.W.3, and although P.W.4 was found to be rather unreliable, the evidence of P.W.3 corroborated the E evidence of P.W.4. Accused 2 was seen going away in Shangali's tractor by P.W.3, and P.W.4 saw him on the tractor at Rundugai.

P.W.5 also saw Accused 2 on the material morning on Shangali's tractor. P.W.2 heard Accused 2 asking the deceased driver to return to Accused 2 after the deceased driver had dropped the grass cutters travelling on the F tractor.
Accused 2 also put forward an alibi. He denied he was on Shangali's tractor at all. He called a witness Juma D.W.3. However D.W.3 could only supply a partial alibi which left a gap, which did not prevent Accused 2 from committing the G offence, if the prosecution witnesses were believed. We are satisfied that the conviction of Accused 2 was justified, as he failed to explain what happened after he was seen on Shangali's tractor going towards Rundugai, after which the deceased was found dead, obviously murdered. The circumstances pointed inevitably to Accused 2 as being the one or H one of those who had killed the deceased.
In the result we allow the appeal of Accused 1 Elibariki, quash the conviction, set aside the sentence of death, and order that he be released forthwith unless otherwise lawfully detained. We dismiss the appeal of Accused 2 Hussein Iddi. I
Order accordingly.

[zJDz]Judgment

Mustafa, J.A. : The appellant was convicted of murder on purely circumstantial evidence. The G appellant was employed by one Ali Malela to gather honey in a forest. There was evidence that in August, 1980 the appellant went with Ali Malela into the forest to collect honey.

Sometime later, in early September, 1980, the appellant was found in a nearby village not far from the forest selling H plastic buckets of the type used by Ali Malela to collect honey. When the appellant was found by P.W.3, a relative of Ali Malela, the appellant was wearing the clothes belonging to Ali Malela. Ali Malela could not be found, despite a search, and it was assumed by the relatives of Ali Malela that Ali Malela had died or was killed. I

The appellant had told P.W.3 and others that when he left Ali

A Malela, Ali Malela was going in direction of his village Kanoge.

The appellant stated that he had exchanged his old clothes with the clothes of Ali Malela. A search was carried out in the forest, and at a spot in the opposite direction of the village Kanoge, some bone remains were found. It was alleged that the remains were found some 3 or 4 miles from the site of the camp where the appellant and Ali Malela had stayed to collect honey. B

The remains consisted of some pieces of burnt bones, a heart, a kidney, a part of a skull with some hair, and a piece of cloth allegedly belonging to Ali Malela. Apparently the remains were part of something which was burnt. It was also testified to by P.W.5 that on the spot there was an imprint on the ground as of a human being of about the size of Ali C Malela.

Some pieces of the burnt bones were sent to the Government Chemist by the Police for chemical analysis. The report from the Government Chemist stated that it could not be determined whether the bones were human or otherwise. D Nothing else was sent for analysis.

At the trial P.W.5 purported to produce a kidney, a heart and a part of skull with hair. No evidence was led as to who had kept these organs for over two years and where were they kept. In any event the trial judge concluded that they E were human remains, and the remains of Ali Malela.

No explanation was forthcoming as to why these organs were not sent to the Government Chemist for analysis. The facility was available, and some bones were duly sent for that purpose. F

The judge and the assessors were satisfied that Ali Malela was dead, and that the remains discovered in the forest were those of Ali Malela.

The circumstances implicating the appellant were: G

1. that he was last seen with Ali Malela when Ali Malela was alive.
2. that he was found with Ali Malela's clothes, and blanket.
3. that he was selling the plastic buckets of Ali Malela.
4. H that he had told a lie, in that he said he had left Ali Malela going in the direction of his village Kanoge, whereas Ali Malela's remains were found in the opposite direction.

The appellant denied the charge, and said nothing in defence.

In the first place, we are not satisfied that the death of Ali Malela had been conclusively proved. We can see no reason I why
1986 TLR p172
A the kidney and heart and part of the skull with hair were not sent to the Government Chemist for analysis and to discover if they were human remains.
It may well be that the heart and kidney were human remains, as found by the judge. But that evidence is not conclusive, and better and more conclusive evidence in that respect was available and for reasons which are not clear to us, was not B produced. We are not prepared to accept a layman's view that the kidney and heart and part of a skull were human remains in the circumstances. And naturally we cannot therefore conclude that those remains were without doubt those of Ali Malela, who had been killed and burnt. Even if, for the sake of argument, the remains were human and were those C of Ali Malela, there is still insufficient evidence to establish that the appellant must have killed Ali Malela and burnt his corpse. The appellant might have come across the dead body and taken off the clothes and the plastic buckets and told lies in order to suppress discovery of what he had done. Or the appellant might have stolen the articles. These D possibilities cannot be ruled out, and in fact are perhaps equally consistent with the act of killing, as alleged against the appellant.
E Taking these factors into account, we are satisfied that the Republic had not proved that the remains found were human remains, much less that they were the remains of Ali Malela.
We allow the appeal, quash the conviction and set aside the sentence of death imposed, and order that the appellant be released forthwith unless otherwise detained. F

I Contract - Building Contract - Construction of "repetition of default" - Whether repetition of a default can have exclusive reference to the date of its first occurrence.
1986 TLR p173
-Headnote
A The appellant, SUDECO, contracted with the respondents, Builders, for the latter to erect a multistorey building for SUDECO in Dar es Salaam. After proceeding with the works for sometime the respondent Builders defaulted. In terms of Clause 25(1)(b) of the Agreement the Architect served notice of default on the Builders on 7.6.82 on the ground of the B Builders'

"failure to proceed regularly and diligently with the works". On 26th January, 1983 the Architect found that such default was repeated and on 4.2.83 notice was served on the Builders terminating the contract. In April, 1983 the appellant engaged another contractor to erect the building.

C The Builders sued SUDECO for breach of contract. The matter was, in terms of the arbitration clause in the Agreement, eventually referred to an arbitrator who found in favour of SUDECO. On appeal to the High Court it was held that the notice of termination by the appellant, SUDECO, was invalid on the ground that there was no evidence that a repetition of the default had occurred within 10 days when the notice of termination was given. The High Court D reversed the decision of the arbitrator.

On further appeal to the Court of Appeal of Tanzania it was argued for the Builders that there was no evidence that the notice of termination of 4.2.83 was made within 10 days of the repetition of the default. It was not established that the E default discovered on 26th January, 1983 was repeated the first time that day.

Held: (i) a repetition of a default can have no exclusive reference to the date of its first occurrence, it is repeated every time the default occurs; F

(ii) the repetition of a default is the act of the default itself being repeated, and once the default is repeated, then notice of termination within 10 days of such occurrence complies with the provisions of clause 25(1)(b);

1986 TLR p174

MUSTAFA JA

[zJDz]Judgment

A Mustafa, J.A.: The appellant (Sugar Development Corporation, hereinafter called the Corporation) had entered into an agreement with the respondent (Construction Engineers and Builders Limited, hereinafter called the Builders) for the Builders to erect a multistorey building for the Corporation in Dar es Salaam. The Agreement (hereinafter called the B Agreement) was dated 19.9.80, the contractual sum was about 33.5 million shillings, the completion date was 3.1.83, the time for completion was 120 weeks, from 15.9.80 to 3.1.83. Shortly after the Builders had commenced building a variation of the Agreement was made between the Corporation and the Builders by which additional storeys were to be C added to the original building and the price was increased to about 52.7 million shillings and the completion date was extended to 3.7.84. The Agreement was on the lines of the usual Royal Institute of British Architects (R.I.B.A) form of contract.

D In terms of clause 25 (1) (b) of the Agreement the Architect served notice of default on the Builders on 7.6.82 on the ground of the Builders "failure to proceed regularly and diligently with the works". In January, 1983 the Architect found that such default was repeated and on 4.2.83 notice was served on the Builders terminating the contract. In April, 1983 E the Corporation employed another contractor to erect the Building.

The Builders filed a suit in the High Court for breach of contract, and the matter was, in terms of the arbitration clause in the Agreement, eventually referred to a single arbitrator, Mr. A.G.I. Shayo, then President, Institute of Engineers, F Tanzania, for arbitration.

The Arbitrator heard evidence and made his award. The Arbitrator found in favor of the Corporation and the Builders appealed to the High Court alleging misconduct on the part of the Arbitrator and asking for the award to be set aside. G The High Court (Mapigano, J.) held that the notice of termination by the Corporation was invalid and that the Arbitrator had misconducted himself. The judge, apart from remitting the amount claimed for compensation to the Arbitrator for a fresh hearing, in effect set aside the award. From that Ruling the Corporation has appealed to this Court. H

In his award the Arbitrator made a number of findings. The main ones were:

(1) The Builders' responsibility was limited to the scope of works as defined in the original Agreement of 19.9.80 including any I variations that were issued but did not extend to the overall

A increased scope of work. The sum involved would be Shs. 33.54 million less Shs. 8.04 million for supplies and sub-contracts, i.e. Shs.25.5 million only.

(2) The Architect's notice of default dated 7.6.82 was valid.

(3) That there was an element of negligence on the part of the Architect in dealing with applications for extension of time by the Builders. B

(4) The notice of termination of 4.2.83 issued by the Corporation to the Builders was in conformity with the Agreement and was valid.

(5) In view of the finding that the termination was valid there was no point in considering the issue of extension of time. C

(6) The Builders to compensate the Corporation as follows:

(i)	extra cost of completing works	38,384,558.45
(ii)	extra cost of consultant's fee	3,294,409.30 D
		41,678,967.75

(7) The Corporation to return to the Builders the equipment and tools in good condition, fair wear and tear excepted, on the completion of the work. E

The judge found that the Arbitrator had (1) misconstrued clause 25 (1) (b) of the Agreement, and he held that the notice of termination given by the Corporation to the Builders was bad, (2) that the Arbitrator did not adequately consider the Builders' application for extension of time which was of vital importance and (3) the amount awarded to the Corporation F was unwarranted.

He found that the Arbitrator had misconducted himself and he set aside the award and directed G

(a) The Builder's plant, equipment and tools be released forthwith to the Builders.

(b) The award concerning compensation be set aside and will be the subject of a new hearing. H

(c) The costs of the application be borne by the Corporation.

The Corporation appeals to this Court on two main grounds. Mr. Mkude for the Corporation submitted that the judge I had erred in holding first, that the Agreement had been unlawfully terminated

A and secondly that the Arbitrator did not adequately consider the question of extension of time.

On the issue of termination, the point turns on the construction of clause 25 (1) of the Agreement. It reads:

B 25. (1) If the Contractor shall make default in any one or more of the following respects, that is to say:

(a) if he without reasonable cause wholly suspends the carrying out of the Works before completion thereof, or

C (b) if he fails to proceed regularly and diligently with the Works,or

(c) if he refuses or persistently neglects to comply with a written notice from the Architect requiring him to remove defective work or improper materials or goods and by such refusal or neglect the Works are materially affected, or D

(d) if he fails to comply with the provisions of clause 17 of these Conditions,

E then the Architect may give to him a notice by registered post or recorded delivery specifying the default, and if the Contractor either shall continue such default for fourteen days after receipt of such notice or shall at any time thereafter repeat such default (whether previously repeated or not), then the Employer without prejudice to any other rights or remedies, may within ten days after such F continuance or repetition by notice registered post or recorded delivery forthwith terminate the Employment of the Contractor under this Contract, provided that such notice shall not be given unreasonably or vexatiously ... G

The Arbitrator gave detailed reasons for his finding. As regards the notice of default, he was satisfied that the default notice of 7th June, 1982 was reasonably issued, the default being that the Builders failed to proceed regularly and H diligently with the works.

The Arbitrator held that the default was repeated on 26th January, 1983 when, on a site visit, it was discovered that the labour force had dropped from 49 to 12, and there was no foreman on the site. And by a letter of 28th January, 1983, the Builders stated that building on the site had stopped. The notice of termination was given on 4.2.83, within 10 days I of the repetition of the default on

A 26th January, 1983, and 28th January, 1983.

The judge was not satisfied as to when the Builders had repeated the default, which in his view, was crucial, as the notice of termination had to be given within 10 days of the repetition of the default.

B Mr. Lakha for the Builders submitted as follows: First even if the default notice of 7.6.82 was valid, he contended that the notice of termination of 4.2.83 was not made within 10 days of the repetition of the default. He said that there could be no continuance of the default the subject of the notice of 7.6.82, as there was an interval of 8 months; and during such interval the Builders had done satisfactory work. There could only be a repetition. It was not established that the default C discovered on 26th January, 1983 was repeated the first time that day. To be a repetition Mr. Lakha contended that the default must have occurred the first time after a lapse of time. If the occurrence had happened on an earlier date it would be continuation, not a repetition. He emphasised that "continuance" and "repetition" are mutually exclusive, a D continuation cannot be a repetition.

I am not persuaded by this argument, ingenious though it is. If after a default has been established, and it has ceased or E has been remedied, a repetition of such default occurs when it takes place again. It matters not when one becomes aware of the default, whether on the first day it was repeated or on some subsequent date, so long as the default F continues. A repetition of a default can have no exclusive reference to the date of its first occurrence, it is repeated every time the default occurs. The repetition of a default is the act of the default itself being repeated, and once the default is repeated, then a notice of termination within 10 days of such occurrence complies with the provisions of clause 25 (1) (b).

Mr. Lakha also contended that there was no or no sufficient evidence of the default being repeated. The Arbitrator had G relied on two matters for his finding that the default was repeated, (1) the site visit on 26.1.83 and (2) the Builders' letter of 28.1.83. Mr. Lakha submitted that the site visit was referred to only in the final written submission to the Arbitrator made by the Corporation and was not a matter given in evidence. As regards the letter of the Builders Hdated 18.1.83 he submitted that the sentence "the project has come to a standstill", should not be taken out of its context. The Builders were complaining of the attitude and stance adopted by the Architect in respect of the work done by the Builders. I

Mr. Mkude for the Corporation referred to the large number

A of site visits made as mentioned in minutes in the record prepared for the Arbitrator. These were not in dispute and in fact he stated there was evidence adduced before the Arbitrator of such visits. The site visits, at that period, used to be about once every week or ten days. The letter of 28.1.83 clearly established that the work had come to a standstill. B

The Arbitrator was satisfied that the site visit of 26.1.83 did take place. There was certainly evidence to support his finding. He construed the letter of 28.1.83 as evidence that at that time the work on the site had stopped.

C On this point the judge stated that he was not satisfied as to when the Builders repeated the default. In my opinion if he had properly directed his mind to the Arbitrator's finding that such evidence was to be found in the site visit on D 26.1.83 when the labour force had fallen to 12 and the foreman was absent, as well as to the admission in the Builder's Letter of 28.1.83 that work had come to a standstill, I think he would have concluded that the default was repeated on 26.1.83 and 28.1.83. The default, let me repeat, was failure to proceed regularly and diligently with the works".

The notice of termination was given on 4.2.83, within 10 days of the repetition of such default in terms of Clause 25 (1) E (b) of the agreement.

On the issue of extension of time Mr. Lakha submitted that the Arbitrator had found that the Builders had applied to the Architect for extension of time for 377 days. The Arbitrator was of the view that the Builders were entitled to some at F least of those days, and that there was an element of negligence on the part of the architect in dealing with such application for extension of time. I am not at the present concerned with another extension for 254 days which relates to the extra work connected with the variation in the original Agreement. Mr. Lakha submitted that if the Builders were G granted the full extension of time applied for, it could be found that there was no undue delay by the Builders in carrying out their building work. He went into figures and time frames and sought to establish that if the Builders had obtained such full extension there would be no default. He contended that the Arbitrator ought to have decided how much extra H time was due to the Builders, so as to assess the progress of the work done, but the Arbitrator had failed to do so. He submitted that this matter of extension of time should be remitted to the Arbitrator for a fresh hearing. From Mr. Lakha's arithematical calculation he estimated that at the time the Agreement was I

A terminated about two thirds of the work in the original Agreement had been completed.

Mr. Mkude, from his arithmetical calculation, claimed that by the time the agreement was terminated, only one third of the work in the original Agreement was completed. He maintained that in any event the default was basically concerned with B the progress aspect of the work, that work had to be done "regularly and diligently". The issue of when the work was to be completed has to be viewed in the context of the progress of the work being carried out "regularly and diligently". The evidence, he contended, established that work had come to a standstill on 18.1.83. The issue of extension of time C was not of importance in the numerical context, but in the context of the concept of proceeding with the work "regularly and diligently". He admitted that there was no evidence based on quantities about the portion of work completed when the Agreement was terminated. The estimates given were based on the amounts of money paid and the balance remaining unpaid. D

On the question of extension of time the judge was of the view that it was of vital importance and deserved a "deep and careful consideration". He thought that if the Arbitrator had granted the full extension of time asked for by the Builders, E he would have dismissed the Corporation's contention that he had committed the default of failing "to proceed regularly and diligently with the works". The judge did not hold that the claim for extension was well-founded, but he held that the F Arbitrator did not adequately consider this issue. The judge however had held that the notice of termination was bad on the ground that there was no evidence that a repetition of the default had occurred within 10 days when the notice of termination was given. He did not link this question of the extension of time directly with the issue of the validity or otherwise of the notice of termination. G

The Arbitrator dealt in great detail in his award with the extension of time issue. He dealt with it when considering the issue of extension of time proper and in connection with the issue of the validity of the notice of termination of 4.2.83. He considered the reasons for some of the extra time asked for as being due to lack of materials, and he concluded that the H "conditions which existed during the contract period as far as the availability of the said material is concerned, were not different from those that existed in 1981, when the Contractor prepared his tender bid". He went carefully into the arguments and submissions put forward by the parties, and the Arbitrator devoted several pages in his award to this I matter.

MUSTAFA JA

A The Arbitrator took into account all the relevant factors, and in arriving at his conclusion he took note of the extension of time claimed by the Builders, the reasons advanced by the Builders for the rate of progress and so on and so forth. The Arbitrator was experienced in the matters in dispute between the parties, and he gave sound reasons for his conclusion. I can find nothing that indicated that the Arbitrator had misdirected himself or had gone wrong, and, for my B part, I am satisfied that the Arbitrator was entitled, on the evidence before him, to have reached the conclusion that despite the right of the Builders to some of the extra time he had asked for, it would not have really mattered for it was C clear that the Builders had failed to proceed regularly and diligently with the works. I do not agree with the judge when he found that the Arbitrator did not adequately consider the Builders' application for extension of time. In my view that point was adequately considered by the Arbitrator. D

I now come to the matter of the monetary award made by the Arbitrator. The judge found that the said award was unwarranted and directed that this issue be remitted to the Arbitrator for a fresh hearing. I think the judge was right. The Arbitrator had clearly erred in his assessment of the sum found due to the Corporation. He gave no clear indication as to E how he had arrived at his figure. Mr. Lakha submitted, and Mr. Mkude eventually agreed, that this matter be remitted for a fresh hearing.

In deciding this matter of the monetary award the Arbitrator should take into account the following, among other, factors: F

(1) The Arbitrator had clearly found that the Builders' responsibility was limited to about 25.5 million shillings (to the scope of works as defined in the original Agreement)

G (2) The Builders had been paid about 12.8 million shillings for work done, leaving a balance of about the same sum.

(3) The sum paid to the Builders includes some of the extra work as contained in the variation to the original Agreement.

(4) An estimate has to be made as to when the works in the original Agreement would be completed if they have not yet been completed. In this connection, it must be kept in mind that, the new contractor would be erecting on the basis of the H Agreement as varied including the extra work. Any extra time due to the Builders has to be computed and taken into account. I

(5) If there is an element of inflation in connection with the

1986 TLR p181

MUSTAFA JA

A cost of the uncompleted work in the original Agreement, the escalation due to inflation assessed at 15% as contained in page 145 of the record of appeal will be of relevance.

(6) Whether liquidated damages at Shs.6,000/= per day of delay as contained in Clause 22 of the Agreement is applicable.

B In connection with the Builders' plant, equipment and tools, the judge had ordered them to be released by the Corporation to the Builders "forthwith", i.e. on the date of his judgment, 21st September, 1985. The judge made that order probably on the ground that the termination notice was invalid. That order of the judge cannot now stand and I C would restore the order of the Arbitrator on this matter. In any event the Arbitrator will have to fix a completion date in respect of the uncompleted work involved in the original Agreement, either actual or notional. The return of such plant and equipment would be related to such a date. D

In the final analysis, I would set aside the order and ruling of Mapigano, J., except for his order that the award in respect of monetary compensation made by the Arbitrator in his Award be set aside and be the subject of a fresh hearing.

I would restore the findings of the Arbitrator that the notice of default of 7.6.82 and the notice of termination of 4.2.83 E were valid and legal. I also would restore the order of the Arbitrator that the costs of the Arbitration before him be borne by the Builders, as well as his order in respect of equipment and plant.

F In regard to the fresh hearing on the issue of the monetary award, I would order that the matter be arbitrated by the same Arbitrator in terms of Section 14 of the Arbitration Ordinance. He should file his award within 3 months of the date of the order remitting the award. The Arbitrator should take note of the factors in regard to the monetary award mentioned earlier in this judgment. G

In the result in my opinion, the appellant has succeeded to the extent as above stated. I would award the appellant half the costs of this appeal. I would not certify for two advocates. I would make no order in respect of the costs in the High Court.

As the other members of the Court agree, it is so ordered. H petition", and asked for costs for the application. The learned trial judge, the late Maganga, J., in his ruling B agreed to strike out three grounds in the petition as he was of the view that two of the grounds were repetitive of other grounds and the third was superfluous. Furthermore he directed under the provisions of Rule 27(2) of the Elections C (Election Petition) Rules, 1971 read together with Order 6 Rule 4 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1966 further and better particulars to be given by the petitioner within 14 days. Finally, he ordered each party to bear his costs. The petitioner complied with the Court's directions. The first respondent to the petition was however not fully satisfied with the D outcome of his application, and he sought and obtained leave of the High Court to appeal to this Court under the provisions of Section 4(1)(c) of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1979.

The appellant is represented by Mr. Lakha and Maruma learned Advocates, whereas Mr. Mkatte, learned Advocate E from Mkono & Company, Advocates, has been briefed to represent the first respondent in the appeal, apparently on behalf of Shayo Jonathan & Company, Advocates, Mr. Chenge, learned Principal State Attorney, appeared for the Attorney-General, who is the second respondent in this appeal. F

The petition originally filed in the High Court contains seven grounds of complaint enumerated in paragraphs 4(1) to 4(7) of the petition. These read as follows:

4. The Petitioner seeks to nullify the election of the first respondent as the Member of Parliament for the Rombo Constituency on the following grounds, among others to be argued at the hearing: G

(1) That the first respondent by himself and by agents conducted secret campaigns before and during the period designated for the official campaign or purposes of the elections; H

(2) That influential clergymen and priests within the Constituency campaigned for the first respondent before and during the official campaign in Churches; I

A (3) That the Petitioner was not accorded a fair and equal opportunity on expounding on the party Manifesto at meetings held in the Constituency for purposes of the campaign;

(4) That the official campaign meetings were disrupted by supporters of the first respondent so much so that the B Petitioner could not expound the Manifesto to potential voters who attended campaign meetings;

(5) Organisers of the official campaign did not take appropriate measures to stop supporters of the first respondent from disrupting campaign meetings; C

(6) That the first respondent, before and during campaign meetings, corruptly made promises, paid money and promised other enticements to potential voters;

(7) That the first respondent committed certain acts of corruption before and during the official election campaign. D

It is grounds 4(3), 4(5) and 4(7) that were ordered struck out by the High Court as a result of the Appellant's preliminary application. With regard to grounds 4(1), 4(2) and 4(6), the court ordered particulars to be given concerning the period E during which the alleged illegal campaigns or corrupt practices occurred. It ordered further that particulars be given concerning the location of the Churches where the illegal campaigns stated in ground 4(2) took place; and also the location where the official campaigns were disrupted as alleged in ground 4(4). F

In his Memorandum of Appeal, the appellant lists various grounds of complaint against the decision of the High Court as follows:

G 1. With regard to ground 4(1) of the Petition the learned High Court Judge erred in law in failing to order that particulars ought to have been given of:

H (a) The agents who are alleged to have conducted secret campaigns;

(b) The places where secret campaigns were carried out;

(c) The dates on which the secret campaigns were carried out during the official campaign;

I (d) The precise character of the secret campaigns of which complaint is made.

A 2. In respect of ground 4(2) of the Petition the learned High Court Judge ought to have ordered particulars to be furnished of

(a) The exact names and addresses of the clergymen;

B (b) The dates on which they conducted campaigns whether on before or during the official campaign;

(c) The precise character of the secret campaign.

3. With regard to ground 4(6) of the Petition the learned Judge erred in law in that he failed to order particulars of: C

(a) The dates on which corruption was committed;

(b) Precise character of corruption on each occasion;

(c) The exact promises that were made and to whom;

(d) The amount of money that was paid; D

(e) The other enticements promised.

4. The learned High Court Judge erred in law in holding that each party should bear its own costs.

E Mr. Mkatte, learned Advocate, has resisted this move mainly on the basis that the particulars sought in this appeal are matters of evidence and not of facts. He has further submitted that the giving of these particulars will result in the disclosure of witnesses whom the appellant could approach and interfere Fwith.

Mr. Chenge for Attorney-General informed this Court that although the Attorney-General appeared as the 2nd respondent in this appeal, he was fully supporting the stand taken by the appellant for purposes of this appeal.

G The main issue in this appeal is whether the particulars sought by the appellant ought to have been ordered by the High Court to be given in the petition.

The legal position concerning the giving of particulars of allegations made in an election petition case is stated under Order 6 Rules 4 and 5 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1966 which apply to election petition cases by virtue of the provisions of H Rule 26 of the Elections (Election Petitions) Rules, 1971. Since Order 6 Rules 4 and 5 are exact reproductions of corresponding provisions of the Indian Civil Procedure Code, 1908, the commentaries to the Indian Code as well as the decisions by competent Indian Courts are undoubtedly of great value and assistance to us here in understanding I

NYALALI CJ, MUSTAFA JJA, KISANGA JJA

A the relevant provisions of our Civil Procedure Code. Similar values attach to English authorities, since in the final analysis, the Indian Civil Procedure Code, 1908, was an application of English law to the sub-continent of India.

Under Order 6 Rule 4 of our Civil Procedure Code, it is mandatory to state in the pleading the particulars necessary to B substantiate any allegation. Under Rule 5, further and better particulars may be ordered by the court, subject to terms, such as costs, as may appear just.

In the Commentary to the corresponding Rule 4 of Order 6 of the Indian Civil Procedure Code, 1908, in Sarkar's Civil C Procedure Code, Eigth Edition, Vol. I, it is stated, "The object of this rule is to furnish the opposite party with such particulars regarding the suit as are necessary to enable him to find out what case he has to meet. It is but right and proper that each party should have any and every particular that will enable him to know his opponent's case and D prepare himself accordingly, but he is not entitled to have any information as to the evidence by which they are intended to be proved..."

Furthermore, the Commentary cites the English case of Humphries & Co. v The Taylor Drug Co. 39 Ch. D. 693, 695 E where it was stated, "The courts have uniformly endeavoured to prevent the plaintiff, or the defendant, as the case may be, from prying into the brief of his opponent or finding out which is to be the evidence which is to be produced at the trial. On the other hand the Courts have uniformly said that the plaintiff or the defendant is entitled to be told any and F every particular which will enable him prepare his case for the trial, so that he may not be taken by surprise".

Two More English decisions, that is in the case of Zierenberg v Labourchere (1893) 2Q.B. 183: and Marriot v Chamberlain, 17 QBD.154 are cited in support of the proposition that names of witnesses have to be given if the names G constitute material facts.

Looking at these authorities, it is apparent that the basis for the rule requiring the giving of particulars necessary to substantiate allegations made in pleadings is the need to ensure a fair and expeditious trial. As stated in Halsbury's Laws H of England, 4th Edition, Vol 36, paragraph 38, "The function of particulars is to carry into operation the overriding principle that the litigation between the parties, and particularly the trial, should be conducted fairly, openly and without surprises, and incidentally to reduce costs".

I The first question which arises is whether the particulars sought are matters of evidence rather than of facts. It is clear that

NYALALI CJ, MUSTAFA JJA, KISANGA JJA

A the appellant seeks to know, firstly, the names of persons who it is alleged illegally campaigned for the appellant; secondly, the places and dates where the illegal campaigns occurred; thirdly the precise character of such illegal campaigns; fourthly, the dates, character and the amount of money involved in the corrupt practices allegedly committed B in connection with the election campaign; and finally, the specific enticements, promises and promises as alleged in the petition.

Obviously the identity of the persons allegedly involved in the illegal campaigns will have to be established by evidence adduced at the trial. Such identity therefore is not the same thing as the evidence needed to prove it, but is a fact to be C proved. The same thing can be said about the places and dates in question, the precise character of the illegal campaigns, the precise character of the alleged corrupt practices, the amount of money corruptly paid and the exact corrupt promises and other enticement allegedly promised. The finding therefore on this question must be that the particulars sought by the D appellant are not matters of evidence but matters of fact.

The next question that arises is whether these particulars are necessary to substantiate the relevant allegations made in the petition. With regard to the names of the alleged agents, Mr. Mkatte conceded that not all the appellant's agents are E implicated in the illegal campaigns. That being the position, it is only fair that the appellant be informed who among his many agents are implicated, so that he does not undergo unnecessary trouble in preparing his defence. The same can be F said about the unnamed clergymen. As to the location of the alleged illegal campaigns, it is undisputed that the entire electioneering covered a very wide area in Rombo Constituency. The petitioner does not allege that all the election campaigns were illegal. That being the position, it is only fair that the appellant be informed which of these campaigns are G the subject of the complaints and this can be done by specifying the places and dates of the illegal campaigns.

As to the exact character of the alleged illegal campaigns, this is obviously a material or necessary particular, because the H illegality is determined to a large extent by the nature of the act or conduct complained of. It is not every act or conduct which constitutes an illegal campaign. So, it is only fair that the appellant should know the exact character of the alleged illegal campaigns.

In my considered view, the reasons supporting the requirement to specify the dates, places and character of the alleged I illegal

1986 TLR p188

NYALALI CJ, MUSTAFA JJA, KISANGA JJA

A campaigns, also apply to the requirement to specify the dates and character of the corrupt practices, promises and enticements mentioned in ground 4(6) of the petition.

It is clear therefore that the High Court ought to have ordered the particulars now sought by the appellant to be given. B Under section 3(2) of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1979, this court has, "in addition to any other power, authority and jurisdiction conferred by this Act, ... the power, authority and jurisdiction vested in the court from which the appeal is brought". It is proper that this Court orders the particulars sought by the appellant be given in the petition within a period C to be fixed by the court. But before doing so, there is the question of costs in the High Court.

As already mentioned, the High Court directed each party to bear his costs. The appellant is aggrieved by that decision. Mr. Lakha has submitted that an order for costs ought to have been made in the appellant's favor, since practically half of D the grounds were struck off as prayed by the appellant. With due respect to Mr. Lakha, there is a misconception on his part. One has only to recall the reasons given by Maganga, J. to realize what I mean. The learned Judge struck off grounds 4(3), 4(5) and 4(7) for being repetitive or superfluous. In other words, these grounds were sufficiently covered E in other grounds which were not struck off. Clearly the appellant did not succeed in getting anything which he had sought in his application. The appellant has no ground to complain against the order as to costs. But since he has substantially succeeded on the other matters of this appeal he shall have his costs in this Court which shall have to be F taxed.

Since my learned brothers Mustafa, J.A. and Kisanga, J.A. agree with me on the outcome of this appeal, it is hereby directed the appeal be allowed with costs and the particulars sought by the appellant be given in the petition within fourteen days from today. G

Appeal allowed.

H Kisanga, J.A. : The background to this appeal and the issue for determination have been set out in the judgment of my Lord Chief Justice which I have had the advantage of reading in draft, and so I need not repeat them here.

I agree that the names of the agents who allegedly conducted secret campaigns for the appellant are matters of fact which I ought to be disclosed at the pleadings stage so as to enable the appellant

A to know his opponent's case, and to prepare his defence accordingly. If the names of such agents are withheld and are disclosed only at the trial, this would tend to take the appellant by surprise. It might lead to, among other things, the appellant seeking adjournment in order to prepare possible defences such as alibi. That would certainly hamper a fair and expeditious trial. Mr. Mkatte's contention that disclosure of the names of such agents at the pleadings stage would B or might lead to the appellant interfering with those agents does not seem to hold much water. It would appear that if the appellant is minded to interfere with the agents as alleged, he could do so whether such agents are disclosed at the C pleadings stage or only subsequently; more so especially because the said agents are his own. In such circumstances perhaps it is best to take the view that the appellant will consider himself a person of sufficient integrity who would not allow himself to engage in that kind of thing.

D Likewise, I agree that the dates and places of the alleged illegal campaigns, the precise character of such campaigns and the alleged other enticements and corrupt promises are matters of fact which ought to have been ordered by way of further particulars. In this respect it is pertinent to note that the learned Advocate for the second respondent, the Attorney-General, unhesitatingly conceded to this view. In these circumstances, I accordingly agree with the proposed E order by the learned Chief Justice for further particulars.

On the issue of costs, I also agree with the order, proposed by the Chief Justice and the reasons assigned thereto, that the order of the High Court that each party bears his own costs of the application should not be disturbed, but that the F appellant shall have his costs of this appeal.
Order accordingly.
G Mustafa, J.A. : I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment prepared by the Chief Justice in draft and I agree with it. I will only say a few words.
There are no precise rules concerning what particulars are to be furnished to the other party but the general principle is clear. It is that only material facts constituting a party's case, not the evidence in support thereof, are given. And if H names and dates and other matters form part of such material facts, then such particulars would be ordered. What particulars should be ordered would depend on the facts of each case. As I have said, the principle is clear, but its I application can often be quite difficult.
1986 TLr p190
A In this case I am satisfied that the particulars asked for by the appellant are necessary for the fair conduct of his case and to prevent him from being taken by surprise. I concur in the order proposed by the Chief Justice.
Order accordingly. B

After convicting the accused of, inter alia, causing a motor vehicle to be used on a road without a certificate of insurance and using a goods vehicle without transport licence, the trial magistrate purporting to rely on a High Court decision G imposed lenient sentences and failed to comply with a mandatory requirement to disqualify the accused from holding or obtaining a driving licence for some period. The High Court ordered revision.

H Held: (i) While the primary duty to have a policy of insurance for motor vehicles in respect of third party lies with the owner of the motor vehicle the law makes it unlawful for anybody to use or to cause or permit any other person to use a motor vehicle on a road unless the motor vehicle has an insurance or third party insurance cover; I

Cases referred to:

1. R. v Athumani Saidi [1967] HCD 20.

D Rubama, J.: Sebastian Ndomba was convicted of four offences: failing to fix a plate number (identification marks) c/s 14(1) and (5) of the Road Traffic Act, 1973, secondly causing a motor vehicle to be used on the road without a certificate of insurance c/s 4(1) and (2) of the Motor Vehicles Insurance Ordinance, Cap. 169, thirdly E using a goods vehicle without transport licence c/s 10(1)(a)(2) and (7) of the Transport Licensing Act, 1973 and fourthly failing to bring motor vehicle to the Police Station after being ordered to do so c/ss 87 and 113(1) and (2) of the Road Traffic Act, 1973. Fine of shs.100/= or one month imprisonment in default was imposed in respect of the first to F third counts and shs.200/= or one month imprisonment was imposed in respect of the fourth offence.

I ordered revisional proceedings for the following reasons: the imposed sentences did not reflect the seriousness of the offences and that the accused was not disqualified from holding or obtaining a driving licence for some period in G conformity with s.4(2) of the Motor Vehicles Insurance Ordinance. The trial magistrate in imposing these sentences had thought he was correctly interpreting a decision of this court. He stated: H

In the case of R v Athumani Said [1967] HCD 20 it was held that the primary duty with respect to motor vehicle rests with owner not driver. The driver should not be fined heavily. The accused is not the owner of the motor vehicle and I

RUBAMA J

A according to this case quoted above, he should not be heavily fined as the primary duty with respect to the motor vehicle does not lie on him.

With respect the learned trial magistrate misinterpreted the case he quoted. What was stated in the quoted case was that B the "primary responsibility for obtaining a vehicle licence [rested] with the owner of the vehicle, and a fine of shs.150/= [was] excessive when applied to a mere driver." (emphasis supplied). The case did not say that the primary duty with respect to motor vehicle rested with the owner and not with the driver as the learned trial magistrate stated. True the C primary duty of maintaining a motor vehicle in good repair or for that matter, for fixing a plate number (identification marks) or for obtaining a road licence or motor vehicle insurance rests on the owner of the motor vehicle. But there are D several other duties involving a motor vehicle usage that primarily lie on the driver. To quote the obvious to highlight the point, the primary duty of driving on a public road carefully and with consideration to other road users lies with the driver and not the owner of the motor vehicle being driven.

E While accepting the fact that the primary duty for fixing a plate number for identification purposes lay with the owner of the motor vehicle, I do not subscribe to the view that a very small sentence that amounts to a no sentence be imposed on the driver of such a motor vehicle. Granted the driver may not easily notice defects in a motor vehicle when he takes it F out for a drive but he would definitely know at once that the motor vehicle he is about to drive has no identification marks. It does not need a genious to know that driving such a motor vehicle was an offence. For anybody who so arrogantly sets out to commit such an offence, the sentence to be imposed has got to reflect the abhorrence of the society G for the act done. A sentence of shs.100/= was very low.

The case of R. v Athumani Said (supra) does not have the general application that the trial magistrate had conferred to it. Even in some cases where the primary duty is on the owners of motor vehicles, statutes have come in to specify that the consequences of breaching such laid down duties are equally shared by the owners of the motor vehicles and their H drivers. I will deal with two such cases that are relevant to the case under review. The accused was fined shs.100/= or one month imprisonment in default for driving a motor vehicle without a motor vehicle insurance cover because the I

RUBAMA J

A primary duty to buy the motor vehicle insurance lay on the owner. With respect, the trial magistrate had misdirected himself. S.4(1) of the Motor Vehicles Insurance Ordinance states:

> ... it shall not be lawful for any person to use, or to cause or permit any other person to use, a motor vehicle on a road unless there B is in force in relation to the use of the vehicle by that person or that other person, as the case may be, such a policy of insurance or such a security in respect of third party risks as complies with the requirements of this Ordinance.

C Mark the use of the words "for any person". Ownership is not in issue here. So while granting that the primary duty to have a policy of insurance or such a security in respect of third party for motor vehicles lies on the owner of the motor vehicle, the law makes it unlawful for anybody to use, or to cause or permit any other person to use a motor vehicle on a D road (mark you "a road" and not necessarily "a public road") unless the motor vehicle has an insurance or third party insurance cover. Equally general is the section of the law that sets out the sentence for any one contravening the law in that matter. Opening sentence of s.4(2) of the Motor Vehicles Insurance Ordinance states: E

If a person acts in contravention of this section he shall be liable to a ...

F My interpretation of s.4(1) and (2) of the Motor Vehicles Insurance Ordinance is that the consequences of driving a motor vehicle which has no insurance cover is equally borne by the owner or anybody in control of the motor vehicle and the driver of the motor vehicle irrespective of his status. The seriousness of the breaching of the law in this respect is not G lessened by the fact that the driver may not be the one with the primary duty of buying an insurance cover for the said motor vehicle. The trial magistrate had therefore misdirected himself in passing a very lenient sentence on the accused on this charge. H

The import of s.10(1) (a) (2) of the Transport Licensing Act, 1973 is at all four with s.4(1) of the Motor Vehicles Insurance Ordinance. The responsibility to see to it that a goods vehicle or a public service vehicle shall be used for the carriage of goods for hire or reward or in connection with any trade or business carried I

RUBAMA J

A on by a person in accordance with the terms of a licence as issued under the Transport Licensing Act, 1973 has not been primarily put on the owner alone. Section. 10(1)(a) (2) and (7) spreads this primary obligation to a wider range of people. The definition of "owner" under the Act is wider and covers those who have rented the motor vehicle. An B `owner' in relation to a vehicle which is the subject of hiring agreement or hire purchase agreement means "the person in lawful possession of the vehicle under that agreement" while the status of a driver even when employed as such has been elevated to a level that would make it difficult for him to plead for leniency on account of his having broken the law in the C course of his employment. The law has made it his primary duty to see that the motor vehicle he drives has the requisite licence. For s.10(2) of the Transport Licensing Act, 1973 provides:

D When a goods vehicle is being used on a road for the carriage of goods or a motor vehicle is being used for the carriage of person, the driver of the vehicle, if it belongs to him or is in his possession under an agreement for hire, hire purchase or loan, and, in any other case, the person in whose ownership or possession the vehicle is, shall for the purpose of this Act be deemed to E be the person by whom the vehicle is being used.

Section 10(7) of the Transport Licensing Act, 1973 which provides for the punishment is equally in general terms. Its F opening sentence reads:

If any person uses a motor vehicle in contravention of this section he shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable on conviction ... G

Mark the use of the words "any person uses a motor vehicle" and if these are read, as they should be, together with what the law deems to be the user of the vehicle at given instances as stated in s.10(2) of the Act, then one is made to H understand that no leniency is to be shown when passing sentence to a mere driver only because he is an employee. Leniency may of course be shown to such a person but for reasons other than the fact that the primary duty to buy or obtain appropriate licence under the Transport Licensing Act, 1973 lied on the owner of the motor vehicle. The Act I specifically forbids such an approach. The trial magistrate had

RUBAMA J

A therefore misdirected himself when he took this very factor into consideration when sentencing the accused after convicting him, for having used a motor vehicle in contravention of s.10(1)(a) and (2).

I have, I hope, made it clear that the case of R. v Athumani Saidi (supra) is not applicable in every case where a driver is convicted of a traffic offence either under the Road Traffic Act, 1973, the Transport Licensing Act, 1973, the Motor B Vehicles Insurance Ordinance, Cap.169 or any other law. True the duty to maintain a motor vehicle in good repair or obtaining a road licence for it rests on the owner of the motor vehicle and that a trial court when passing sentence to a C mere driver has to bear this as a mitigating factor. But the accused could not say that he needed the permission of the owner of the motor vehicle he was driving to comply with a police order given to him personally. The accused was duty bound to send the motor vehicle to the police. He needed no permission of his employer to comply with this order. The D trial magistrate had therefore grossly misdirected himself in passing a lenient sentence on the basis of this court's authority.

Another thing. The trial magistrate had not complied fully with s.4(2) of the motor Vehicles Insurance Ordinance. The E accused was not called upon to state why he should not be disqualified from holding or obtaining a driving licence for a period of twelve months from the date of the conviction. This mandatory sanction in the absence of special reasons was overlooked.

F I had evaluated the need for revising the sentences upwards to give them the teeth they so obviously lacked. Because of the time lapse, I had thought for sometime of leaving them as they were, but that would be wrong. The trial magistrate had seriously misdirected himself on this issue. Accordingly I set aside the sentences imposed on all the four offences and substitute the following sentences: G

2nd offence: 500/= or three months imprisonment in default.
3rd offence: 1,500/= or five months imprisonment in default. H
4th offence: 1,500/= or five months imprisonment in default.
5th offence: 1,000/= or four months imprisonment in default. I

1986 TLR p196

A The accused is also disqualified from holding or obtaining a driving licence for a period of twelve months effective his date of conviction, i.e. 7.10.85.

Order accordingly.

Rutashobya, for the appellant
D'Souza and Mrema for the respondents

[zJDz]Judgment

H Mustafa, J.A.: This matter arose from a Probate and Administration Cause No. 16 of 1983. Anand Singh died and by his will appointed one of his sons, Mohinder Singh as his executor. Probate was granted to Mohinder Singh on 2.2.1984.

I One Amina Rashidi was apparently living with the deceased Anand Singh before Anand Singh died. Two children were born

A during such association, and these two children were minors, and had been included in the list of beneficiaries to the estate along with other issue. Amina Rashidi was not a beneficiary, but she was the guardian of the two minor children born to her.

Sometime in May, 1985 in Miscellaneous Civil Application No. 65 of 1985 Mohinder Singh, the executor, applied for an B injunction to issue in the High Court restraining Amina Rashidi from intermeddling with the estate, among other prayers. The application was successful and the court issued the necessary orders on 11.7.1985.

C Two other beneficiaries, Ardensina and Chausiku in or about November, 1984 filed an application in the High Court concerning the alleged intermeddling by Amina Rashidi in the estate and order for of a property, a building on Plot 19, Block G, Area F, Arusha was made as a result by the High Court.

D The said plot 19 was duly sold to one Alwi Shariff for Shs. 450,000/= and the proceeds were distributed or to be distributed to the beneficiaries under the will. The sale to Alwi Shariff was sanctioned by High Court.

It appears that Amina Rashidi was occupying the building on Plot 19 purchased by Alwi Shariff. Alwi in Miscellaneous Civil Application No. 66 of 1985 sought and obtained an eviction order in the High Court against Amina Rashid, and E Amina was duly evicted. The eviction order was dated 11.7.85.

Then it would seem that Amina Rashidi had filed an application supported by an affidavit on or about 10.7.85 to set aside the sale of Plot 19 and for permission for her to purchase on a re-sale. That application Miscellaneous Civil Application F No. 67 of 1985 is still pending.

Amina Rashidi has filed an appeal, in fact two appeals which apparently were consolidated, into one. It is a vague appeal, and is not clear so far as the grounds of appeal are concerned. It would seem that Amina Rashidi was seeking a G reversal of the order of the High Court granted to the executor Mohinder Singh on 11.7.85. It was an application restraining Amina Rashidi from intermeddling with the estate. The other prayer would appear to be for a reversal of the H order of the High Court confirming the sale of the building on Plot 19 to Alwi Shariff. The grounds advanced were that the High Court had made the orders in the absence of Amina Rashid, after the advocate representing her had withdrawn with leave of the court. The other ground was that Amina Rashidi was not notified of the sale of Plot 19. I

MUSTAFA JJA, MAKAME JJA, OMAR JJA

A Now the orders of the High Court Amina Rashidi seeks to overturn were made on 11.7.85.

Mr. D'Souza and Mr. Mrema for the respondents Mohinder Singh and Alwi Shariff have filed preliminary objections. Mr. D'Souza submitted that the notices of appeal were filed out of time, in fact filed after 42 days instead of 14 days in B terms of Rule 76 of the Court of Appeal Rules. To that Mr. Rutashobya for Amina stated that Amina knew of the High Court order on 9th August, 1985, and had filed the notice of appeal on 23rd August, 1985 in time. There is no affidavit filed by Amina that she had come to know of the High Court order on 9th August, 1985; that statement was merely C contained in the notice of appeal itself.

Mr. D'Souza's second objection was that the certificate under rule 83 (1) of the Court of Appeal Rules concerning the time taken for preparation and delivery of the copy of proceedings was ineffective as the provisions in Rule 83(1) and D Rule 83(2) were not complied with. To that objection Mr. Rutashobya submitted that Amina Rashidi was not legally represented and that she had been improperly abandoned by her advocate, one Mr. Kinabo. After the abandonment Amina Rashidi was seeking the aid of the Law Society and the Dar es Salaam University Legal Aid Committee, which E rendered help to her.

Another objection was that leave to appeal in terms of Section 5(1) (c) of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act from the High Court was not sought or obtained. Without such leave the appeal is incompetent. Mr. Rutashobya trotted out the same excuse as before, that Amina Rashidi was abandoned by her counsel. He could not explain why no application was F made to obtain such a certificate out of time after legal aid was given to Amina Rashidi on or about 23.8.85.

G Another objection raised was that the provisions of Rule 83(1) (c) and (d) were breached in that no court fees were paid or security for costs furnished and no exemption was applied for or granted in terms of Rule 122 of the Court of Appeal Rules. Mr. Rutashobya could not explain this away except again on the ground that Amina Rashidi was unrepresented. H

Mr. D'Souza submitted that the appeal before us is premature because there is an application being Miscellaneous Civil Application No. 67 of 1985 filed by Amina Rashidi and pending before the High Court. That application 67 of 1985 is for the setting aside of the sale of Plot 19 to Alwi Shariff, the same point for which the appeal is before this Court. I

MUSTAFA JJA, MAKAME JJA, OMAR JJA

A On this Mr. Rutashobya made a startling submission. He submitted, on the instruction of Amina Rashid, that Amina Rashidi did not authorize that application 67/85 to be filed, and that while Amina knew of the contents of the affidavit in general terms, she had not signed the said affidavit nor sworn to it before a commissioner for oaths. He alleged that Mr. B Kinabo had acted without authority in filing that application and Mr. Ojare, the Commissioner for Oaths had given a false statement that Amina had signed in his presence. Amina alleged that the signature on the affidavit was not hers. In fact she alleged that both Mr. Kinabo and Mr. Ojare, both practicing advocates and therefore officers of the court, had perjured themselves. C

We are surprised that Mr. Rutashobya has made these serious and criminal allegations before us, without having first obtained an affidavit from Amina Rashidi to that effect. We would have thought that before Mr. Rutashobya would make D these allegations, albeit on behalf of Amina Rashidi, he would have thoroughly investigated the matter to ascertain how true they could be, and certainly not without a supporting affidavit from Amina Rashidi.

Mr. Rutashobya has claimed that Civil Application No. 67 of 1985 was in fact not before the court, as Amina Rashidi was not concerned with it. E

Mr. Rutashobya conceded that an essential document, the court order in Miscellaneous Civil Application No. 66 of 1985 in an application by Alwi Shariff for an order of possession of Plot 19 and for the eviction of Amina Rashidi therefrom was absent from the record, but sought to excuse it on the ground that Amina had been abandoned by her advocate and F was unrepresented - that was an infringement of the provisions of Rule 89 (1)(g).

The Memorandum of Appeal was filed on 2nd April, 1986 and was objected to by Mr. D'Souza as being vague and imprecise, which it is. Mr. Rutashobya has put forward the general argument that Amina Rashidi was unrepresented. He G also submitted that Mr. Kinabo who had at some stage represented Amina Rashidi, had deliberately and improperly let her down. There was the incident concerning the Miscellaneous Civil Application No. 67 of 1985 already referred to. H

Mr. Rutashobya alleged that on 11.7.85 before Chua, J. Mr. Kinabo misinformed the court on an important matter. Mr. Kinabo was recorded as saying in court:

I have been trying to communicate with my client (Amina Rashidi) but have failed. I have informed her this morning I

1986 TLR p200

MUSTAFA JJA, MAKAME JJA, OMAR JJA

A that I intend to withdraw from the case. She was present in person in this Court today but after I told her that I intended to withdraw from the case she left the court precincts. She did so despite the fact that I told her to appear in person. Under the circumstances I pray for leave to withdraw from this matter.

B The court granted Mr. Kinabo leave to withdraw and proceeded to here the application 65/85 and Miscellaneous Civil Application No. 66/85 ex parte, applications by Mohinder Singh and Alwi Shariff.

C Mr. Rutashobya submitted that what Mr. Kinabo told the court was a lie, that Amina Rashidi knew nothing about the matter and suggested that the proper step the High Court should have taken was to have adjourned the hearing of the applications and to have summoned Amina Rashidi. He implied that the judge should have disbelieved Mr. Kinabo. We D find Mr. Rutashobya's submission somewhat startling. Again he has made this serious allegation without a supporting affidavit, and it does not appear to us that he has seriously looked into the veracity or otherwise of this incident as narrated to him allegedly by Amina Rashidi.

E We are of the view that the High Court judge was perfectly entitled to accept the word of Mr. Kinabo given from the Bar at its face value and to have acted in the way the judge did.

The whole thrust of the appeal would appear to be that as the sale of the building on plot No. 19 and the order to Amina F Rashidi not to intermeddle with the estate were made in the absence of Amina Rashidi, such orders should be set aside to allow Amina to be heard on those applications.

We are satisfied that Amina Rashidi deliberately absented herself from the hearing of the applications after she was G informed by Mr. Kinabo that the latter was going to withdraw. We see no reason for acceding to her request.

We think it pertinent to point out that on page 63 of the record filed, paragraph VIII of the affidavit sworn to by Amina Rashid would give the lie to her allegation that she knew nothing of the filing and institution of Miscellaneous Civil H Application No. 67 of 1985. That affidavit was sworn by Amina Rashidi on 24.6.85.

The objections raised by Mr. D'Souza to the competency of the appeal are well founded and substantial. In terms of Rule 82 of the court of Appeal Rules we hold that no appeal lies and we strike off the appeal as incompetent. I

[zJDz]Judgment
G Lugakingira, J.: The dispute in this proceeding was over the terms of a contractual tenancy. The proceeding was commenced in the Urban Primary Court at Singida and terminated on appeal in the District Court. It then came to the attention of the Resident Magistrate in-charge who was of the view that the two courts had no H jurisdiction in the matter in view of the provisions of the Rent Restriction Act, 1984. He therefore forwarded the records here for appropriate orders.
I have had the opportunity of perusing the Act but it is not clear to what extent it ousts the jurisdiction of the courts in I matters arising under it. There is a long list of powers, including the power
A to exercise jurisdiction in all civil matters, which are vested in Regional Housing Tribunals, but it is not clear whether those powers are exercisable to the exclusion of the courts. This important question cannot be answered in the present exercise where I have not had the advantage of arguments and must await a proper occasion.
B That said, however, I agree with the learned Resident Magistrate in-charge that the Primary Court had no jurisdiction in the matter. The jurisdiction of primary courts arises where the law applicable is customary law or Islamic law, or where jurisdiction is otherwise conferred by statute. The present case arises out of a landlord and tenant agreement C which related to premises situated in a rent restriction area and there is no provision conferring jurisdiction on primary courts in that sphere. It follows, therefore, that the purported proceeding in the Primary Court was a nullity as was the appeal arising therefrom.

D Accordingly, the proceedings are quashed in their entirety. The plaintiff is at liberty to pursue its remedies in the appropriate venue.

[zJDz]Judgment

B Chipeta, J.: On 8th January, 1987, I dismissed the applicant's application for bail pending trial. I reserved my reasons for doing so, which I now give in this ruling.

The applicant stands charged before Tabora District Court in two counts, namely, threatening to kill and contempt of court, c/ss 89 (2) (a) and 114 (1) (c) of the Penal Code, respectively. C

In refusing to admit him to bail, the learned magistrate took the view that bail in such cases was disallowed by the provisions of section 148(5)(e) of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985.

D During the hearing of this application, Mr. Mussa learned state attorney, objected to the application on the grounds that in his submission a threat to kill another person amounted to a serious threat of violence.

With respect, I entirely agree with Mr. Mussa. As I have had occasion to point out in similar applications, I am of the view that "a serious threat of violence" should be construed to mean such threat of violence as would cause, in the mind E of any reasonable person, a sense of imminent danger to his person or that of another person. A threat to kill another is, in my view, a serious threat of violence.

F The Act does not say in what manner the threat should be communicated or exhibited. As the words stand, I think that they must be taken to mean a serious threat made by words or exhibited by some physical act. In that sense, then, the words cast a very wide net, and I fear that they are likely to be abused by people with little conscience. Such charges G are very easily made, and not always easily proved.

Be that as it may, the charge in court is of a nature that was envisaged by the tough section 48 (5) (e) of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985. H

It was for the foregoing reasons that I dismissed the application.

Mwalusanya, J.: This is a suit over a contract of sale of a vehicle between Tanganyika Bus Service Co. I Ltd. (the plaintiff) and National Bus Services Ltd. - Kamata (the

A defendants). The defendants invited tenders for the purchase of its bus reg. no. Su. 17719 Fleet No. 140. The plaintiff was one of those who offered to purchase the said bus. The defendants vide its letter dated 1/7/1986 which is Exh.A in court accepted the offer and asked the plaintiff to pay cash shs.580,280/= and collect the bus before 24/7/1986. The plaintiff duly paid the Shs.580,280/=. However when the plaintiff's Traffic Manager Mr. R.S. Sandhu (PW.2) went to B collect the bus on 18/7/1986 the defendants refused delivery of the same. According to the defendant's witness Mr. Jovin A. Lyimo (DW.1) who is also the defendant's Corporation Secretary, they refused delivery because there was a C mistake in the award of the tender to the plaintiff. The witness testified that they wanted to award the tender to the highest bidder but by mistake the plaintiff was awarded who was not the highest bidder, and so it is said that the highest bidder one Yohannes s/o Sanga should have been awarded the tender. D

As a basic statement, mistake in contract does not affect the validity of the agreement. It is only when there is a mutual mistake, that mistake can affect the validity or enforceability of a contract - see the decision of the Privy Council in a case from Kenya Sheikh Brothers Ltd. v Arnold Julius Ochsner [1957] E.A. 86. The Tanganyika Contract Act Cap.433 E in s.20(1) states:

Where both the parties to an agreement are under a mistake as to a matter of fact essential to an agreement, the agreement is void.

F The crucial phrase is 'both parties', because, the fact that only one party is mistaken will not affect the contract, unless one is led into his mistake by the actions of the other party. But in here it is common ground that the plaintiffs had nothing to do with the mistake allegedly made by the defendants. G

As for a unilateral mistake by one party to the contract, the law is that it will affect the validity of the contract only if the doctrine of Non est Factum (it is not my deed) is successfully proved. Non est factum is the name given to the argument raised when the defendant in a contract suit alleges that a document which he has signed should not be binding H upon him, because he was induced to sign it on the understanding that it was of a completely different nature from what it is in fact. That is a very difficult point to establish because the mistake must be one relating not to the content but to the I character of the subject matter. The document signed should

A be radically different in character from that which the plaintiff believed he was signing. As Lord Reid pointed out in the decision of the House of Lords in Saunders v Anglia Building Society: [1970] 3 All E.R. 961 at p.964 that

B There must I think be a radical difference between what he signed and what he thought he was signing - or one could use the words 'fundamental' or 'serious' or 'very substantial'. But what amounts to a radical difference will depend on all the circumstances.

C So the essence of the plea non est factum is that the person signing, believed that the document he signed had one character or one effect whereas in fact its character or effect was quite different. But that is far from the case in here because the difference is very narrow indeed i.e. between two bidders who were the highest bidders.

D In my view the mistake in here did not go to the substance of the whole consideration or to the root of the matter. The plea of non est factum is a plea which must necessarily be kept within narrow limits on the ground that no man should take advantage of his own wrong. Negligence or carelessness or inadvertence on the part of one raising non est factum E would therefore prevent the doctrine being effective and that signing a document without reading it or appreciating its consequences is prima facie negligence. I think the doctrine should only be available to those who are senile, blind or illiterate or in some other way quite incapable of comprehending the document presented to them for signature. For that F reason an order of specific performance will issue as prayed.

The plaintiff has also asked for shs.10,000/= being special damages. He said that those were the expenses incurred by the traffic manager (PW.2) and the driver and the turnboy when they made an abortive trip to DSM from Mwanza to G collect the bus. The expenses are for food and accommodation for some ten days or so. The General Manager of the plaintiff company Mr. S.B. Hassanali (PW.1) produced a receipt (Exh.B) being the cost of expenses that were paid out to those three employees. No challenge was offered by the defendants to those damages. And in my view those H damages are payable because they are direct, foreseeable and reasonable, and quite in line with the rule in Hadley v Baxendale: (1854) 9 Ex.341. I accordingly award the same to the plaintiffs as prayed the suit. I

Order accordingly.

1. Hawa Mohamed v Ally Sefu, Civil App. No. 9 of 1983.
M.K.B. Wambali, for the respondent
[zJDz]Judgment
G Kisanga, J.A.: The appellant, Robert Aranjo, had petitioned for divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion. The Primary Court granted the decree on the grounds of the respondent's desertion and her persistent denial of sexual intercourse to the appellant. The Court further ordered a division of the matrimonial assets and awarded a quarter thereof to the respondent wife. H
The husband appealed to the District Court. In a rather confused judgment the Resident Magistrate misconstrued the decision of the Primary Court and asserted that the Primary Court had granted the divorce on grounds of cruelty and sexual incapacity on the part of the appellant husband. On analysing the evidence I
MAKAME JJA, KISANGA JJA, OMAR JJA
A himself, the Resident Magistrate rightly found that the decree could not be based on the husband's sexual incapacity. However he upheld the decree on grounds of constructive desertion on the part of the husband in that the wife was driven away from the matrimonial home by the cruel acts of the husband. He also upheld the order for the division of the matrimonial assets.
On further appeal to the High Court the appellant husband, while conceding that the marriage had irreparably broken B down, contended that the decree of divorce should have been granted on the ground of his wife's desertion and not on the ground of cruelty leading to constructive desertion on his part. In other words he urged that his wife, and not himself should have been found guilty or to blame for the breakdown of the marriage. The High Court (Maina, J.) found that C there was some evidence of cruelty on the part of the husband, but held that whether the divorce was founded on the husband's cruelty or on the wife's desertion, it would not affect the division of the matrimonial assets between the parties. D Accordingly he upheld the concurrent orders of the lower courts for the division of the matrimonial assets. Aggrieved by such decision the appellant now seeks to appeal further to this Court upon a certificate by the High Court that a point of law is involved in the decision. At the hearing of the appeal the appellant appeared before us and argued the appeal in E person, while the respondent was represented by Mr. M.K.B. Wambali, advocate from the Legal Aid Committee of the Law Faculty of the University of Dar es Salaam.

The point of law certified by the High Court (Mapigano, J.) for our consideration was in the following terms: F

The issue is whether a party who has been the cause of the breakdown of a marriage should benefit from her/his own wrong. Another issue will be whether dissolution was warranted. G

We deal with the second issue first, namely, whether dissolution was warranted. We have to point out at once that the issue as stated is too general and vague to be of any assistance to us. For, the question whether dissolution of the H marriage is warranted or not can be one of law or one of fact. It would be a point of law, for instance, if the complaint is that there was no evidence at all on the record to support such dissolution, or that the dissolution was based on some I misdirection or non-direction by the courts below. On the other hand it would be a point of fact if, for instance, the allegation

A was that the evidence in support of the dissolution was insufficient. The learned judge was required by law to certify to us only a point of law, but as it is, we cannot discover what he really meant to certify to us.

But the more serious criticism is that on the information which was before him, the learned judge could not have raised the B issue in question. It is clear that the appellant himself had petitioned for divorce, and there was overwhelming evidence that the marriage had broken down irreparably. Indeed the appellant himself expressly stated before Maina, J. that the marriage had irreparably broken down, his only contention being that the breakdown should be blamed not on him but on C the respondent who was not prepared to return to the matrimonial home. In such circumstances, it seems plain to us that dissolution of the marriage was the natural and logical consequence, and we can see no room for questioning it.

D We now turn to the first point whether a party who has been the cause of the breakdown of the marriage should benefit from his/her own wrong. As stated earlier, Maina, J. directly addressed himself to this question and came to the conclusion that whether the appellant was guilty of cruelty or the respondent was guilty of desertion it made no difference as regards the division of the matrimonial assets. In coming to that conclusion he relied on section 114 of the Law of E Marriage Act which provides that:

114 (1) The Court shall have power, when granting or subsequent to the grant of a decree of separation or divorce, to order the F division between the parties of any assets acquired by them during the marriage by their joint efforts or to order the sale of any such assets and the division between the parties of the proceeds of sale.

(2) In exercising the power conferred by subsection (1), the court shall have regard - G

(a) to the custom of the community to which the parties belong;

(b) to the extent of the contributions made by each party in money, property or work; were contracted for their joint benefit; H and

(c) to any debts owing by either party which were contracted for theri joint benefit; and

(d) to the needs of the infant children, if any, of the marriage, and subject to those considerations, shall incline towards I equality of division.

1986 TLR p210

MAKAME JJA, KISANGA JJA, OMAR JJA

A The rest of the section is not relevant to the facts of this case. The learned judge took the view that there was nothing in this section, or indeed in the provisions of the Act as a whole, which makes the conduct of the guilty party who causes the breakdown of the marriage a relevant consideration in ordering division of the matrimonial assets.

B In a lengthy submission before us the appellant strongly criticised this view and vigorously contended that it would be grossly unfair to permit a guilty party who wrecks the marriage to benefit from his/her own wrong. He urged that section 114 of the Law of Marriage Act should be read and construed so as to make the conduct of such guilty party a relevant C consideration in ordering division of the matrimonial assets. He claimed that this was the view expressed by this Court in the case Hawa Mohamed v Ally Sefu C v App. No. 9 of 1983 (unreported). The relevant passage in Hawa's case reads:

D With regard to the fear that the broad view might result in a wife being "allowed to benefit from a marriage which she has wrecked" we think, with respect, that it is misguided because what is in issue is the wife's contribution or efforts towards the acquisition of matrimonial or family assets, and not her contribution towards the breakdown of the marriage. Of course there may be cases E where a wife's misbehaviour may amount to failure to contribute towards the welfare of the family and thus failure to contribute towards the acquisition of matrimonial or family assets; but this has to be decided in accordance with the facts of each individua F l case.

Relying on the last sentence which is underlined, the appellant pressed that the respondent had been guilty of desertion which in turn wrecked their marriage and therefore that factor should have been held against her in ordering division of G their matrimonial assets. We think that the appellant has not quite understood the message contained in this passage. As the passage makes it very clear, the Court in Hawa's case was dealing with the issue of contribution towards acquisition H of the matrimonial assets, not contribution towards the breakdown of the marriage which is the issue in the present case. The underlined words which the appellant seeks to rely on simply mean that in ordering division of the matrimonial assets, the Court will consider whether the conduct or behavior of the guilty party who wrecked the marriage operated in I such a way that by reason of such conduct the said party cannot have made a contribution to the acquisition of the matrimonial assets. So that if, for example, the guilty party was in desertion at the time of the acquisition of the matrimonial assets, such conduct would be a relevant consideration when deciding on the extent of the party's contribution towards acquisition of the matrimonial assets; the point to stress is that such conduct, in order to warrant consideration, must have been operative at the time of acquiring the matrimonial assets. Thus in a B proper case the Court may well find that the guilty party made no contribution at all if, say, he/she was in desertion for the whole period during which the said assets were acquired.

MAKAME JJA, KISANGA JJA, OMAR AJJA

C We are therefore quite satisfied that this Court in Hawa's case did not consider the question whether the guilty party who causes the breakdown of the marriage should benefit from his/her own wrong because, as the Court clearly stated, that question was not before it. We now address ourselves to that question which has been raised squarely in the present D appeal. It is pertinent to point out that subsection (2) of section 114 of the Law of Marriage Act which was reproduced earlier in this judgment, sets out four matters to which the Court shall have regard when ordering division of the matrimonial assets. It is noted, however, that the extent of the guilty party's contribution to the breakdown of the E marriage is not made one of such matters, nor can it be construed to fall under any one of them. We think that this was such an obvious and significant factor that if it was intended to be one of such considerations Parliament would not have failed to say so. Indeed we would go further and say that in our view such a provision would pose a practical problem. F Consider, for instance, a situation where a marriage lasted for a long time during which the spouses jointly acquired matrimonial assets, but the marriage was eventually dissolved because one of the spouses committed adultery recently. Now, if the appellant's submission were to be upheld, the implication would be to deny the guilty party his/her share of G the joint matrimonial assets because of adultery committed only in old age and long after the said assets had been acquired. In our view there could be no legal justification for that. As we have amply demonstrated herein before we H think that consideration of the conduct of the party who causes the breakdown of the marriage is relevant only in relation to the acquisition of the matrimonial assets, not in relation to the breakdown of the marriage. On the evidence the matrimonial assets in the present case were acquired jointly by the parties long before the respondent had left the matrimonial home. Thus, whether the respondent was in desertion or whether, as found by the District I

A and the High Courts, she was forced out of the matrimonial home by the appellant's cruelty, that was neither here nor there. It was not relevant for the purpose of considering division of the matrimonial assets, and the learned High Court Judge was perfectly entitled so to hold.

B In the event this appeal cannot succeed, and it is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Kwikima, for the appellants.

[zJDz]Judgment

Chipeta, J.: In Kigoma District Court, the appellant, Masumbuko Rashidi (the first accused at the trial) and G three others, namely, Samson Joseph (2nd accused), Atanasi Nahimana (3rd accused) and Mjanaheri Shomari (4th accused) were jointly charged on two counts: robbery with violence and unlawful possession of firearm c/ss 285 and 286 of the Penal Code, and sections 13 (1) and 31 of the Arms and Ammunition Ordinance, H respectively. They were all convicted as charged and were committed to this court for sentencing.

In this Court's Miscellaneous Criminal Cause No. 8 of 1986 this Court (Mchome, P.R.M. - extended jurisdiction) sentenced each of the convicts to ten years imprisonment. I

In view of the fact that the four accused persons were convicted on both counts, the sentence of ten years imprisonment appears to be omnibus. Separate sentences ought to have been passed. I will return to this question later in this judgment. A Dissatisfied, the appellant now appeals against the convictions and sentence. For ease of reference, I propose to retain the descriptions of the accused persons as they were at the trial.

Before I proceed to deal with the appeal in so far as it relates to the two counts, I propose to deal with one B matter that arose in the course of the proceedings before the trial court. The four accused persons first appeared before the District Court on 26th December, 1985 and entered pleas of "not guilty". They made no request whatsoever. C

On 8th January, 1986, the case came up for hearing. It was then that the four accused persons told the court that they wanted to engage an advocate. The case was then adjourned to the following day. The accused D persons repeated their request, but the learned trial magistrate ruled that the case should proceed and that the charge be read over to them. At that point, the accused persons left the dock in protest. Without further ado, the learned magistrate peremptorily convicted them of contempt of court and sentenced each of them to six months imprisonment. The case was then adjourned to 23rd January. E

On that day Mr. Kwikima, learned advocate, appeared for the four accused persons and requested for an adjournment to enable him to take instructions. The case was then adjourned to 21st February, 1986 and later F to 20th March, 1986. On that day Mr. Kwikima did not appear. The accused persons, again said that they wanted their advocate, but Mr. Kwikima, who happened to be within the court premises, had no instructions. When the charges were read over to them, the 4th accused walked out of the dock, and the trial magistrate, peremptorily convicted him of contempt of court c/s 114 (1) of the Penal Code and sentenced him to twelve G months imprisonment.

It has repeatedly been held by superior courts that when a court takes cognisance of an offence of contempt of court, it is essential that the court should frame and record the substance of a charge, read such charge to the H accused who should then be called upon to show cause why he should not be convicted on the charge; and the accused should be given a fair opportunity to reply. Besides, the record of the court should contain an adequate note of the accused person's reply, if any, as well as the court's decision. (See Joseph Odhengo s/o Ogongo v R., 21 E.A.C.A. 302.) I

CHIPETA J

In the present case, that procedure was totally disregarded; no charge was drawn up, let alone read over to the A accused persons, and the accused persons were given no opportunity at all to say anything in reply. They were condemned unheard. It may well be that their conduct did amount to contempt of court in that their conduct can B be said to have been calculated to obstruct or interfere with the due course of justice or the lawful process of the court. (See Reg. v Gray, [1970] 2 Q.B. 36, at page 40). But where the basic principle of natural justice C that a man must not be condemned unheard has been violated following such breach of procedure ought not be sustained, for such irregularity is fundamental and, therefore incurable.

For these reasons, all the convictions for contempt of court are hereby quashed and all the sentences in relation thereto set aside. D

I now turn to the appeal against convictions for the offences of robbery with violence and unlawful possession of a firearm. The prosecution's evidence is to the effect that during the night of 21st December, 1985, at about E 2.30 a.m.. at Mwamgongo village in Kigoma District, while the complainant (P.W.3) was away on safari, his wife, one Zainabu Issa (P.W.1) was aroused from sleep by loud bang on her door. When she peeped through the window, she saw four bandits roaming around her premises. The bandits then forced the door open and rained bullets on the walls of the house using a machine gun. The bandits then entered the house and started F ransacking it. They stole therefrom cash and numerous valuables which included radios, a shot gun, lamps and clothes all valued at shs.257,180/=.

Apart from noting that the bandits numbered about four, P.W.1 and her children were too terrified to be able to identify any of the bandits and she did not dare raise an alarm. G

After the bandits left with their booty, P.W.1 gathered courage and raised an alarm. Many neighbours responded to the alarm. Among the first people to arrive at the scene was one Amri Swalehe (P.W.3), who is a brother of P.W.2. H

The people who responded to the alarm decided to hunt for the culprits and at the same time send a report to police. They split into two groups: one group was to go and report the incident to police, and the second, in I which P.W.3 was, to try and locate the culprits. The latter group set out on their mission following a path in the hills as they believed, correctly that was the route the bandits had taken.

CHIPETA J

Meanwhile a militia man of Mwamgongo village, one Mohamed Said (P.W.4) was walking along the same path A towards Mwamgongo village. On the way, he met two people who turned out later to be the second and third accused persons, P.W.4 noticed that the two people were carrying a bag and a box like container which was B covered with a black coat. As he had no reason to suspect the two men, P.W.4 walked on.

On arrival at Bubango village, P.W.4 met P.W.3's group, P.W.3 then told P.W.4 that P.W.2's house had been broken into by armed bandits and that P.W.3 and his group were looking for the bandits. P.W.4 then recalled C having met the second and third accused persons earlier. So he decided to join P.W.3's team so as to find the two men.

On arrival at the home of one Shabani Gwango, a lorry came and the team boarded it. After travelling for about five minutes, they saw the two men. P.W.4 then told the driver to stop and the second and third accused D persons unsuspectingly boarded it.

P.W.4 immediately started interrogating the two men as to what they were carrying. The second accused's luggage was found to contain a radio, and that of the third accused had a radio and a lamp, P.W.3 easily E identified these articles to be the property of P.W.2. P.W.4 then arrested the two men, and the lorry moved on.

After travelling a short distance, P.W.4 saw three men ahead. As fate would have it, the three men, who turned out to be the appellant, the 4th accused and third person who later skipped, the three men signalled the lorry to F stop. The lorry stopped and the three men boarded it with their luggage. P.W.4 tried to question them, but the three men were uncooperative and hostile. Remembering that P.W.3 had said that the bandits had been armed, P.W.4 decided to play it cool. He then whispered to the driver to drive straight to Mwandiga police station. G

On arrival at Mwandiga Police Station, the appellant and another suspect jumped off the lorry and took to their heels. They were chased and the appellant was apprehended, but his colleague could not be apprehended. He is still at large. H

At the police station, the appellant was found in possession of clothes and a lamp which P.W.3 and P.W.2 later easily identified to be some of the property stolen from P.W.2's house. the appellant and his three co-accused persons were then re-arrested and charged accordingly.

In his defence, the appellant simply described the events leading up to his arrest. He said that on the day of his I arrest he was on his way to Gungu village and on the way he boarded a lorry up to Mwandiga. He then disembarked and A started for a bus stand but he was stopped and arrested by police officers.

After evaluating the evidence before him, the learned magistrate believed the prosecution witnesses to be truthful B and rejected the appellants' bare denial. He accordingly found as a fact that some of the articles stolen from P.W.2's house were found on the person of the appellant, and that the appellant's protestations of innocence were hollow. Applying the doctrine of recent possession he convicted all the four accused persons as charged.

It is a settled principle of law that the possessor of goods recently stolen may fairly be regarded as being the C actual thief or else a guilty receiver. His possession raises also, albeit less strongly, a presumption of his guilty connection with any further crime that accompanied the theft, such as burglary, robbery or murder. (See Abdullah Ibrahim v R., [1960] E.A. 43). To put it differently, possession by an accused person of property proved to have been very recently stolen can support a presumption that the possessor was involved in the commission of the offence which accompanied the theft. (See Ibrahim Ramadhani v R. [1969] H.C.D. No. E 218).

In the present case, the articles found in possession of the appellant were clearly identified to be part of the articles stolen from P.W.2's house in the course of a robbery only a few hours earlier. The doctrine of recent F possession, therefore, was correctly applied by the trial court. That the appellant could not have been innocently in possession of those articles is further demonstrated by the fact that immediately on arrival at Mwandiga police Station, the appellant took to his heels.

In sum, the prosecution's evidence fully justified the appellant's convictions. The convictions, therefore, were inevitable.

I now turn to the question of sentence. As pointed out earlier, Mr. Mchome, P.R.M. (extended jurisdiction) G passed a single sentence instead of two separate sentences. The question that arises, then, is whether this court is functus officio with regard to that question of sentence.

I am not aware of any direct authority on this point, but I humbly take the view that where a court, per incuriam, H omits to pass sentence in respect of some counts on which an accused person is convicted, that court should not be deemed to be functus officio with regard to passing a sentence or sentences on the remaining count or I counts, particularly where the record suggests that the omnibus sentence related to a particular count. I am fortified in this view by the fact that this court has often held that where a trial court omits to comply with statutory A provisions such as those in section 27 of the Road Traffic Act, 1973, such court is not functus officio in that regard.

In the present case, the record of this court in the sentencing proceedings show that Mr. Mchome had in mind the first count, for he repeatedly refers to "the offence of robbery". B

On the basis of the foregoing, I am of the view that it is quite proper for me to pass sentences in respect of the second count.

The question that next arises is whether it would be proper for me to pass sentences on the accused persons C without offering them an opportunity of being heard. I do not think that their presence is necessary. I say so because they were given that opportunity at the time the sentence of ten years imprisonment was passed, and they addressed the court in mitigation. I propose to use those pleas. Besides, I think it would be superfluous to D cause them to appear in view of the sentences and orders I propose to impose. Having considered the seriousness of the offence and the accused persons' pleas in mitigation, I hereby sentence the appellant and his three co-accused persons to five (5) years imprisonment in respect of the second count to run concurrently with E the sentence of ten years imprisonment earlier passed. In fine, this appeal is dismissed in its entirely.

Appeal dismissed.

[zJDz]Judgment
Chipeta, J.: After carefully perusing the affidavits filed by the applicant, ALKARIM JALALU LADAK, and D both parents of the infant, namely, JALALU JUMA LADAK and DOULAT W/O JALALU LADAK; and after hearing the parents of the infant and Mr. Kwikima, learned counsel for the applicant; and further, after examining the infant, SHARMIN d/o JALALU, I am satisfied that this application has been made in good faith. The E applicant, I am satisfied, is of the requisite statutory age, that the consent of both parents aforementioned has been freely and voluntarily given, that the applicant has had, for upward of two years, the custody of the infant; F that the infant is willing and desirous of being adopted by the applicant, and that all the parties concerned understand the effects of an adoption order.

On the basis of the foregoing, I am satisfied that the applicant is a fit person to be granted an Order of Adoption, and that such Order would be in the best interests of the infant's welfare.

In the absence of special circumstances which justify as an exceptional measure, the making of an adoption G order, the applicant would be precluded from obtaining an adoption order in this matter by the provisions of section 4(2) of the Adoption Ordinance, cap.335, in that he is the sole male applicant and the subject infant is of H the female sex. But after hearing learned counsel, the applicant, the parents of the infant and the infant herself, I am satisfied that there are special circumstances which justify as an exceptional measure the making of an Adoption Order in this case. These include the fact that the applicant is the elder brother of the infant; that the I parents of the infant, who have five other children, are not in a position to provide the full welfare of the infant, particularly as regards the education of the infant who has impressed me as being

1. Francis Leo v Paskali Simon Maganga [1978] LRT 22

Ntabaye, for the appellant
[zJDz]Judgment
Korosso, J.: This is an appeal lodged by the Appellant against the decision of the Primary Court of Nyalikungu H in its Civil Case No. 44/86 and that of the District Court of Maswa in its Civil Appeal No. 23/86.
Before the Primary Court, the Respondent petitioned for separation between her and the Appellant by whom she I purported to have been legally married. In the course of the trial it became obvious that though the Appellant and the Respondent had cohabited as husband and wife for about 15 years A and had even been blessed with 4 children, they hadn't been formally married.

The Primary Court having been satisfied that the Appellant and the Respondent had indisputably lived together for about 15 years, (it) felt satisfied that the presumption under section 160(1) of the Marriage Act hadn't been rebutted. Consequently it B invoked the provisions of section 160(1) of the Marriage Act No. 5/71. The Primary Court granted the petition for separation. The Appellant appealed to the District Court of Maswa. The Respondent also cross-appealed. The District Magistrate dismissed both the Appeal and the Cross-Appeal. C

The Appellant before this Court was represented by the learned Counsel, Mr. Ntabaye an Advocate based at Tabora. In the course of the Appeal, Mr. Ntabaye submitted that the Appellant and the Respondent having not been legally married, the Respondent had no legal right to petition for separation. He submitted that at best, the D Appellant and the Respondent lived in concubinage, Mr. Ntabaye cited the case of Francis Leo v Paskali Simon Maganga [1978] L.R.T. No. 22 decided by Hon Justice Mfalila (as he then was). The cited case propounded on the purport of the provisions of section 160(1) of the Marriage Act. E

In the cited case, the Appellant sued the Respondent and claimed from the Respondent the sum of Shs.2,400/= being payment to be paid by the Respondent for legitimation of the Respondent's five (5) children who were begotten by the Respondent with the Appellant's daughter called Magdalena. The appellant claimed the sum of F Shs.2,400/= under the customs and usage of Wanyamwezi. It would appear that the Respondent and Magdalena had lived in concubinage for a period of over 2 years.

The Hon. Justice Mfalila (as he then was) observed in his judgment on appeal thus: G

Being duly married means going through the forms and procedures as provided for under the provisions of Marrige Act.

The Hon. Judge went on to observe thus: H

When the presumption has been rebutted under the provisions of section 160 of the Marriage Act, the children of the I presumed Marriage are illegitimate. The father of the illegitimate children may legitimate them according to Customary Law in order to bring them to the paternal side. The Respondent should have either surrendered the five A children or taken legal steps to legitimate the 5 children to bring them to the paternal side.

It is opposite to quote the provisions of section 160 of the Marriage Act. B

160(1) When it is proved that a man and woman have lived together for over two years or upwards in such circumstances C as to have acquired the reputation of being husband and wife, there shall be a rebuttable presumption that they were duly married.

160(2) When the man and woman have lived together in such circumstances which give rise to a presumption provided D for in section 160(1) and such presumption has been rebutted in any Court of competent jurisdiction, the woman shall be entitled to apply for maintenance for herself and every child of the union on satisfying the Court that she did in fact live E together as husband and wife for 2 years or more and the Court shall have jurisdiction to make order or orders for maintenance and upon an application made therefore by either the woman or the man to grant other reliefs, including F custody of children as it has under this Act to make or grant upon or subsequent to the making of an order for the dissolution of marriage or order for separation as the Court may think fit.

I respectfully agree with the Honourable Judge when he observed that the phrase 'duly married' in section G 160(1) of the Marriage Act means, and indeed should be taken to mean, that only parties concerned who have gone through all the statutory formal procedures as provided for in the Marriage Act No. 5/71. This should, of course, include getting the marriage certificate which crowns all the many preceding formalities. H

But with equal due respect, for compulsive reasons, I do hold different views from those held by the Honourable Judge (as he then was) in the above cited case. In my serious study of section 160(1) and 160(2) of the I Marriage Act which must or need to be read and considered collectively, I am of the settled mind that where a man and woman who have cohabited together in concubinage for over two years or upwards but whose presumption of their having married has been rebutted, because the man and woman have been proved to have not been duly married; still A the woman assumes a special legal status if she can satisfy a Court of competent jurisdiction that she has in fact lived with the man as man and wife for a continuous period of two years or more. By virtue of the provisions of B section 160(2) of the Marriage Act once the woman has satisfied the Court of her continuous cohabitation with the man then she automatically becomes entitled to claim for maintenance for herself and every child of the union. It is noteworthy that such concubinage acquires the title of a union and the children are referred to as children of C the union. The woman becomes entitled to apply for maintenance and for custody of children. The children of such parties are neither for the maternal side nor for the paternal side. They are under the Marriage Act vested with the status of being a man and woman of the union. Either the woman or the man may apply for custody of D the child or children, and undoubtedly in granting custody to either of the parties, the Court will apply the principles as provided. In other words, the child or children of such union are deemed legitimate children and not illegitimate children. Thus the children of the Appellant and Respondent are deemed legal children.

Again, under the provisions of section 160(2) of the Marriage Act if a woman has satisfied the Court that she has E lived with the man for two years or more; then the Court is statutorily vested with the jurisdiction to grant or make orders to the parties in the same way as it has jurisdiction to make orders consequent on divorce or F separation of the duly married spouses under the provisions of the Marriage Act. Where a woman has proved to the satisfaction of the Court of her having cohabited with a man for two years... woman is only deprived of the right to petition for divorce or separation. Otherwise such a woman has all the rights which a divorced woman G has under the Act. The referred to application of other reliefs which a woman may make would definitely include application for division of property if any which has been acquired by joint efforts. This is good law, intended to emancipate the women and to prevent their exploitation. As in this case the Appellant and the Respondent are H said to have cohabited together for 15 years. She was 36 years when they started to live together. She has used all her youth while staying with the Appellant. If during the 15 years she contributed her labour, energy and materially towards the acquisition of certain property then the good law must protect her interests what-ever that may be. I

KOROSSO J

There is another reason why section 160(2) of the Marriage Act is of tremendous importance in this country. A There is no doubt that with the enactment of the Marriage Act every Tanzanian contracting a Christian marriage, Muslim marriage, Civil marriage and Customary law marriage was and still is required to contract his/her B marriage according to the express provisions of the Marriage Act. It would be a great surprise if all the people in the rural communities are contracting their marriages in strict compliance with the express provisions of the C Marriage Act. The majority of them are not aware of the existence of the Marriage Act. They purport to marry customarily the way they used to. If the provisions of section 160 is interpreted in the terms of the case of Francis Leo cited 'supra' what will be the legal status of the children of such relationships?

I wish to conclude by saying that if the presumption of marriage provided for in section 160(1) of the Marriage D Act has been rebutted but the woman has satisfied the Court of competent jurisdiction that she in fact cohabited with the man for 2 years and more, then under the provisions of section 160(2) of the Marriage Act the woman E becomes a deemed legal wife devoid only of the legal right to petition for divorce or separation. But at the same time she becomes vested with the legal right to apply for maintenance for herself and the children of the union. The woman also becomes vested with the legal right to apply for custody of the children of the union and some other reliefs which may include division of matrimonial property acquired by joint efforts. F

Secondly, the children of such relationship become deemed legitimate children for whom either the woman or the man may apply for custody. The question of who between the woman and the man should have custody must be G resolved on the principles provided in the Marriage Act. There is no question of legitimation of children begotten of a man and woman who have cohabited together for two years or more in circumstances in which they acquire the reputation of being husband and wife.

Reverting to this case, it is clear that the Respondent and the Applicant having not been duly married in H accordance with the formalities and procedures provided for in the Marriage Act, the Respondent had no legal right whatsoever to petition either for divorce or separation. It was incorrect for the lower Courts to hold that the I Appellant and the Respondent were duly married. But it having been satisfactorily proved that the Appellant and Respondent have lived as husband and wife for about 15 years the Respondent shall be entitled to file an application for maintenance, for herself, for custody of the 4 or any other children and A also for other reliefs which includes application for division of property for which she may feel she is entitled to a share.

The Primary Court and the District Court having had no jurisdiction to entertain, hear and determine the B purported petition for separation, I declare the proceedings of the lower Courts, null and void. I quash the proceedings and incidental orders. I make no orders as to costs.
Appeal allowed.

1. Abdul Nassor v R. 1 TLR (R) 289.

[zJDz]Judgment

Chipeta, J.: On 7th May, 1986, I granted the applicant's application for bail pending trial and reserved my reasons for doing so. B

The applicant and two others stand jointly charged with the offence of robbery c/s 285 and 286 of the Penal Code, in Tabora District Court. When they first appeared before the District Court, the Republic had no objection to bail. However, the learned magistrate remanded them in custody, and in doing so he stated: C

"On second thought I would think a proper interpretation of section 148 of the C.P.A. makes me hesitate to grant bail to the accused." D

From the provisions of section 148 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985, it is plain that subject to the statutory restrictions contained in that section, the offence of robbery with violence is bailable. The restriction which the E learned resident magistrate had in mind, it would seem, is paragraph (e) of subsection (5) of the said section which reads:

"(5) A police officer in charge of a police station, or a court before whom an accused person is brought/appears, shall not admit that person to bail if..... F

(e)the act or any of the acts constituting the offence with which a person is charged consists of a serious assault on or threat of violence to another person, or of having or possessing a firearm or an explosive; (Emphasis added). G

In the present case, the question of possession of a fireman or an explosive does not arise as there is no allegation to that effect. Equally, as rightly pointed out by Mr. Mussa, learned state attorney, threat of violence does not H arise either in that it is not alleged that there was threat of violence. The only allegation in the charge is that the applicant and his colleagues "did use actual violence" to the victim of the alleged offence.

From the wording of the provisions under consideration, a person can only be denied bail if the "actual violence" I or assault constituted, in the words of the paragraph, "a serious assault". In other words, it is not every assault or "use of actual violence" that would deprive an accused person of his general right to bail. The assault must be of a "serious" nature. A

The question then arises: what is meant by the expression "a serious assault"? In my view, those words should be given their natural and ordinary meaning. Those words, in my view, mean an assault that at least causes B serious bodily hurt or harm, though not necessarily grievous harm as defined in section 5 of the Penal Code.

In the present case, it has not been alleged that the "actual violence" amounted to "a serious assault" as defined above. It might have been a mere battery.

On the basis of the foregoing, I take the view that the applicant ought not to have been denied bail on the basis of C the provisions of section 148 (5) (e) of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1985. The learned magistrate, therefore, and with respect, ought to have been guided by general principles applicable in bail applications. In the absence D of any statutory restriction, the test in a bail application is whether the granting of the application will be detrimental to the interests of justice and good order and the keeping of public peace. (See Abdul Nassor v R. 1 T.L.R. (R) 289, at page 293).

Here, the learned state attorney, to whom I am indebted as a result of his lucid submissions, did not object to the E application; and from the applicant's affidavit, I am persuaded that granting the application would not be detrimental to the interests of justice and the keeping of public peace.
It was for the foregoing reasons that I granted the application on terms contained in my order. F Application allowed.

Malingumu, Rutashobya for the appellant C
[zJDz]Judgment
Moshi, J.:The appellant, Deogratias Katundabwire, successfully brought an action, before the Kanyigo Primary Court, to redeem a clan shamba sold by his brother, Deogratias Mpya, to the respondent, Jovin Luka, without D his notice. That decision was, on appeal to the District Court, reversed, and hence this appeal.
At the hearing of the appeal, the appellant was represented by Mr. Malingumu, learned advocate, whereas the respondent was present, and argued the appeal in person. E
It was established that, the appellant and his brother Deogratias Mpya, the vendor, belong to the same family. Their grandfather is the same, but their fathers are different. The father of Deogratias Mpya is deceased, F whereas the father of the appellant, Leonard Katundabwire, is the clan head as well as the administrator of the estate of the deceased father of the vendor. The respondent belongs to the same clan, but different family unit (shina).

On 8/11/81 the vendor sold his clan land to the respondent for Shs.15,000/=. The sale, which was in writing G (Exh.B), was sanctioned by the father of the appellant, and witnessed by ten clan members. This, it would appear, was after the father of the appellant had declined to exercise his right of pre-emption. It is conceded that the appellant was absent. He was in Dar es Salaam where he works for gain. On 19/11/1981 he became aware H of the sale. On 23/12/1981 he took to the respondent the purchase price of shs.15,000/= in order to redeem the shamba. The respondent refused to accept the money and, by reason thereof, the redemption suit was then filed on 29/1/1982.

The learned district magistrate allowed the appeal mainly on two grounds - that the notice of the sale, which the I father of the appellant had, was notice to all members of the clan including the appellant, and secondly that as the parties belonged to the same clan, no right of redemption existed. He relied upon the decision of this court in Laurean Baitu v Stanslaus A Tibenda [1968] H.C.D. 410.

Mr. Malingumu, advocate, has vehemently criticized the decision of the District Court. He has submitted that it B was wrong to presume notice of the sale on the part of the appellant, who was absent at the time of the sale and did not have notice of it, and thus could not exercise his right of pre-emption, he being a nearer relative than the respondent. He argued further that on the authority of Lensia Byalyagati v Samwel Maganja [1978] LRT n.5, C Bahaya clan members are allowed to buy clan land in hands of other clan members.

I would outrightly agree with Mr. Malingumu that the District Court erred in presuming notice of the sale on the part of the appellant. He was not in the village at the time of the sale. He was in Dar es Salaam. It is conceded D that he must have heard of the sale before, and when, it took place because his father had notice was, in the circumstances, clearly wrong. Notice of sale, on the part of the redeemer, in clan land redemption cases generally, is an essential element for purposes of their time limit, and an interested relative, who happens to be E absent at the time of the sale, is entitled to take action without delay whenever he returns (See paras 568 and 569 Customary Law of the Haya Tribe by Cory and Hartnoll). On the evidence, I am satisfied that the appellant did not have notice of the sale for purposes of either to object to it, if he thought he had grounds, or to F exercise a right of pre-emption, if he thought he had one. However, the vital and crucial question which follows is, to me, whether the appellant could redeem the relevant clanland notwithstanding the absence of notice of the sale on his part.

Mr. Malingumu has submitted, and I agree, that clan members are allowed to buy clan land in the hands of other G clan members. In fact this was one of this court's findings in Leonsia Byalyagati's case. Within one clan ancestry members are at liberty to sell to one another immovable property. However, with respect, this right by clan members to sell and to buy clan land within the clan appears to me to be beside the point. That right is H there. It is well established, and not in dispute. What in this case is, to my mind, at issue is the right of a clan member to redeem clan land sold by a clan member to another clan member.

It is amply established in evidence, which appears to be un-disputed, that the appellant, the respondent and the I vendor, whether as near or distant relatives, belong to the same clan or "paternal family" as defined under para 557 by Cory and Hartnoll. On account of this, it would appear that para 557 A above which is meant to restrict the disposition of land outside the family is inapplicable. The reason for this, and the good sense in it, is that where a clan shamba is sold to another clan member, the sale becomes within the B clan, and not to an outsider away from the clan, and there is therefore no loss of immovable property to the clan which would give to a clan member right to redeem. This is in line with what this court said, and rightly so in my view, in Lensia Byalyagati's case (supra) and in Laurean Baitu's case (supra). It therefore follows that as the C appellant, the vendor and the purchaser belonged to one clan, the appellant, for reasons given, had no right of redemption. The redemption proceedings before the Primary Court were therefore, on account thereof, incompetent ab initio and, on this ground alone, the appeal must fail. D
For the foregoing reasons, the appeal is, and it is hereby, dismissed in its entirety. The respondent to remain in occupation of the relevant shamba undisturbed. The respondent to have his costs. E

Mr. Rutagwelera for the Republic
[zJDz]Judgment
Samatta, J.: On September, 24, 1984, the accused in this case, Jumanne s/o Mohamed, was charged before D the District Court of Kondoa District with unlawful wounding, contrary to s. 228 of the Penal Code, it being alleged in the particulars of offence that "on 20th day of September 1985, at about 21.00 hrs at Mouroroma E Village, within the District of Kondoa, Dodoma Region, [he] unlawfully [wounded] one Mwanaidi d/o Omary and caused him (sic) to suffer several wounds to wit he cut him (sic) with a knife on his (sic) left arm". To this charge the accused pleaded as follows:

"It is true I cut her on her arm with a knife" F

The plea was entered as a plea of guilty to the charge, but the prosecutor applied for postponement of the outlining of the facts of the case until the complainant, who was said to be seriously sick in a hospital, felt better. G The case came up for mention on several dates. On February 26, 1986, when the accused was reminded of the charge, his response was:

"It is true but I was under the influence of drunkenness." H

The learned magistrate entered this reply as a plea of not guilty, and a trial commenced immediately thereafter. On 13th March, 1986, after the third witness for the prosecution had left the witness stand the following, if the record of the case is a faithful reproduction of what took place at the trial, transpired in the court room: I Accused: I elect to give defence evidence on oath.

THE CASE FOR THE DEFENCE

On that day, I did not know what I committed. I was confused due to drunkenness. I took much pombe on that day. I have no more to say. F XXD PP: Insp. Mhando I once ran mental (sic) in 1979, but I was treated locally.

Section 210(3) of the Criminal Procedure Act complied with.

Accused:I have no witness to call. I close my defence". G

On March 14, 1986, the learned trial magistrate delivered his judgment. He convicted the accused as charged and sentenced him to three years' imprisonment. The sentence is subject to confirmation by this Court. H

I decline to confirm the sentence because, in my considered opinion, the peg - the conviction - on which it hangs cannot be sustained in law. The conviction is unsound in law because, firstly, the learned trial magistrate did not fully comply with the provisions of s. 234(2) of the criminal Procedure Act, hereinafter referred to as "the Act", I as read with subsection (1) of the said section. In so far as is relevant to this case, section 234 reads as follows:

SAMATTA J

234-(1) Where at any stage of a trial, it appears to the court that the charge is defective, either in substance or form, the A court may make such order for alteration of the charge either by way of amendment of the charge or by substitution or addition of a new charge as the court thinks necessary to meet circumstances of the case unless, having regard to the B merits of the case, the required amendments cannot be made without injustice, and all amendments under the provisions of this sub-section shall be made upon such terms as the court shall deem just.

(2) Subject to sub-section (1), where a charge is altered as aforesaid: C

(a) the court shall thereupon call the accused person to plead to the altered charge; and

(b) the accused may demand witnesses or any of them be recalled and give evidence afresh or be further D cross-examined by the accused or his advocate and in such last mentioned event, the prosecution shall have the right to examine such witness on matters arising out of such further cross-examination. E

The accused in the instant case was given no opportunity to exercise his rights under subsection 2(b) of the above section. In my opinion it is not an answer to say that the accused did not demand to exercise those rights. How can one demand to exercise a right the existence of which one is not aware of? Where the accused before a F court of law is a layman or a lawyer who is not likely to know (sufficiently) the provisions of section 234(2)(b) of the Act, the court is under duty, in the interest of justice, to inform the accused of his rights under the subsection and find out from him which right, if any, he proposes to exercise. The accused's reply should be reflected on G the record of the case. The failure on the part of the learned trial magistrate to comply with s.234(2) (b) of the Act in the instant case was, in my settled opinion, a serious error, capable in law of vitiating the decision he arrived at the end of the trial.

Secondly, the learned trial magistrate does not appear to have appreciated that the accused was raising the H distinct defences - the defence of drunkenness and that of insanity. In his judgment the learned magistrate dealt with only the former. He was as silent as the grave on the defence of insanity. Bearing in mind that apparent absence of motive for the attack on the complainant and taking into I consideration the unchallenged assertion by the accused that in 1979 he suffered a mental disease, the defence of A insanity raised by the accused deserved serious consideration by the learned trial magistrate. Every defence an accused person puts before a court of law ought to be considered by the court.
For the reasons I have given, I have reached the conclusion that the accused's conviction cannot be left to stand. B It is quashed and the sentence imposed thereon is set aside. Since the accused must have finished serving that sentence, the quashing of the conviction will be of no immediate practical value to him, but it is important that the conviction be expunged from the record. Mwambe and Njulumi, for the Republic

Samatta, J.: This is a second appeal. The appellant was convicted, together with another person who has C elected not to appeal, of cattle theft, contrary to s. 265 and 268 of the Penal Code. He and his co-accused were each sentenced, in accordance with s. 5(c) of the Minimum Sentences Act, 1972, to five years' imprisonment. Their appeals to the District Court of Iramba District were unsuccessful. D

The District Court determined the appeals without giving the appellants, who in their respective Petitions of Appeal did not indicate that they did not like to be present at the hearing, the opportunity to be heard. Quite right, Mr. Mwambe, for the Republic, conceded that the denial of the opportunity to be heard was a serious E error in law. It is not clear from the record of the case why the learned magistrate who "heard" the appeals strayed into that error. One hopes that it was not because he thought that the appeals were unarguable. I express that hope because, as I understand the law, once an appeal is admitted to hearing, the appellant is, F regardless of the chances of success of the said appeal, entitled to be heard against the judgment, decision or order he has appealed against and must be given the opportunity to exercise that right. Grievous injustice is done to a person who is not given the opportunity to be heard at the hearing of his appeal against a judgment which is G prejudicial to his interests. The requirement that a party to proceedings must be given the opportunity to state his views is a fundamental principle of natural justice. The true legal position regarding the purport and implications of that right was, if I may respectfully say so, correctly stated by the Supreme Court of India in Tellis and Others v Bombay Municipal Corporation and Others [1987] LRC (Const) 351. Speaking through H Chandrachud, C.J., the Court said at pp 376-377:

The proposition that notice need not be given of a proposed action because there can possibly be no answer to it, is I contrary to the well-recognised understanding of the real import of the rule of hearing. That proposition overlooks that justice must not only be done but must manifestly be seen to be done and confuses one for the other. The A appearance of injustice is the denial of justice. It is the dialogue with the person likely to be affected by the proposed action which meets the requirement that justice must also be seen to be done. Procedural safeguards B have their historical origins in the notion that conditions of personal freedom can be preserved only when there is some institutional check on arbitrary action on the part of public authorities. (see Kadish, "Methodology and Criteria in Due Process Adjudication - A Survey and Criticism" (1957) 66 Yale LJ 319, 340). The right to be C heard has two facets: intrinsic and instrumental. The intrinsic value of that right consists in the opportunity which it gives to individuals or groups, against whom decisions taken by public authorities operate, to participate in the D proceedings by which those decisions are made, an opportunity that expresses their dignity as persons. [Goldberg v Kelly 397 US 254, 264-165 (1970) (right of the poor to participate in public processes).]

Whatever its outcome, such a hearing represents a valued human interaction in which the affected person E experiences at least the satisfaction of participating in the decision that vitally concerns her, and, perhaps the separate satisfaction of receiving an explanation of why the decision is being made in a certain way. Both the F right to be heard from, and the right to be told why, are analytically distinct from the right to secure a different outcome; these rights to interchange express the elementary idea that to be a person, rather than a thing, is at least to be consulted about what is done with one. Justice Frankfurter captured part of this sense of procedural G justice when he wrote that the "validity and moral authority of a conclusion largely depends on the mode by which it was reached.... No better instrument has been devised for arriving at truth than to give a person in jeopardy of serious loss notice of the case against him and opportunity to meet it. Nor has a better way been H found for generating the feeling, so important to a popular government, that justice has been done" Joint Anti-fascist Refugee Committee v McGrath 341 US 123, 171-72 (1951). At stake here is not just the much-acclaimed appearance of justice but, from a perspective that treats process as intrinsically significant, the I very essence of justice. (See American Constitutional Law by Laurence H. Tribe, Professor of Law, Harvard University 1978 Edn., p. 593).

The instrumental facet of the right of hearing consists in the means which it affords of assuring that the public rules A of conduct, which result in benefits and prejudices alike, are in fact accurately and consistently followed. In an earlier case, S L Kapoor v Jagmohan (1981 1 SCR 746, cited in Tellis' case (supra), the same Court, speaking through Chinnappa Reddy, J., said at p. 766: B

In our view the principles of natural justice know of no exclusionary rule dependent on whether it would have made any difference if natural justice had been observed. The non-observance of natural justice is itself prejudice to any man and C proof of prejudice independently of proof of denial of natural justice if necessary. It ill comes from a person who has denied justice that the person who has been denied justice is not prejudiced. (the underscoring is supplied)

Can courts say natural justice need not be observed by them as they know how to render justice without D observing natural justice? In the Indian case of National Textile Workers' Union and Others v Ramakrsihman and Others [1980-84] LRC (Comm) 729, Reddy, J, posed that question and proceeded to E answer it, at p. 749, as follows:

It will surely be a travesty of justice to deny natural justice on the ground that Courts know better. There is a peculiar and F surprising misconception of natural justice, in some quarters, that it is, exclusively, a principle of administrative law. It is not. It is first a universal principle and, therefore, a rule of administrative law. It is that part of the judicial procedure G which is imported into the administrative process because of its universality. "It is of the essence of most systems of justice - certainly of the Anglo-Saxon System - that in litigation both sides of a dispute must be heard before decision, "Audi alteram partem" is as much a principle of African as it is of English legal procedure; a popular Yoruba saying is: H wicked and iniquitous is he who decides a case upon the testimony of only one part to it (T.O. Elias, The Nature of African Customary Law). Courts even more than administrators must observe natural justice.

I respectfully concur in these observations and desire to adopt them as representing my views. In the case now I before me, clearly the learned magistrate strayed into a grave error in law in not giving the appellants the opportunity to be heard. A There is no provision in section 20, 21 or 34 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1984 (hereinafter referred to as "the Act") - the sections governing the appellate jurisdiction of the District Courts - which empowers a District B Court to dispense with the observance of natural justice. On the contrary, the right of hearing, as far as criminal appeals heard in the District Courts are concerned, is statutorily recognised. The recognition is embodied in s. 34(2) of the Act. The subsection reads as follows:

SAMATTA J

(2) An appellant or other party, whether in custody or not, shall be entitled to be present at the hearing of an appeal under C this part:

Provided that where an appellant or other party is in custody, his right to be present at the hearing of the appeal D shall, unless the court directs that his presence is desirable for the due determination of the appeal in which case the expenses of transferring him to and from the place to hearing shall be borne by the Republic, be subject to his E paying all expenses incidental to his transfer to and from the place where the court sits for the determination of the appeal.

The right of presence at the hearing of an appeal is not confined to physical presence; it includes the right to F participate in the proceedings in question by, inter alia, making submissions on issues raised by the appeal with a view of assisting the Court to reach a just and correct decision. As rightly pointed out in Tellis' case (supra), the G point of the right of hearing is "less to assure participation than to use participation to assure accuracy." The right is a very important one and the denial of it is a grave error which vitiates the proceedings in the District Court. The error is, in my judgment, incurable under the provisions of s. 37(2) of the Act.

For the reasons I have given, I allow the appeal and set aside the decision of the District Court in so far as it H relates to the appellant. Exercising my revisional jurisdiction, I also set aside the District Court's decision dismissing the appellant's co-accused's appeal before that court. It is ordered that the two appeals before the District Court be heart de nove by another magistrate of competent jurisdiction. I

[zJDz]Judgment G
Samatta, J.:This is an appeal from a decision of the District Court of Kondoa District whereby the decision of the Primary Court of Haubi dismissing the respondent's claim for recovery of possession of a piece of land measuring one and a half acres was reversed. H

The respondent purported to institute the civil proceedings on his own behalf and on behalf of ten other persons. It was his case that the piece of land in question was the property of the ten persons and himself and that they used it for grazing purposes, but the appeallant, without their consent, had cultivated it. The ten persons were I said to be the respondent's fellow villagers, but their identities were not disclosed in the pleadings or during the trial. The appellant contested the claim, asserting that A the piece of land was his property since 1981 when his father gave it to him. The Primary Court held that the respondent had not established his case and accordingly dismissed the suit. The learned District Magistrate was B unable to share that view. He allowed the respondent's appeal and entered judgment for him. In the course of his judgment he said, among other things:

Indeed, the case for the plaintiff has merits. The plaintiff is claiming communal land which respondent has cultivated on C his own accord. There is evidence that the land in dispute is communal one for use of the masses and not for individuals as alleged by the respondent. According to PW4 an elderly witness, appellant was appointed to claim on D behalf of other villagers - some of whom attended this court during hearing of the appeal.

It is therefore in compliance with section 31(2) of the M.C.A. No. 2 of 1984 which for ease of reference states, I quote: E

31(2) Subject to the provisions of subsection (1) and (3) of this section and to any rules of court relating to the representation of parties, a Primary Court may permit any relative or any member of the household of any party to any F proceeding of a Civil nature, upon the request of such party, to appear as and act for such party.

With respect to the learned District Magistrate, the provisions he quoted are those of s. 33(2), and not of s. G 31(2), of the Magistrate's Court Act, 1984. The provisions were plainly inapplicable to this case. No question of representation by a relative arose in this case. What the respondent purported to do in the Primary Court was H to institute and prosecute a representative action. Could he in law do so and, if he could, did the court follow the right procedure? These are the questions which I ask myself in this matter and which I shall endeavour to answer. In this Court, the Resident Magistrate's Court and the District Court a litigant can, with the leave of the court, institute a representative suit. The authority for doing so is embodied in Order 1 Rule 8 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1966 (hereinafter referred to as "the Code"), which reads as follows: I

SAMATTA J

8.-(1) Where there are numerous persons having the same interest in one suit, one or more of such persons, with A permission of the court, may sue or be sued, or may defend, in such suit, on behalf of or for the benefit of all persons so B interested. But the court shall in such case give, at the plaintiff's expense, notice of the institution of the suit to all such persons either by personal service or, where from the number of persons or any other cause such service is not reasonably practicable, the public advertisement, as the court in each case may direct. C

(2) Any person on whose behalf or for whose benefit a suit is instituted or defended under sub-rule (1) may apply to the court to be made a party to such suit.

There are no provisions in the Magistrates' Court (Civil Procedure in Primary Courts) Rules, 1964 (whose D application has been saved by s. 72(3) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1984, and which hereinafter will be referred to as "the Rules"), which are analogous with these provisions. Does the omission to incorporate in the E Rules such provisions deny a Primary Court the right to permit a party to institute before it a representative suit? I do not think so. In my view, the situation is taken care of by s. 6 of the Judicature and Application of Laws Ordinance (Chapter 453). As amended by the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1963, that section is couched in the following language: F

(6) Subject to the provisions of any written law and to the limits of its jurisdiction, a magistrate's court shall exercise its jurisdiction in accordance with the laws with which the High Court is required by this Ordinance to exercise its jurisdiction G and with such other laws as shall be in force in Tanganyika from time to time and applicable to the proceedings before it, but no magistrate's court shall exercise any Jurisdiction or powers that are by any such law conferred exclusively on the High Court as such or on a court of record. H

The laws with which the High Court is required by the Ordinance to exercise its jurisdiction are described in section 2 of the said Ordinance, which reads as follows: I

2-(2) Subject to this Ordinance, the jurisdiction of the High Court shall be exercised in conformity with the written laws A which are in force in Tanganyika on the date on which this Ordinance comes into operation (including the laws applied by this Ordinance) or which may hereafter be applied or enacted... (The ordinance came into operation on December B 9,1961).

It is my considered view that a Primary Court can, and is bound to, exercise its civil jurisdiction in accordance C with O.1., r. 8 of the Code. It follows from this that the Haubi Primary Court could in law permit the respondent in this appeal to institute before it a representative action. But was the procedure which that court adopted right? I think not. Although it is perfectly correct to say that persons on whose behalf a representative suit is instituted D are not parties to the proceedings, it is necessary that their identities be known to the court. The necessity arises from two principal reasons. Firstly, in terms of O.1 r 8 of the Code, the court is under duty to give notice E of the institution of the suit to all such persons. Secondly, the doctrine of res judicata applies to all such persons. Thus, none of them can institute fresh proceedings for the same relief. As already pointed out, the identities of the ten persons on whose behalf the respondent purported to institute the proceedings in the Primary Court were not disclosed to the court. It was not enough in law to disclose that those persons were the respondent's fellow villagers. F

In my view, the errors into which the Primary Court strayed in this case are so serious as to vitiate the proceedings conducted before it. I would, therefore, allow the appeal and set aside the decisions of both courts below.
The respondent is at liberty to institute proper proceedings before the Primary Court against the appellant, but if G he does so, the case should be heard by another magistrate of competent jurisdiction and a new set of assessors, and no fresh fees should be demanded from him. The appellant will have his costs in this Court as well as in the two courts below.
Order accordingly

The appellant petitioned for divorce before a Primary Court on the ground that quite often the respondent used to subject her to violence. The court granted the divorce after being satisfied that the marriage had broken down C irreparably. The District Court reversed the decision of the Primary Court on the ground that the ill-treatment to which the appellant was subjected was reasonable tear and wear of married life. It was in evidence that the respondent assaulted the appellant on three occasions. On one occasion the assault was perpetrated when she was nine months pregnant. D
Held: The Primary Court was right, when these assaults are considered in the light of the general atmosphere prevailing at the matrimonial home, to hold, as it did, that the parties' marriage had irreparably broken down. E
Appeal allowed.

[zJDz]Judgment
Samatta, J.: This is an appeal from a decision of the District Court of Mpwapwa District whereby a decision of the Primary Court of Zoissa dissolving the parties' marriage was set aside. G
Having given the case anxious and, I hope, careful consideration, I have reached the settled opinion that the appeal must be allowed. The appellant based her prayer for a decree of divorce on the ground that quite often the respondent used to subject her to violence. In his evidence the respondent asserted that he beat up the H appellant only on one occasion; he asserted that he did so because she provoked him. The Primary Court analysed the evidence at length and came to the conclusion, among others, that the appellant had established that the respondent had assaulted her on three (separate) occasions. The district Magistrate was unable to uphold I this finding.

SAMATTA J

In his opinion, the appellant had proved only two instances of assault. The magistrate went on to say: A

... The basic question in this case was whether: If a husband is guilty of assaulting his wife twice, would that (on its own) B entitle a court to hold that the marriage has irreparably foundered and consequently tear the marriage vows apart? In my considered view, I think it would not. Admittedly, no persons has any right to assault his or her spouse - (although s. C 66 of the Act speaks of the infliction of corporal punishment). However, I do not think that if a person is found guilty of assaulting his spouse twice, and such assaults are not serious, that would make a court of law conclude that the marriage has irreparably broken down. As it was rightly observed by Lord Denning, L.J. (as he then was) Married couples D have to put up with all vexations, the quarrels, and the troubles which are ordinary incidents of married life. They have taken each for better and for worse. They must put up with temperament and defects of character of each other. But there E may come a time when defects of character or temperament may be such as to amount to cruelty, but it all depends on the facts of the (See the case of Mc Ewan v Mc Ewan (1946) 108 So. Jour. 198). Similarly, it is common ground to expect misunderstanding in the married life - which may culminate in person assaulting his or her spouse. If such incidents F occur - and a person twice assaults his or her spouse - I do not think that that alone would be sufficient to justify a reasonable tribunal to conclude that the marriage vows have been torn apart beyond repair. A marriage bond or contract G (for that matter) - sanctity as it is should not be set aside lightly; in the absence of evidence that the same has foundered beyond repair.

While I entirely agree with the District Magistrate that a marriage bond should not be set aside lightly, I am unable H to share his view that the Primary Court strayed into an error in holding, as it did, that the appellant had established that she had been subjected to violence on three occasions. The Primary Court's finding was founded upon the evidence of the appellant as corroborated by the testimony of Thadayo Mkoi, a Church I Councillor, who told the trial court that the respondent admitted before the Church Council to have assaulted the appellant on three occasions. I also disagree with the District Magistrate on his finding that the parties' marriage has not irreparably broken down. There can A be no doubt that at least on two of the three occasions the assaults were serious ones. One of those occasions was referred to by a member of a local Reconciliation Board, Afoniso Shauri. The witness told the trial court this Nakumbuka mdai ndiye aliyekuja kushitaki kwamba amepigwa na Bwana wake (mdaiwa). Bwana wake akaitwa akaja B hapo akakana kwamba hakumpiga ikabidi huyu mdai apate barua aje kwenye hospitali alivyokuja akachunguzwa C akaonekana alipata maumivu kwenye mkono wa kulia na alivimba kwenye Bega na jicho la mkono wa kulia lilikuwa lekundu ndipo hapo akakubali mdaiwa kwamba kweli alimpiga mdai...

The second occasion was when, according to the appellant's evidence (which was not challenged on the point), D the assault was perpetrated when the appellant was nine months pregnant. In my opinion, the Primary Court was right, when these assaults are considered in the light of the general atmosphere prevailing at the matrimonial home (described by the appellant in her evidence and to a limited extent admitted by the respondent), to hold, as E it did, that the parties' marriage had irreparably broken down. The ill-treatment which the respondent has been subjecting the appellant to cannot, in my considered opinion, be described as the reasonable wear and tear F of married life. The law does not expect a wife to put up with the kind of ill-treatment the respondent has been subjecting the appellant to. I would allow the appeal.

The appeal is allowed, the decision of the District Court is recalled and that of the Primary Court restored. The appellant will have her costs in this Court as well as in the two courts below. G

Ruhumbika, J.:This is a second appeal. The appellant herein lost an appeal at the Mpwapwa District Court and therefore has appealed before this court. F

The respondent, Madaha Mganga, successfully sued the appellant in the Mpwapwa Urban Primary Court for recovery of 17 head of cattle unlawfully seized from the respondent by the appellant.

The undisputed facts leading to this case are that one person called Yona Mganga was convicted by the G Mpwapwa District Court [in Crimininal Case No. 28 of 1984] for having burgled the appellant's house and to have stolen therefrom property of the appellant. He was sent to prison for up to three years, and was also H ordered to pay compensation to the appellant. In execution of this order for compensation, the appellant went to attach some 17 head of cattle from the respondent, simply because he claimed that the respondent was a brother to Yona Mganga The respondent objected to this unlawful attachment, and the Urban Primary Court of Mpwapwa found for him. The appellant was ordered to return the 17 head of cattle to the respondent. I

Dissatisfied with the decision of the Primary Court, the appellant went to the District Court of Mpwapwa on A appeal. He lost the appeal. Before this court in his oral submissions as well as in his memorandum of appeal, the appellant still laboured under the illusion that the respondent was responsible for the wrongs of Yona Mganga, as B the two are brothers. The appellant has not in any event been able to substantiate that the animals in question belonged to Yona Mganga and not to the respondent.

This appeal has no merit and must therefore fail. As was rightly held in that old case of Gwao bin Kilimo v. C Kisunda bin Ifuti 1 T.L.R. (R), 403 (at p. 405): "It is against general ideas of justice that a man should suffer or be punished directly either in person or in property for some wrong which he has not done himself". In that case [Criminal Revision No. 1 of 1938] Gwao objected to the attachment of his two heads of cattle by Kisunda in execution of a decree passed against his son Mange. The High Court held that the cattle were wrongly seized D and were ordered to be restored to Gwao.

The respondent has no obligation whatsoever in law to have his 17 heads of cattle attached in order to satisfy a compensation order made against Yona Mganga, simply because the two were brothers. This would be against the general ideas of justice. E

It is for the reasons above that the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

[zJDz]Judgment
Chipeta, J.: This matter was admitted for revision on it appearing to this court that the sentence was C manifestly inadequate, and on perusal of the record of the trial court, this court ordered that the convict, Kabula d/o Mhoja, be called upon to show cause why the sentence should not be enhanced.
The background of the matter, in brief, is that the accused pleaded guilty to a charge of causing grievous bodily D harm c/s 225 of the Penal Code. She was convicted on her own plea of guilty and was sentenced to four (4) years imprisonment.
The facts which the accused admitted were as follows: the accused's husband has a concubine, and there is an E issue of that concubinage, a child named Masele Shilungu the victim in this case. On the day of the incident, the accused went to her husband's concubine and requested her to allow the accused to play with the child. The accused then took away the child to her house where driven by morbid jealousy, she broke the child's both arms by using her own hands. The child was then aged four months. F
In mitigation, the accused said she acted out of jealousy because her husband, with whom she has no child, was neglecting her because of his affairs with his concubine. She added that she has two children from her former marriage.
Before this court, the accused pleaded that the sentence should be enhanced and that she is 25 years old. G
It is certainly true that as a first offender and one who readily pleaded guilty to the charge, the accused deserved leniency. But the conduct of the accused is so reprehensible as to attract a sufficiently deterrent sentence, for she is clearly a very sadistic woman. H
For these reasons, I hereby set aside the sentence imposed on her by the trial court and substitute therefore a sentence of five (5) years imprisonment.

Mnzavas, J.K.: The appellant, Salmini Mohamed applied for letters of administration of his deceased mother's property namely a house built on a plot along Kilwa Street, Ilala in Dar es Salaam. The respondent Abdul Mohamed filed objection proceedings arguing that the house belonged to his I deceased father and that he was the proper person to administer the estate. A After hearing evidence from both sides the Primary Court - (Ilala Pr. Court Administration case No. 9/86) by a B majority of votes gave judgment in favour of the appellant and ordered that he be granted letters of administration of the estate. The Primary Court magistrate disagreed with the majority finding of his two assessors and forwarded the record to the District Court giving his reasons why he differed with the finding of the assessors.

After perusal of the evidence in the Primary Court the District Court concurred with the view of the Primary C Court magistrate that the two assessors erred in holding that the appellant was the proper person to administer the estate and accordingly reversed the majority finding of the Primary Court and gave letters of administration to the present respondent. D

The appellant has now appealed to this court against the decision of the District Court. Before this court Mr. Rahim who advocated for the appellant argued that the evidence before the Primary Court amply showed that E the house belonged to appellant's deceased mother and that he was the right person to administer the estate. It was Mr. Rahim's submission that the District Court erred in reversing the majority decision of the Primary Court. It was also argued that there was evidence that the house was registered in the name of appellant's deceased mother.

In rebuttal Mr. Kesaria, learned counsel for the respondent, told the Court that the appellant only produced a F photo-stat copy of a document purporting that her deceased mother owned the house; that the respondent produced the original document to prove that his deceased father owned the house. Mr. Kesaria asked the court to dismiss the appeal as incompetent with costs. G

There was undisputed evidence that the house, the subject matter of the dispute between the parties, is built on a registered land. It is built on Plot No. 77 Block C Kilwa Street House No. 25 at Ilala in Dar es Salaam.

That being the position, and in view of the provisions of section 18(1)(i) of the Magistrates Courts Act 1984 H which say inter alia "that no Primary Court shall have jurisdiction in any proceedings affecting the title to or any interest in land registered under the Land Registration Ordinance...", the Ilala Primary Court had no jurisdiction to I hear the case. That this is the law is also evident from the decision of this court in (Mohamed Yusufu v Tunda Kassim [1968]H.C.D. 487 where it was held, inter alia, that "once the land is registered, the Primary Court has no jurisdiction". See also the decision in Bibi Makongoro v Issa [1970] H.C.D. 192.

The hearing of this case by the Primary Court was a nullity ab initio and consequently the decision of the District Court is of no consequence as it has no leg to stand on. The parties are advised to seek remedy in the District Court or the High Court depending on the value of the estate. I make no order as to costs.

Order accordingly.

Judgment

Mapigano, J.: This is a chamber application for the issue of directions in the nature of I habeas corpus as provided for under section 348(1) (a) of the Criminal Procedure Code, Cap. 20 of the Revised Laws of Tanganyika. The application has been made under the provisions of the Habeas corpus A Rules and is supported by an affidavit sworn by one Zainabu Muhammad Nassor Abdulla. She has deposed that the applicant Sheikh Muhammad Nassor Abdulla, her husband, was arrested at their home, taken away and B detained by the police. She averred that the arrest and the detention was without justification and illegal. She also stated that it will be proper that the applicant be discharged on habeas corpus.

The remedy sought for, as shown above, is the issue of directions in the nature of habeas corpus. This remedy C has its roots in England. At common law the prerogative writ of habeas corpus is directed to a person who detains another in custody and commands him to produce or have the body of that person before the court for a specified purpose. The most important specie of habeas corpus is that which is called habeas corpus ad D subjiciendum. This commands the person to whom it is directed to produce the body of a person detained, with the day and cause of his caption and detention, to do, submit to and receive whatsoever the court shall direct. We are told that this writ was formerly much used for testing the legality of imprisonment for political reasons, E especially during the reigns of the Stuarts. Besides the efficacy of the writ in liberating the subject from illegal confinement in a public prison, it also extends its influence to remove every unlawful restraint of personal freedom in private life, availing, for example, to release a person from a place where he has been unlawfully banished. It is F part of the law of this country. But, it may be stressed, to invoke the remedy of habeas corpus it must be shown that the detention is improper or illegal: See Zabrovsky v Palestine General Officer Commanding (1947) AC 246. That, of course, is trite law. So much for the writ of habeas corpus.

The salient facts of this application are not in dispute and need to be stated in the barest outline only. The G applicant is a citizen of Tanzania. He was born at Makunduchi in Zanzibar in 1929. He is practising polygamy. He is married to four wives, Zainabu, the deponent herein, being one of them. As a Moslem he is allowed to take that number of wives. No surprise, therefore, that he has begotten twenty-eight issues. He has been in the H public service for the long period of thirty three years and has held various posts here and abroad. He retired in February, 1980 and settled down in Dar es Salaam at Mabibo, where he felt for and took up the vocation of a religious leader. At about 10 a.m. on the 9th October, 1983, he was arrested at his house at Mabibo and I whisked away in a landrover to police custody. The three respondents were on the detail that arrested him. We do not know where exactly he was confined, but we were informed by counsel for the respondents Mr. Shio, that he has since been deported to Zanzibar. However, in no way did the learned counsel reveal when he was A deported and whether he is still being held in confinement.

On behalf of the respondents it has been said that they were doing the bidding of their superior. It has been contended that the actions of the respondents and the deportation of the applicant from Dar es Salaam to B Zanzibar has legal validity. An Order made under the hand of His Excellency the President and the Public Seal has been produced for the perusal of this Court and the opposite party. The Order in question purports to have been made under sections 2 and 5 of the Deportation Ordinance, Cap. 38 of the Revised Laws of Tanganyika, C which came into operation on the 1st May, 1921. The Order is dated the 7th October, 1983.

Paraphrased, the Order reads that in the exercise of the powers vested in him by section 2 of the Deportation D Ordinance, the President ordered the deportation of the applicant from Dar es Salaam Region to Zanzibar, upon being satisfied that the applicant was conducting himself so as to constitute his continued residence in the Dar es Dar es Salaam Region and the neighbouring regions dangerous to peace and good order. And that the Order constituted a warrant under section 5 of the Ordinance for the detention of the subject, until a suitable opportunity E occurred for his deportation.

It was the argument of counsel for the respondents that the Order of deportation is a lawful one and cannot be questioned or impeached. He has referred this Court to the provision of section 3 of the Deportation Ordinance, F which says that an appeal cannot lie from any order of deportation under the Ordinance. Councel has also argued, if only uneasily, that the President enjoys executive powers under the Constitution of the United Republic to deport a person from any part of the United Republic to any other part of the United Republic. His authorities for that are section 11 (1) and 94 (1) of the Constitution. Section 11 (1) provides that: G

The executive authority of the Government of the United Republic with respect to the United Republic and to all Union matters shall vest in the President. H

"Union matters" is defined under section 94 (1) of the same Constitution as the matters that are specified in Part II of the Schedule to the Constitution. Counsel has pointed out that among the matters so specified is (in Kiswahili): "Mamlaka juu ya mambo yanayohusika na Hali ya I

Hatari". It was his opinion that the matter at hand falls squarely within the purview of these provisions of the A Constitution.

It was on those grounds that the respondents, through their counsel, contested this application and urged that it be refused.

In his reply, counsel for the applicant, Mr. Mwale, first made a remark about a deportation being a serious B matter. He said that it is a painful thing to the deportee, physically and mentally. No sane man can disagree with that observation. Under the Deportation Ordinance the President has been given powers to deport a person C from one part of the Territory to any other part. The exercise of these powers, surely, affects the subject and others. It serves to abridge his fundamental right. It is notable that one of the most singular features of the Ordinance is the indefiniteness of the operation of the Order of deportation. No term is fixed for the operation of such Order and no review machinery or procedures have been set down. The agony is, perhaps, in the D uncertainty, the nightmare of unending speculation, and that applies to the subject and to the family and other associates. I share the view that the question as to whether a person is conducting himself so as to be dangerous to peace and good order in any part of the Territory is entirely subjective. And subject to what I am going to say E below, the decision to deport a person from one part of the Territory to any other part of the Territory in pursuance thereof cannot be impugned in any court. However, as demonstrated, deportation is a very weighty matter and Orders of deportation should, therefore, be prudently and sparingly made.

Mr. Mwale argued that the President has no power under the Deportation Ordinance to deport a person from F any part of Tanganyika to Zanzibar. He has referred this Court to the very provision of section 2 of the Ordinance and section 3 of the Interpretation of Laws and General Clauses Act, 1972. Section 2 of the G Ordinance provides that if the President is satisfied that the circumstances stipulated therein do exist he may order the deportation of the person concerned "from any part of the Territory to any other part of the Territory". By section 3 above, the word "Territory" is assigned the meaning "Tanganyika" "the territory formerly comprising the Republic of Tanganyika". On that basis learned counsel charged, and this is where the thrust of the application H lies, the President manifestly exceeded his powers under the Ordinance in purporting to deport the applicant from Dar es Salaam Region to Zanzibar which is not part of Tanganyika, thereby extending, in effect, the operation of the Ordinance to Zanzibar. In his opinion, the Order of deportation was illegal and void ab initio.

With regard to the powers of the President under the Constitution of the United Republic, Mr. Mwale submitted that there is no provision I that empowers the President to deport a person from Tanganyika to Zanzibar or to extend, as it were, the A operation of the Tanganyika Deportation Ordinance to Zanzibar. He argued that there was no occasion to operate sections 11 (1) and 94 (1) of the Constitution simply because he said, the matter at hand did not fall B within the scope of "mambo yanayohusika na Hali ya Hatari" which is one of the matters specified in Part II of the Schedule. "Mambo yanayohusika na Hali ya Hatari", he argued means emergency matters.

MAPIGANO J
Mr. Mwale concluded his speech by submitting that since the Order of deportation is at law illegal, then what was occasioned by the Order i.e. the arrest, detention and deportation of the applicant to Zanzibar, were also C illegal and that, therefore, the order should be declared null and void and the applicant set at liberty.
I will now proceed to consider the merit or demerits of the application and pronounce on the issues that have been raised. The point has been boldly made that the Order of deportation is not challengeable in Court. As we D have seen, counsel for the respondents is relying on section 3 of the Deportation Ordinance which, as already shown, reads that an appeal shall not lie from any order of deportation under the Ordinance.
This point is easily disposable. I think Mr. Shio has gone wrong in construing section 3 of the Ordinance that E way and the authorities militate against his proposition. This is not an appeal. It is an application under section 348 (1) (a) of the Criminal Procedure Code for habeas corpus. No doubt that the writ of habeas corpus can be used to challenge even the act of the Executive if that act unjustifiably infringes upon the liberty of the subject. F In being seized of the matter a court is not sitting in appeal as such. It is merely concerned to find out for certain whether or not the act of the Executive is in line with the law of the land. Where a person has been detained by the Executive the test, as stated above, is whether the detention is illegal or not. And over the years G many decisions have been pronounced that it is illegal if the order in respect thereof is ex facie bad, or where the Executive has acted in excess of its powers or failed to comply with the requirements thereof, or where the Executive has acted in bad faith or has committed a breach of natural justice. In short, therefore, the competence of this application cannot be impeached on the ground that this court lacks jurisdiction. H
The next point does not, likewise, present any difficulty and must be decided by reference to the language of the statute, which tends itself to easy interpretation. On behalf of the applicant it has been contended, in fine, that the order of deportation is on the face of it bad and that it is ultra vires the powers conferred on the President by the Deportation I
MAPIGANO J
Ordinance. There, as remarked, is where the main punch of this application rests. A Section 2 of the Ordinance whereunder the applicant was deported provides, in language clear and plain, that the President can deport a person from one part of the Territory to any other part of the Territory. I set down part of that section hereunder: B

> Where it is shown by evidence on oath, to the satisfaction of the President that any person is conducting himself so as to C be dangerous to peace and good order in any part of the Territory, or... the President may, if he thinks fit by order under his hand and official seal, order that person to be deported from any part of the Territory to any other part of the Territory.

We must refer to the meaning given the word "Territory" by section 3 of the Interpretation of Laws and General D Clauses Act, 1972. Under that provision "Territory" means Tanganyika. Section 2 of the Ordinance does not say, and I should find some difficulty in understanding it if it did, that the President is empowered to deport a E person from any part of Tanganyika to Zanzibar. It may be noted that there has been for over forty years a comparable law on the statute books of Zanzibar providing for deportations and restrictions. It is the Deportation Decree, Cap. 41 of the Laws of Zanzibar, which came into force on 11th June, 1940. Under F section 4 of the Decree, the Executive there may, if it thinks fit, make a restriction order in respect of any person who is either (a) a convicted person, or (b) an undesirable person. An undesirable person is, by section 2, a person who is or has been conducting himself so as to be dangerous to peace, good order, good government, or public morals. By the same section, a restriction order means an order prohibiting the person in respect of whom G it is made from entering or from leaving an area within Zanzibar without the consent of the officer specified in the order. That said, I am compelled to pronounce, with the greatest respect and humility, that the order of deportation in respect of the applicant in the instant matter is, for the reasons I have given, gravely flawed.
Finally, as regards the point about the President having been granted powers by the Constitution of the United H Republic to make orders of deportation such as the one here, I am at one with Mr. Mwale that it is hardly possible to derive out of the terms of sections 11(1) and 94 (1) of the Constitution and Part II of the Schedule I thereto any such powers. "Mamlaka juu ya mambo yanayohusika na Hali ya Hatari" in the Schedule are, in my opinion, quite different affairs. Under the previous Constitution, the Interim Constitution of Tanzania, 1965, Cap. 596 of the J
Revised Laws of Tanganyika, they were called emergency powers and I see nothing in the 1977 Constitution that A can reasonably lead me to say that they are now known otherwise. In any event, it is quite obvious that the President did not purport to invoke his powers under those sections. He expressly stated that he was exercising his powers given to him by section 2 of the Deportation Ordinance. In sum, there is no force in the argument put forth by Mr. Shio relating to the Constitution. B
In the result I am satisfied that there are merits in this application and compelling grounds for granting it. I hold that the order of deportation against the applicant be set aside and the applicant be released unless he is otherwise lawfully held or restricted. C
Order accordingly.

The parties to this cause are a Msukuma and a Mchagga. Having granted divorce which was petitioned by the wife, a Mchagga, the Court was confronted with the problem of dividing the matrimonial assets between her and the respondent, a Msukuma. While the petitioner relied on the Court of Appeal decision in Bi Hawa Mohamed v Ally Sefu the respondent raised two arguments. First, that although the marriage subsisted for about twenty years the petitioner contributed nothing towards the acquisition of any of the property. Secondly, that according to the Sukuma customary law, in case of a divorce, a wife is not entitled to a share of property, even though jointly acquired during the subsistence of a marriage.

R.C. Kesaria for the petitioner
N.E. Mkono for the respondent
Judgment
Mnzavas, J.K.: The petitioner, Pulcheria Pundugu, and the respondent, Samweli Huma Pundugu, were married in church on 19/2/64. The union is blessed with five issues. Now the petitioner is petitioning for divorce alleging adultery and cruelty on the part of her husband, the respondent. In her petition as well as in her evidence she said that the respondent always neglected and abused her. According to her testimony their quarrels came to a climax in October, 1979 when the respondent forced her out of the matrimonial home.

The Court was also told that in January 1981 while they were living in separation the respondent brought another G lady into the matrimonial home and that the respondent has since been living in adultery with this other lady.

It was also her testimony that the respondent has not maintained her and the children (who are living with her) from 1979. According to her evidence during their married life they acquired a farm at Magogoni where they H erected a house, bought a house near Drive Inn Cinema and built a house in Bariadi.

The petitioner prayed that the marriage be dissolved, that she be given custody of all the children, that the respondent be ordered to maintain her and the children and that she be given part of the property she alleges was jointly acquired during the subsistence of the marriage. I

In his defence the respondent argued that the petitioner left the matrimonial home on her own accord and that he did not drive her out of the house. He also told the Court that A he started living with another woman a year after the petitioner had left him.

It was his defence that for eight years they lived happily but that after this period matrimonial friction started. He told the court that the petitioner became unco-coperative, extravagant and that he could no longer trust her with B money as she had started business without his knowledge.

As for the property alleged by the petitioner to have been jointly acquired during the subsistence of the marriage it was respondent's defence that he acquired all the property single handed and that the petitioner did not C contribute to their acquisition. As to petitioner's argument that he has not provided maintenance for her and the children, the respondent said "all along I wanted to maintain the children but she refused. She gave me the impression that she had the means to support them. Before we came to court I had asked her what amount of D money she needed from me as her maintenance and the children and she said that she did not want any money".

Then the respondent finally said that he did not see any reason why he should maintain the petitioner bearing in mind that her income is bigger than his. E

From the evidence of the petitioner and respondent's defence there is no dispute that the respondent had willing sexual intercourse with one Penina Mkoma while the marriage between him and the petitioner was subsisting. This was adultery by the respondent and therefore a matrimonial offence under section 107(2)(a) of the Law of F Marriage Act No.5 of 1971. As a result of respondent's adultery with the said Penina two children have been born.

The parties have lived in separation for over five years now and if the evidence of the petitioner is anything to go by, and bearing in mind respondent's adultery, the respondent is to blame for the separation. G

Taking into regard all the evidence tendered before me and the conduct and circumstances of the parties it is clear that there is no more love between the parties. The marriage between the parties has not only broken down but has broken down irretrievably.

That being the position it will serve no useful purpose for the union to continue. It is therefore ordered that the H marriage between the parties be dissolved; and it is hereby dissolved.
As for the question of custody of the children, they have been living with their mother from 1979. When cross-examined by the learned counsel for the petitioner on the question of custody the respondent replied - "I did not seriously object to their going to live with their mother" In para 9(b) of his reply the respondent has no I objection that the petitioner be given custody of the children under the age of eighteen but on condition that he be allowed to have A reasonable access to them.
MNZAVAS JK
In deciding in whose custody an infant should be placed the Court is required (under section 125(2) of the Law of Marriage Act) to take into account the paramount consideration regarding the welfare of the infants. The B Court is also required to have regard to the wishes of the parents of the infants.
In the present case, and as I have already mentioned above, the respondent does not insist that he should be given custody of the children. Indeed, he has no objection to the petitioner's claim that the children be in her custody. C
I accordingly order that the two infants Jane Pundugu and Agnes Pundugu who are below eighteen years of age be in the custody of their mother, the petitioner. As the other three children are over eighteen years the question of custody does not in law apply to them. D
I now come to the difficult question regarding distribution of property. As I have already mentioned above the applicant argued that she contributed in the acquisition of the property namely - A house in Magogoni and a farm, E a house at Drive Inn Cinema Dar es Salaam, and a house in Bariadi, Shinyanga region. The respondent on the other hand countered that he acquired the said property with his own resources and that the petitioner contributed nothing in the acquisition of the property. In support of the argument that the petitioner is entitled to a share of the property the learned counsel for the petitioner argued that even if the petitioner did not contribute in F way of money in acquiring the said property, she was, it was submitted, entitled to a share of the property by the mere fact that she was wife of the respondent and contributed in the maintenance of the matrimonial home. In support of this argument the Court was referred to the decision by the Court of Appeal in Civil appeal No.9 of 1983 - Bi Hawa Mohamed v Ally Seffu. G
As regards the argument that in this case the Court should decide the question of distribution of the assets taking into account Sukuma customary law, Mr. Kesaria submitted that in a conflicts case the Court is required to decide the case on the basis of policy and justice. In support of this argument the decision in Ramadhani s/o H Bakari v Kichunda Mwenda and Another [1973] L.R.T.33 was quoted. The Court was also referred to the decision of this Court in Mbaruku v Chimonyogoro [1971] H.C.D. 406.
In rebuttal Mr. Mkono argued that the case in Bi Hawa Mohamed v Ally Seffu has no relevance on the facts of I this case. It was submitted that in Bi. Hawa's case the wife was a mere house wife and therefore did house work which could have contributed towards the acquisition of the assets. In the present case it was argued that the petitioner has since her marriage been working and that she A kept her income to herself. It was argued that the petitioner did not contribute towards acquisition of the property. It was also argued that under Sukuma customary law matrimonial property remains with the husband B and that in deciding the question of distribution of the assets the Court should have regard to the customs of the community to which the parties belong. In support of this argument section 11(2)(a)of the law of Marriage Act was referred to the Court.

It is now settled law after the decision by the Court of Appeal in Bi. Hawa's case and the commentary by C Professor Rwezaura in his paper - Division of Matrimonial Assets under the Tanzania Marriage Law, that the principle underlying division of property is one of compensation, it does not make any difference whether what is being compensated is direct monetary contribution or domestic services. D

As argued by Professor Rwezaura at page 6 of his paper, and, in my view, rightly so, "the legal principle on which division of matrimonial assets is based is one of giving recognition to the contribution of the spouse towards the acquisition or enhancement of value of the particular property".

It is not all in dispute that the property (three houses) at Bariadi, Magogoni and at Drive Inn Cinema area were E acquired during the subsistence of the marriage.

Respondent's argument was that despite the fact that they were married about twenty years ago and that the property was acquired during the life of their union the petitioner did not contribute anything towards acquisition F of any of the property. It was also respondent's argument that as he is a Msukuma, a wife is not, under Sukuma customary law, entitled to a share of property (jointly acquired during the subsistence of a marriage) in case of a divorce.

It may have been Sukuma custom that a divorced wife is not entitled to a share of matrimonial assets jointly G acquired during the subsistence of the marriage; but with due respect to the learned counsel for the respondent such customary law is no longer valid after the enactment of the Law of Marriage Act - No.5 of 1971. Of course section 114(2)(a) says that in dividing assets under section 114(1) the Court shall have regard "to the H custom of the community to which the parties belong". But that does not mean that the petitioner is not entitled to a share in the assets. Indeed even if, for the sake of argument, the customary law argument was to be accepted, it is a fact that the parties are of different customs. The petitioner is a Chagga whereas the respondent is a Sukuma. In such cases, as was the case in Re - Innocent Mbilinyi's Administration of Estates - [1969] H.C.D. 283, the petitioner can reasonably be said I to have abandoned his Sukuma mode of life in favour of a non-traditional way of life. A

The argument that the petitioner did not contribute anything towards acquisition of the said property is, I agree with the learned counsel for the petitioner, hard to believe; bearing in mind that the parties have lived together as B husband and wife for about twenty years - Both of them apparently all the time engaged in salaried jobs.

On the facts of this case I am inclined to believe the petitioner when she says that she contributed in the acquisition of the assets over and above her contribution in the day to day caring of the children and domestic duties. C

According to the evidence of the respondent when cross-examined by learned counsel for the petitioner the house at Drive Inn Cinema area is worth about Shs. 300,000/=; that at Kigamboni is estimated at Shs. D 200,000/= and the one at Bariadi was built at a cost of Shs. 40,000/= ten years ago. There is a developed shamba of about eleven acres at Magogoni. There are sixteen head of cattle, thirty goats and three sheep.

As to how much each of the parties contributed in acquiring these assets is difficult to say with any amount of certainty. It is however not in dispute that the respondent's monthly salary has always been much far bigger than petitioner's. E

Taking into account this fact there can be no doubt that petitioner's contribution in the acquisition of the property is less than that of the respondent. Doing the best I can and taking into account the fact that the petitioner will F have the burden to house the two infants -Jane and Agnes and the further fact that the other children have always been living with her, ends of justice demand that she gets one of the three houses as her share of the assets jointly acquired during the subsistence of the union.

Bearing in mind that one of the houses is at Bariadi, Shinyanga region, and the second house is at the Magogoni G farm where the respondent is residing and is running business, it will be convenient to both parties for the house situated near Drive Inn Cinema be awarded to the petitioner. It is so ordered. Coming to the question of maintenance it is not disputed that the respondent has not been maintaining the petitioner and the children since 1979. All this time the petitioner has been providing for the children and employing an ayah to take care of the H mentally retarded child.

The respondent argued that he offered to provide maintenance but that the petitioner declined to accept the offer. I am far from being persuaded by respondent's argument. I know of no wife with five children who would refuse I maintenance from a husband. Bearing in mind that the petitioner had to pay an ayah to take care of the retarded child as well as maintaining herself and the other children but of course not forgetting that the petitioner had an independent A income from her salary; it is my view that a monthly maintenance of Shs.1000/= would have been reasonable for the period they lived in separation. She is therefore entitled to arrears of maintenance of Shs.1000/= monthly for the period of five years of separation. This comes to Shs.60,000/= arrears of maintenance. B

As for the coming years and bearing in mind that the respondent has since retired from Government Service and the further fact that the petitioner is in receipt of Shs.2700/= monthly gross salary, the burden of maintenance of C the two infant children will have to be the responsibility of both parties. The respondent is to pay Shs.800/= monthly towards maintenance of the two children. I make no order as to costs.

Order accordingly.

The respondent petitioned for divorce on the ground of cruelty in a primary court where she was unsuccessful. Moreover he, once stripped her naked before other people including her father-in-law.
Held: (i) Cruelty means wilful and unjustifiable conduct of such a character as to cause danger to life, limb or H health, bodily or mental, so as to give rise to a reasonable apprehension of such danger;
(ii) the appellant's conduct of not only beating but also undressing his wife infront of other people generally, and her father-in-law in particular was an embarrassing and distressing act of cruelty which inflicted I considerable physical and mental torture to the respondent.

Case referred to:
1. Russell v Russell [1897] A.C. 395 B
Jugdgment
23 September, 1985. Lubuva, J.: Before Mkamba Primary Court in Kisarawe District, the Respondent filed proceedings seeking divorce against the Appellant, her husband. She was unsuccessful before the Primary Court from whose decision, she appealed to the District Court Kisarawe. Her appeal was allowed wherein the C marriage was ordered dissolved. From that decision the appellant has appealed.
In her testimony before the Primary Court, the Respondent gave what appears to be quite a detailed version of events of cruelty against the appellant which ultimately gave rise to the petition for divorce. She had alleged that D the appellant was in the habit of beating and stripping her naked before other people. She cited one incident in which she was beaten and had to seek refuge at the house of the ten cell leader one Athumani Kindumbo. The appellant admitted to have done so and pleaded to be forgiven by the Respondent before the ten-cell leader pledging not to repeat such incident. This incident is not denied by the appellant who as a matter of fact gave E Shs.10/= to the Respondent by way of appeasing her. The ten-cell leader Athumani Kindumbo (PW.1) also gave supporting evidence on the matter. The Respondent also alleged that on another incident, the Appellant F again beat her up and the matter was taken to the Police dispensary and the ten-cell leader who, according to her was insisting that she should continue staying with the appellant and was not keen to have the matter taken to court. On this occasion, the Respondent alleges that the Appellant agreed to pay the Respondent Shs.50/= so as to have the matter settled amicably at home. In regard to this, there does not seem to be any dispute raised as G the Appellant himself admits in his defence when cross examined by the court when he states:

.... Nimeona nimekosa ndiyo maana nimelipa faini ya Shs. 50/= kwake.

This means therefore that apart from the incident in which the Appellant agreed to pay Shs.10/= to the H Respondent, there was another incident as the respondent claims in which she was beaten resulting in the payment of Shs.50/=. This is because, the Appellant admits of only one incident of beating his wife, the I Respondent when he offered to pay Shs.10/=, to the Respondent in appeasement. On record, it is also shown that as the hearing of the suit was going on, the Respondent reported to the Court that the Appellant was threatening to kill her. The Respondent was thus ordered to stay at her father's A house until the day of judgment. On such evidence the Primary Court Magistrate who sat with two assessors in agreement with the assessors was of the opinion that no sufficient evidence had been adduced in support of the B Respondent's case. That cruelty had not been proved to the extent of warranting the dissolution of the marriage. The Respondent appealed to the District Court Kisarawe District.

The learned district Magistrate in a well reasoned judgment analysed the entire evidence as adduced before the C Primary Court. He came to the conclusion that the evidence as adduced sufficiently proved cruelty on the part of the Appellant the husband in terms of the provisions of Section 107(2)(c) of the Law of Marriage Act, 1971. Having believed as the Primary Court did in the truthfulness of the evidence of the Respondent the learned D District Magistrate found as an established fact that the Appellant had been in the habit of beating his wife, the Respondent and had stripped her naked before the Appellant's father. This, in the view of the learned District Magistrate was sufficient cause of mental and physical torture on the part of the respondent. As pointed out, the learned District Magistrate held that the marriage had in the circumstances broken down irreparably. The E Appellant's main ground of appeal is that the beating of his wife the Respondent was an isolated incident which took place way back in the past was not sufficient to prove cruelty. He maintains that he still loves his wife in which case it was erroneous on the part of the learned District Magistrate in upsetting the decision of the Primary Court.

At the hearing of the appeal, the Respondent stressed that she is no longer interested to live with the Appellant as F man and wife due to the persistent cruel behaviour of the Appellant towards her. She contended that though the Appellant had promised before the ten-cell leader not to repeat beating or undressing her infront of other people, he does not adhere to his word. The Appellant did not want to say anything before this court apart from G his statement that anything that the court decides would be alright for him, he repeated his pleading that he was still in love with his wife, the Respondent. On the main, there is no dispute that the gravamen of the case is centred on the question of cruelty on the part of the appellant. Cruelty is defined by Tolstoy in his book, The H Law and Practice of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 5th Edition at page 60 as:

.... Wilful and unjustifiable conduct of such a character as to cause danger to life, limb, or health, bodily or mental, or as to I give rise to a reasonable apprehension of such a danger.

Such was also the holding of the House of Lords in the case of Russell v Russell (1897) A.C. 395. I would A with respect adopt and apply this principle of law to the instant case. With this guiding principle, there can be no doubt that the learned District Magistrate was justified in his decision. There was sufficient evidence from the B petitioner the respondent which was believed as truthful as well as the supporting evidence of Athumani Kindumbo (PW.1) which amply proved the petitioner's claim that the marriage had irreparably broken down. Apart from this, it is also clearly shown on record that as the proceedings were going on before the Primary C Court, because of the Appellant's threats to kill the Respondent, the court ordered the Respondent to stay with her father and at the same time, Appellant was warned not to repeat such behaviour. This is yet another piece of evidence which fully supports petitioner/Respondent's claim against the cruel behaviour of the Appellant. The D Appellant's conduct of not only beating but also of undressing her infront of other people in general and particularly her father-in-law was no doubt a most embarrassing and distressing act of cruelty which inflicted considerable physical and mental torture on the Respondent.

From such evidence as a whole, and what I have heard from the parties themselves at the hearing of the appeal, E the Respondent who is strongly objecting to live together with the Appellant and cannot be compelled to do so by court proceedings, I am satisfied that the learned District Magistrate' decision was justified. In the event, the appeal is dismissed with costs.

F Appeal dismissed.

Judgment
Bahati, J.: This is a suit for damages for slander. The plaintiff in her plaint avers that the defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published of the plaintiff to members of the Tanzania Police Force, F and members of the Executive Committee of the Institute of Finance Management Council as well as members of a Probe Committee appointed by the said Executive Committee the following words:
.... Accountancy and Costing Examination Questions were sold to me by Angela for Shs.1000/=. The sale took place at a Bus Stop near Urafiki Ubungo in the morning. G
By reason of the said words the plaintiff has been injured gravely in her character, credit and reputation and has been brought into public scandal, odium and contempt and has suffered damage. H
In consequence of the said words the Institute of Finance Management terminated the plaintiff's studies at the said Institute and barred her from attempting any Institute of Finance Management examinations in future and further nullified the results the plaintiff had achieved in April, 1984 examination. Also the National Development I Corporation the plaintiff's employer withdrew its training award to the plaintiff and terminated the services of the plaintiff. The plaintiff therefore claims general damages from the defendant in excess of Shs.200,000/= on the basis of aggravated damages as the plaintiff demanded an A apology and reasonable compensation from the defendant but the demand was ignored.

This case proceeded ex-parte because the defendant failed to file her written statement of defence as ordered by B the court. In her evidence in court the plaintiff averred that she was a student at the Institute of Finance Management hereinafter referred to as IFM. She was dismissed from IFM after she was called and told by the IFM authorities that she had sold examination papers. She was taken to the Police Station in connection with this C allegation of selling examination papers. She was also taken to a panel of investigators appointed by IFM Management. She denied throughout to have sold any examination papers to anybody. She also appeared before a probe Committee and again she denied selling any papers to anybody. All the same she was dismissed D by letter dated 2nd May, 1984. When she got the Police report, the report had the name of the person who had alleged to have bought the papers from the plaintiff. The name was that of the defendant namely Ancilla Kilinda. The Police report, moreover, exonerated the plaintiff. All the same she was dismissed even from the E National Development Corporation (N.D.C.), her employer. After that the plaintiff stayed for 4 months without a job before she eventually got employed with the Co-operative Union of Tanganyika as an accounts clerk whereas she would have been employed as an accountant if she had completed her course at the IFM. The plaintiff felt very depressed and disturbed mentally because of all these occurrences and she resorted to the law F courts through a lawyer in order to get whatever rights she had. As a result of this episode she was shunned by all her friends, she lost her job and missed her certificate and encountered a variety of other problems. She was therefore praying for damages to the tune of at least 500,000/=.

In his submission at the end of this case Mr. Uzanda, learned counsel for the plaintiff said that the defendant had G slandered the plaintiff and that this slander was actionable per se without proof special damages because the words complained of impute a crime for which the plaintiff could be prosecuted and that the words had damaged H the plaintiff in her profession. He submitted further that the plaintiff was entitled to exemplary damages for this slander. The plaintiff, Mr. Uzanda submitted, could recover substantial damages because she has suffered considerable injury to her reputation and because the slander led to her dismissal from IFM and N.D.C. and that the allegations received very wide publicity in the press and on the radio. Further more, Mr. Uzanda said that this slander has been aggravated by the conduct of the defendant who has shown no I contrition nor has the defendant apologized. The plaintiff had asked for an apology and nominal damages from A the defendant but the defendant has done nothing of the sort. Nor did the defendant bother even to file a written statement of defence.

There is no doubt that this slander is actionable per se because it imputes the commission of a crime and also B because it has damaged the profession of the plaintiff. There is no doubt from the evidence given that the defamatory words were uttered by the defendant and that the slander has caused the plaintiff to suffer damage in her profession as well as in her reputation. For the defendant to allege that the plaintiff sold her examination C papers is certainly to defame her exposing her to prosecution by the Police. Similarly for the plaintiff to lose her certificate in advanced diploma in Accounting and also to suffer dismissal from the course and her employment is to suffer damage. Mr. Uzanda for the plaintiff contends that exemplary damages should be awarded. Jowitt's Dictionary of English Law Second Edition defines exemplary damages as follows: D

> .... exemplary, or punitive or vindictive damages are damages given not merely as pecuniary compensation for the loss E actually sustained by the plaintiff, but also as a kind of punishment of the defendant, with the view of discouraging similar wrongs in future, as in actions for defamation, malicious injuries, oppression, continuing nuisances, etc.

I shall now consider first whether there is any defence available for the defendant in this case. I can see none. F There is no defence to this suit unless the defendant can prove that her allegations are true. This she has not done. The evidence has shown clearly that it was the defendant who slandered the plaintiff and that the Police investigated the matter and found the allegations false. There cannot be any defence of either qualified privilege G or absolute privilege here.

Now, as for exemplary damages, I am of the opinion that they should be awarded here. I am fortified in this view by the court of Appeal Case of Davies v Mohanlal Karamshi Shah [1957] E.A. 352. Where it was held H inter alia that "punitive or exemplary damages are, as their names imply, damages by way of punishment or deterrent. They are given entirely without reference to any proved actual loss suffered by the plaintiff". In that Court of Appeal case, the plaintiff was a Deputy Registrar of the Supreme Court at Mombasa who had had libels I published of him by the defendant which contained serious allegations of dishonestly, wilful misconduct in the course of his official duties, and professional misconduct.

The libels were published to the Chief Justice of Kenya, the Attorney General, a Judge at Mombasa etc. The A Court of Appeal for East Africa awarded him Shs.10,000/= as damages. In this case the plaintiff is asking for at least Shs.500,000/= as damages since she has lost her job and has suffered disgrace and mental torture besides B suffering financially and being rendered incapable of obtaining qualifications as an accountant and also being forced to work as a mere accounts clerk. Considering all these factors in their totality, I agree that the plaintiff is certainly entitled to substantial and exemplary damages. I would award her Shs.150,000/= as damages. C

I therefore enter judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of Shs.150,000/= with costs as prayed in the plaint.
Judgment for the plaintiff.

Judgment

Lugakingira, J.: This was an application of change of venue under s.80 of the Criminal D Procedure Code. The applicants who are facing various charges in the district court at Tarime are apprehensive that they will not have a fair and impartial trial if their case is heard by any magistrate of that Court and at the said court. Their main grounds as set out in the affidavit and argued by learned counsel Mr. Mwale are, I think, E

(a) that the case was mentioned nineteen times and no bail was granted;

(b) that when bail was finally granted it was coupled with difficult conditions which the High Court had to modify; F

(c) that the complainant is well off and threatens to secure imprisonment if the case is tried at Tarime; and

(d) that the trial Magistrate similarly threatens incarceration whenever the case comes up for mention. G

In general, Mr. Mwale submitted that in considering such an application the proper test was whether reasonable apprehension existed in the mind of the accused. H

First of all, I do not know which record Mr. Mwale and his clients had in mind when they spoke of 19 mentions without bail. What I have before me is a charge sheet dated 13 October, 1977. Next, the record reveals that the applicants (and 2 others) first appeared in court on that very day and after pleas had been taken Mr. Mwale I applied for bail. Again, bail was granted the same day even if on difficult conditions. I can find nothing else on the available record prior to 13 October, 1977. In the result, I am not certain that the allegation in ground (a) is not misleading. What is evident, on the contrary, is that the A disposal of this case has been held up by the actions of the applicants and their advocate. Thus, between 13 October, 1977 and 22 February, 1978, the trial awaited the application to this Court for bail and the result of B that application. Then on 2 March, 1978, Mr. Mwale wrote to the trial court proposing or confirming the hearing date for 25 April, 1978. And on the latter date he appeared in court and revealed that his clients were again applying to this court, this time for change of venue. From these facts I am unwilling to say that the trial court indulged in any procedural dereliction. C

The four grounds do not call for individual discussion at this stage. Suffice it to say that they were put forward generally as evidence from which bias could be inferred. I have already indicated that in Mr. Mwale's view the test is whether reasonable apprehension of bias exists in the mind of the accused. Mr. Mwale is not alone in D saying so. Similar views were expressed by this court, In re R. v George Tumpes [1968] H.C.D. n.416 and earlier in Bhag Singh v Rex [1941] 1 TLR (R) 133. In the latter case it was held by Wilson, J., I quote,

..... the proper test to apply ..... is not whether the Magistrate is actually prejudiced against the accused, but whether there E exists in the mind of the accused a reasonable apprehension that he will not have a fair and unprejudiced trial before the magistrate in question; and that in deciding what is a reasonable apprehension on the part of the accused regard F must be had not to abstract standards of reasonableness but to the standard of honesty and impartiality of the accused himself and his degree of education and intelligence.

Attractive as the above view may sound, I am not prepared to say that it is not without its dangers. However G learned and intelligent the accused might be, can it be reasonably expected that his predicament and obvious wishes would leave him an entirely impartial man? Doesn't this test, which is wholly subjective, make the error of constituting the accused a judge of his own cause? I think, with respect, that the correct view is that the test H should be objective. The talk is therefore about "reasonable persons" rather that "reasonable accused". In Metropolitan Properties v Lannon, [1969] 1 Q.B. 577, for instance, Lord Denning, M.R. said (at p.599):

In considering whether there was a likelihood of bias, the court does not look at the mind of the justice himself or at the I mind of the chairman of the tribunal or whoever it may be, who sits in a judicial capacity. It does not look to see if there was a real likelihood that he would or did, in fact, favour one side at the expense A of the other. The court looks at the impression which would be given to other people. Even if he was as impartial as could be, nevertheless if right-minded persons could think that, in the circumstances, there was a real likelihood of bias on his part, then he should not sit. B

This passage was quoted with approval by this court in Tumaini v R. [1972] E.A. 441 at pp.444. On my part I think that the objective approach commends itself to reason and common sense. I cannot persuade myself to C accept a view where the accused were permitted to set the standard for the guidance of the court and I must confess that I have never before encountered such a view except in the two cases first cited. Were the court to be guided by a subjective test I do not see how they could guard against accused persons who, in the words of D Day, J. in R. v Taylor etc ex p. Vogwill (1895),14 T.L.R. 185 would jump at "anything at any time which could make fools suspect." In the result, I hold that the correct principle is set out in the Metropolitan Properties and Tumaini cases.

Now, in this case, has anything transpired that in the minds of reasonable persons would disqualify the Tarime E District court and all its Magistrates from trying the case? I was told of 19 mentions without bail and I have already shown the falsity of the allegation. I was then told of bail being granted with impossible conditions. It was never suggested, however, that these conditions were imposed on account of any bias on the mind of the F trial magistrate. What transpires is that the trial magistrate overreached himself in his enthusiasm to meet the prosecutor's prayers. That, to my mind, was a wrong exercise of discretion which pointed to the magistrate's understanding of his duty rather than to a poisoned state of mind. I was finally told that the complainant threatens to secure the applicants' imprisonment if the case is tried at Tarime. Typically, that is jumping at "anything at any G time which could make fools suspect." The complainant is not the magistrate. If it is feared that he would attempt to use his alleged wealth to influence the verdict, there is nothing to prevent him from doing so regardless H of the venue. On the other hand, I do not believe that the trial magistrate has been threatening to imprison the applicants if they have not been misbehaving in his court. If their constant interlocutory complaints are anything to go by I think they might have urged the magistrate to make the warning he did.

In summary I find nothing upon which reasonable persons would doubt the partiality of Tarime District Court and I all its magistrates. It seems that the applicants are self-persecuting by belief in their own imaginations. I dismiss the application and order that the trial proceeds at Tarime District Court before any A competent magistrate stationed there.
Application dismissed.

The applicants had applied for bail in the Resident Magistrate's Court at Musoma. They were granted bail upon G execution of cash bonds of various amounts and upon additional requirements to report at the Police Station at stated times. Two days later a Senior State Attorney, saying he was acting on the instructions of the Director of H Public Prosecutions, moved the court to cancel the order for bail. The magistrate complied with the move mainly because it became known that immediately after the court had released the applicants on bail two days earlier, the Regional Commissioner for Mara Region had ordered their arrest and detention, apparently on the I same grounds for which they were charged in court and admitted to bail. The magistrate therefore cancelled his previous orders for bail in order to avoid a conflict between the executive and the judiciary. Subsequently, the Resident Magistrate forwarded the record to the High Court for review. A

Held: (i) In the terms of bail as awarded by the trial court, the additional requirements to report at the Police Station at stated times were undesirable, meaningless and practically a nuisance; B

(ii) under s.127 of the Criminal Procedure Code, orders for bail may be varied or cancelled by the same court which made them provided there are sufficient grounds for such variation or cancellation; in this case, no such grounds were given before the court to make the Resident Magistrate cancel or vary his own previous orders for bail; C

(iii) according to the concept of Independence of the Judiciary, once it is decided to take any person to court, then the entire judicial machinery should be left free to apply the rules applicable without harassment; the act of the Regional Commissioner to detain the applicants merely because they had been admitted to bail contrary to his personal views was wholly unjustified and illegal; D

(iv) constituting a judicial office a magistrate is required to disregard any extraneous pressures that might be applied on him, and to act only in accordance with the law, standing firm in defence of the people brought to E his court and in defence of the constitution and the law; in this case the Resident Magistrate was wrong in succumbing to executive pressure and cancelling his earlier orders for bail for fear that the Regional Commissioner would simply rearrest the applicants and render impotent the court order;

(v) once an accused person is taken to court, he is subject only to the jurisdiction of the court; the F reserve powers of Regional Commissioners to arrest and detain persons under the Regional and Area Commissioners (Amendment) Act, 1963 (Cap.461), are meant to deal with emergency situations and not with cases already taken to court under the ordinary penal laws of the land; therefore the Regional Commissioner had G no power under the law to rearrest and detain the applicants and his action was in breach of the constitution which the courts have to defend.

Judgment

Mfalila, J.: This is an application for variation of terms of bail imposed by the district I Court at Musoma. Applicants 1 and 2 namely Hamis Masisi and Shadrack Edward were granted bail upon their executing bonds for Sh.50,000/= and two sureties each in the like sum. There was also an additional A order requiring them to report at the Police Station twice a day at the stated times. The rest of the applicants except applicant No.5 were granted bail upon their executing or rather depositing cash bonds of Shs. 30,000/= with two sureties to execute bonds in the same amount. The 5th applicant was admitted to bail after depositing B cash bond in the sum of Shs. 50,000/= with two sureties in the like sum. There were also additional requirements to report at the Police Station at stated times. Before I leave this aspect of the case I must state C that apart from the highly undesirable nature of the additional requirements, I have never really understood the meaning behind them. They are practically of no use except for their nuisance value. If an accused wished to abscond, he can do so during the intervals and in any case if the Court is unsure as to whether the accused will D appear for trial, then it should remand him instead of making these highly inconvenient orders of reporting at the Police Station. I would have thought that the Court would have been a better place. Anyway the Resident Magistrate cancelled these orders in a subsequent application by the Republic so that at the moment they are not in force hence as Mr. Kinabo correctly stated on behalf of the Republic, they cannot be subject of a variation E order by this Court. On this basis the application on behalf of all the applicants is dismissed.

1985 TLR p26

I will however proceed to consider a request by the Resident Magistrate Musoma to review his order dated 16/12/78 by which he cancelled his order made on 14/12/78. After making the order dated 16/12/78 the F Resident Magistrate forwarded the record to this Court for two purposes -

(1) To review the approprieteness and legality of the order regarding cancellation of bail. G

(2) To discuss and determine the constitutional problem as to whether it is appropriate for the executive (particularly a Regional Commissioner) to order detention of an accused person for an offence the same accused is charged with in court, and in disregard of the Court's order that the same accused is entitled to bail. H

Mr. Kinabo addressed me on both these points and generally I agree with his view. Regarding the first question, by its very nature, an order for bail should be a subject of variation or cancellation by the Court which made it. I Indeed Section 127 of the Criminal Procedure Code gives this power. Additional grounds may be where it is disclosed on oath that the accused is on the point of leaving the jurisdiction of the Court without the intention to return and face trial, or that the accused is a convict in another case or that while A out on bail the accused has committed another crime or that while out on bail the accused has committed another offence. These would be sufficient grounds for the Court to review, vary, or cancel its own order. Denial of such powers would inevitably lead to miscarriages of justice. I will next consider whether in this case the B Magistrate's order was proper.

As indicated when all these applicants appeared before him on 14/12/78 the Resident Magistrate released them on bail on various terms. Then two days later on 16/12/78 the Senior State Attorney moved the Court to cancel C the orders of bail it had made on 14/12/78 in respect of all the applicants. The Senior State Attorney informed the Court that he was acting on the instructions of the Director of Public Prosecutions. Apart from this information, the Senior State Attorney had very little to add to what the prosecutor had told the Court two days earlier and with respect I do not think he made out a case for the Court to vary or rescind its earlier order. It D was at this stage that Counsel for the applicants informed the Court of the high handed behaviour by the Regional Commissioner for Mara Region, Mr. Wassira wherein he ordered the arrest and detention of all the applicants as soon as they were out of Court and had fulfilled their conditions for bail. The Regional Commissioner ordered E their detention on the same grounds or for the same offence they were charged with in Court. Thereupon the Resident Magistrate saw what he called "a conflict of powers" between the executive and the judiciary branches of Government. Therefore while recognising the fact that the Republic had made no case to make him do so to F avoid a conflict between the executive and the judiciary for as he saw it the Regional Commissioner would simply rearrest the applicants rendering his order for bail impotent.

The Resident Magistrate was wrong in both respects. He is not supposed to make judicial decisions on G expediency. His is a judicial office in which he is supposed to act only in accordance with the law despite any irrelevant pressures that might be applied on him. I note with regret the helplessness which the Resident Magistrate exhibited in the face of these pressures from the executive. So long as the executive is manned by H ordinary human beings who are bound to exhibit excesses in their enthusiasm to serve the Republic, he should expect such conflicts and pressures, and his duty is not to succumb as he did, but to stand firm in defence not only of the people brought to his Court, but also the constitution and practices of the United Republic as by law I established. Secondly the Regional Commissioner could not have re-arrested the accused persons again for the simple reason that he would have no power to do so, section 7(2) of the Regional and Area Commissioners Acts (Amendment) Act 1963 is relevant. The Regional Commissioner could only do so if he wished to add to his list A of illegal and high handed actions. In that event appropriate action would be taken against him.

For these reasons the Resident Magistrate had no reason in law and in fact to vary and cancel his order for bail he made on 14/12/78. Accordingly his order dated 16/12/78 is set aside. B

Next I will consider the question posed by the Resident Magistrate namely whether it is appropriate for the executive branch of Government in this case a Regional Commissioner to order detention of an accused person C for an offence the same accused is charged with in Court in disregard of the Court's order that the same accused be admitted to bail. Quite clearly the answer is no and Mr. Kinabo who appeared for the Republic conceded this point and added that when the Director of Public Prosecutions instructed him to move the Court to cancel its D earlier orders for bail, he the Director had no knowledge that the Regional Commissioner had ordered the detention of these applicants in disregard of the Court's earlier order, although I might add a report sent here by the Resident Magistrate indicated the contrary. But on the basis of the District Court record and a report sent to E this Court by the Resident Magistrate Musoma in his letter dated 18th December 78, it is clear that the Regional Commissioner for Mara Region in a move which was not only wholly unjustified but illegal decided to detain the applicants merely because they had been admitted to bail contrary to his personal views on the matter. I say his move was wholly unjustified because it having been decided to take the applicants to a Court of Law, F then only the rules applicable in the administration of justice became applicable and in their application the Court concerned should not be under any influence or pressure from any quarter, in other words the entire judicial machinery, the prosecution, the defence, the Court and the subject of the proceedings i.e., the accused persons G should be free from harassment however well intentioned. This is the meaning behind the concept of the independence of the judiciary. This concept is part of the laws of the United Republic.

I also said the move was illegal because the Regional Commissioner cannot cite any legal provision to back his H high handed action against these applicants. If he chooses to cite section 7 of the Regional and Area Commissioners Acts (Amendment) Act 1963 (Cap. 461) the short answer to this is that this Act gave him no such powers, in fact these applicants can sustain an action against him for unlawful detention. The wording of this section is self explanatory. I will quote it in full for the benefit of all concerned: I

MFALILA J

Section 7 - (1) When the Regional Commissioner has reason to believe that any person is likely to commit a breach of A the peace or disturb the public tranquillity, or to do any act that may probably occasion a breach of the peace or disturb the public tranquillity, and that such breach cannot be prevented otherwise than by detaining such person in custody, the Commissioner may arrest or order a police officer verbally or in writing to arrest such person. B

(2) A person arrested under the powers conferred by this Section shall be taken as soon as practicable before a C Magistrate empowered under Section 41 of the Criminal Procedure Code to deal with the case, and if such person is not brought before such a Magistrate within forty eight hours after he was taken into custody, he shall be released and shall not be again arrested for the same cause in pursuance of the powers conferred by this Section. D

(3) Where a Regional Commissioner arrests or orders the arrest of any person under the powers conferred by this Section, he shall at the time of making or ordering the arrest or forthwith thereafter record his reasons therefor in E writing. The Commissioner shall deliver a copy of his recorded reasons, or cause a copy whereof to be delivered, to the Magistrate at the time the person arrested is brought before Magistrate or, if such person has been released before he is brought before the Magistrate, as soon as practicable after such release. F

Provided that the production of a copy of recorded reasons under this Section shall not authorise the Magistrate to dispense with the provisions of requiring information to be given on oath G

(4) A Magistrate before whom a person is brought under this Section may in his discretion, detain such person in custody until the completion of the inquiry prescribed by Section 51 of the Criminal Procedure Code. H

Thus these provisions are so clear to any mind that their misapplication as was done in this case can either be deliberate or a conscious urge to harass others simply because one thinks he has the power to do so, and this is what made me particularly sad on reading these records that a top Government representative in the region can I choose to act in this fashion. In this case the applicants had already been arrested and taken to Court under the provisions of the Penal laws of the land, there was therefore no room for the Commissioner to use the A reserve powers under Cap.461. Again as is clear from the provisions as set out above, these powers are meant to deal with an emergency situation, but having dealt with the arrested person as aforesaid, the B Commissioner must either release him or hand him over to the Court, but in any case he must make a report of his actions to the Court. Since in this case the Commissioner plucked the applicants from the Court, he can hardly be expected to have complied with the provision of Sub-section (3) of this Section: This is how, if the high C handedness of people like the Regional Commissioner for Mara Region is not ripped in the bud, the rights of individual citizens as guaranteed by the laws of a free country can be trampled under foot. More than that such actions give the Government a bad name. This is why they should not be allowed to happen and if they do dealt with severely. Illegalities in Government business cannot be allowed. D

The actions of the Regional Commissioner against these applicants has had another unfortunate result which is meant to be avoided by the concept of the independence of the judiciary and this is that the Magistrates at E Musoma District Court are in total confusion and disarray. They have reported that they fear handling any such cases of which more are said to be in the pipeline. It pains me to think that at this stage of our national life an individual leader can act in a way which is prejudicial to the proper functioning of the judicial process.

At this stage I have little to do except to tell the Magistrates at Musoma to continue performing their judicial F functions in this case and other cases in accordance with the text of their oaths that is without fear or favour. At the same time I would warn the executive at Musoma to stop interfering in the judicial process and that once an accused is taken to Court he is subject only to the jurisdiction of the Court. Any other actions on the part of the G executive at Musoma will be in breach of the Constitution of this country in which event this Court will have to move in its defence against anyone who will act in breach of its provisions. One of the duties of this Court is to protect the Constitution of the land.

There is one other matter. Counsel for the defence have informed this Court that the properties of all the H applicants have been seized by the Police at Musoma and their premises placed under police armed guard. If this be correct, I can only warn the Police at Musoma that their actions are unlawful and that they are bound to land the Government and themselves in a lot of trouble. The Regional Police Commander for Mara Region is I advised accordingly. The Resident Magistrate Mara Region is directed to bring to the attention of the relevant authorities at Musoma the text of this Ruling

Lastly since as I said the Resident Magistrate had no reason to cancel his earlier orders for bail in favour of the A applicants I make the following order:
All the applicants to be admitted to bail upon their executing bonds in the sum of Shs. 100,000/= each with two sureties in the like sum. The sureties must personally be approved by the Resident Magistrate Musoma both as B to their domicile and means to raise the required sum should need arise.
Order accordingly.

Mushi, J.: No. C6700 P.C. General Paul and No. C.6237 P.C. Edwin, who are respectively G 2nd and 1st appellant, were charged of and convicted with the offence of stealing by persons employed in Public service c/s 270 and 265 of the Penal Code and were each sentenced to five years imprisonment. They are appealing against such conviction and sentences. H

The two appellants were police officers and at the material time they were attached to Field Force Unit at Songea and were assigned garage work where they worked as mechanics. On the day in question PW1 - B.3261 CPL Maurus and PW2 - B.4053 PC Constantini, who are also F.F.U. vehicle and spoke with the driver briefly and walked across the road to certain huts. Immediately after that the A 2nd appellant, PC General came towards the vehicle carrying something. PW1 and PW2 were suspicious about the thing which the 2nd appellant was carrying. At that time the vehicle had been reversed and it was facing B Songea Town. 2nd appellant was putting the long thing in the vehicle. PW1 and PW2 approached the vehicle and enquired from 2nd appellant as to what he was putting in the vehicle and he replied nothing. PW1 and PW2 recognized the thing which was being loaded into the vehicle as a windscreen. When the 2nd appellant was C further questioned he said that the windscreen belonged to the 1st appellant PC Edwin and that he was helping him to sell and would share the proceeds. As the conversation went on, the 1st appellant went nearer the scene and asked why he was being mentioned. The matter was reported to the police and the screen was also taken to the police. On the following morning, it was discovered that the screen had been removed from an Isuzu vehicle D belonging to UMITA vehicle which had been entrusted to F.F.U. at Songea and which was parked in the F.F.U. compound. There was evidence which conclusively established that the windscreen had been removed from the Isuzu vehicle parked at F.F.U.

1st appellant - Edwin denied the offence. He told the court that on the day in question and at the material time he E had gone to buy soap in a shop across the road. On his way back he saw a parked vehicle and near it he saw PW1 and PW2. As he saw nothing to warrant his stay he went home. On the following morning he was called to make a statement in connection with the windscreen. As the 1st appellant made unsworn statement, the F prosecution could not examine him. The trial magistrate however conducted an extensive cross-examination. I shall refer to this aspect of evidence later in my judgment.

The 2nd appellant, PC General, made an unsworn statement in which he stated that on the material date, he G found 1st appellant together with the driver of the motor vehicle, PW5 Hassan Omari, talking. As he (2nd appellant) was passing he was requested by 1st appellant to help to load something into the lorry. One of the items loaded was a windscreen. As they were loading PW1 and PW2 went nearer the vehicle. The 1st H appellant ran away. PW1 and PW2 then asked the 2nd appellant about the windscreen which he said he had just helped to load it. The 2nd appellant said that he was then ordered to take the windscreen to the police. The 1st appellant later appeared but he was uncooperative. The 2nd appellant stated that he was threatened by the I 1st appellant because he had mentioned him. As the 1st appellant threatened to kill the 2nd appellant, he went to sleep at the Quarter Guard. On this aspect, 2nd appellant's statement is supported by the evidence of DW3 A.5967 Sgt. Alfred Banda who told the Court that A the 2nd appellant went to complain to him that 1st appellant had threatened to kill him because he had mentioned him in connection with the theft of windscreen. DW.3 gave a bed to 2nd appellant who slept at the place till B morning. There is also the evidence of DW.2 - Mwinyijuma Ramadhani. This DW2 told the court that he had been at the 2nd appellant house till about 7.00 p.m. when he left with 2nd appellant for the purposes of going for a drink. On the way they saw a bedford vehicle parked. The 1st appellant called the 2nd appellant to the place C where the vehicle was parked. DW 2 went on his way and he never saw 2nd appellant again that night. Lastly I wish to refer to the evidence of PW5 Hassan Omari. This PW5 was the driver of the vehicle in question. PW5 told the Court that when he reached near F.F.U. his vehicle heated up and required some water. He D reversed with the intention of going back to the town, but before he left, 2nd appellant approached him with a request to help him carry a windscreen as he had waited for transport without success. PW5 agreed and waited for 2nd appellant to bring the windscreen. When the windscreen was brought, two people approached the vehicle and questioned the 2nd appellant about the windscreen. PW5 left the place but he denied to have seen1st E appellant at the scene, although 1st appellant says he went to the scene.

In their memorandum of appeal, just like in their defence, each is alleging that the other is the one who stole the windscreen. The question for determination before this court as was in the lower court is whether the appellants F are jointly guilty as charged or not. As for the 2nd appellant, he was caught loading the windscreen into the lorry. There is evidence of PW1 and PW2 whose testimony was believed by the trial court to the effect that 2nd appellant told them he was selling the windscreen on behalf of 1st appellant and they would share the proceeds. G If the 2nd appellant was given the windscreen by the 1st appellant as he claimed, both of them being mechanics, the 2nd appellant should have known that the 1st appellant could not own such an article. The 2nd appellant should have suspected the 1st appellant particularly that the article was being loaded at night time. PW1 and PW2 did not see any other load which was loaded into the vehicle as alleged by the 2nd appellant. I H do not accept that the 2nd appellant could just be ordered by 1st appellant to carry the windscreen at the time, when they just met accidentally as alleged by the 2nd appellant. The 2nd appellant carried the windscreen as he had an interest in the matter. As for the 1st appellant, immediately after the 2nd appellant was confronted by the I PW1 and PW2 he was mentioned to be connected with the windscreen. PW1 and PW2 had told the court that when the vehicle of PW5 parked, the 1st appellant approached the driver and asked him "Vipi?" The driver PW5 denied to have met the 1st appellant at the scene that night and A obviously to have talked to him. But the 1st appellant in his memorandum of appeal, admits to have asked PW5 "Vipi?" To quote the appellant's ground No. 3 he says:

> 3. That: The evidence of PW1 No. B.3261 Cpl. Maurus is poor evidence in this case. Because he heard a word which B was sometimes wants to help a person especially when you put mind that it was night time then, I was a policeman. I was supposed to ask the owner of the alleged vehicle the word "Vipi?" which means what was "wrong". The driver of the alleged vehicle replied that "there was nothing wrong." C

This confirms the evidence of PW1 and PW2 and discredits his own testimony in the trial court. It also confirms that PW5 Hassan Omari was telling lies when he said he never saw the 1st appellant at the scene. Of course the D utterance of vipi to PW5 is capable of innocent interpretation as he wants to make this court believe. However what followed immediately after such utterance and the inconsistencies that have emerged, leaves one with no doubt that the statement was made with an understanding. Otherwise if it was not so why should PW5 E reply that there was nothing wrong when he infact said in his evidence that he had stopped because his vehicle had heated up. Again 1st appellant said that he returned at the scene and found fellow policemen but left for home. He mentioned nothing with regard to windscreen. There was further evidence that 2nd appellant went to F spend a night at Quarter Guard because of threats from 1st appellant because he had been named to have been connected with the theft of windscreen. Why all this dramatic reaction to the extent of threatening to commit murder? There can be no doubts that the 1st appellant was displeased for being disclosed that he was a party to the theft. G

Earlier on in this judgment I stated that I would refer to the evidence of the appellants which was extracted from them by the trial magistrate in his extensive cross-examination after the appellants had made unsworn statements H from the dock. Under the circumstances the prosecution could not cross-examine the appellants on what they said but the learned trial magistrate conducted an extensive cross-examination on both appellants and extracted some evidence and forced them to produce statements which they had made to the police. The learned trial magistrate made use of the extracted evidence and documents in arriving at the decision in this appeal. The trial I magistrate's conduct went far beyond accepted limits provided by law. As the appellants were not represented by an advocate,

MUSHI J

I requested the State Attorney to address me on the issue which I must say, new as he is, Mr. Kaduri has A commendably done the work. The law and practice on this issue is in my opinion quite settled. Section 206 of Criminal Procedure Code is all too familiar to many of us. Sub-section - (1) states as follows and I quote: B

206 - (1) At the close of the evidence in support of the charge, if it appears to the court that a case is made out against the accused person sufficient to require him to make a defence either in relation to the offence with which he is charged or in C relation to any other offence of which, under the provisions of section 181 to 189 (inclusive) of this Code, he is liable to be convicted, the court shall again explain the substance of the charge to the accused and shall inform him that he has the right to give evidence on oath from the witness box and that, if he does so, he will be liable to cross-examination, or to D make statement not on oath from the dock, and shall ask him whether he has any witnesses to examine or other evidence to adduce in his defence, and the court shall then hear the accused and his witnesses and other evidence if any.

The most relevant portion for this appeal in the above quoted section is of course this: E

...and shall inform him that he has the right to give evidence on oath from the witness box and that, if he does so, he will F be liable to cross-examination, or to make a statement not on oath from the dock,...

Reading the section as it is, it does not appear to me to present any linguistic ambiguity of any kind. In its plain G English language meaning, it means that an accused has a choice either to give evidence from the witness box on oath or to make a statement from the dock without oath. If the accused gives evidence from the witness box on oath, he shall be liable to cross-examination. On the other hand, if the accused makes a statement without oath it H clearly means he shall not be liable to cross-examination and in my considered view, it is not only cross-examination by the prosecution but also by the court and assessors as well. This does not mean that the trial magistrate can write any unintelligible or meaningless statements from accused simply because the statement is not made on oath; the trial magistrate may seek clarification on the statement to make it understood. Seeking I clarification is not cross-examination. The effect and extent of putting questions to an accused who gives an unsworn statement has been discussed in many cases. The earliest case in which it was discussed was R. v Pirmin A Kunjanga (1935) 2. E.A. C.A.64. In that case, the appellant was charged with murder. The appellant had made a statement in the lower court but that statement was not put in at the trial. The trial magistrate however interrogated that accused on the statement. On appeal the appellate court held: B

MUSHI J

No question should be asked of an accused person who has not given evidence on oath unless for the purposes of explaining or clarifying something obscure or ambiguous in his unsworn statement. A discrepancy between two statements is not of itself obscure or ambiguous. C

Twenty five years later, the same court of Appeal for East Africa, as it then existed reiterated the finding in R. v Primin Kunjanga and went a little further by stating the consequence if the questioning caused prejudice to the D accused. This was in the case of Maina Notho v R. [1960] E.A. 453. In that case, the appellant made unsworn statement from the dock but the trial judge put some questions to him. The court discussing R. v Pirmin Kunjanga had this to say: E

With respect we entirely agree with the limitations there indicated which ought to be observed by a trial Judge in asking questions of a prisoner who has elected to make an unsworn statement. If, however, a trial Judge does exceed the limits F there indicated, the matter, in our view, amounts at most to no more than an irregularity which is curable under s.381 of the Criminal Procedure Code unless it "has in fact occasioned a failure of justice."

This was a Kenya case but the provision is similar to our section 206 of Criminal Procedure Code. Back home, G in recent years, this court guided by the decision of the Superior Court as sufficiently shown above, has made similar comments regarding the questioning of an accused who makes an unsworn statement. In the case of Leonard s/o Kaseko v R. [1968] H.C.D. 45 the appellant after making an unsworn statement was questioned H by the magistrate and cross-examined by the prosecution. The Honourable Mr. Justice Cross, as he then was, held:

(1) An Accused who makes an unsworn statement may be asked questions by the Court in order to clarify any of the I statements made by him. It is quite improper for him to be cross-examined by the prosecution.

MUSHI J

(2) In the circumstances of this, case, the error in permitting cross-examination did not prejudice accused, and it is A curable under section 346 of Criminal Procedure Code.

To sum it up, the position is, and if I may be excused to use the apt words of Jonathan, Ag. J. as then was, in the B case of Samson Ndegeleki v R. [1972] H.C.D. 197 in which he said:

.... The court then seems to have gone completely out of its way and cross-examined the appellant. The learned resident C magistrate must have overlooked the provisions of S.206 which make it clear that, in the event of an accused person making an unsworn statement he is not liable to cross-examination. That means he is not liable to cross-examination by the prosecution and the court (including assessors) alike. Though occasions rarely arise, or course, there is nothing D improper for a court to put in a brief question to an accused person when making his statement, if to do so would give sense to what is otherwise incomprehensible, which indulgence, in my view, is desirable and certainly in the interests of E the accused and justice in that it affords him assistance to communicate reasonably intelligibly. Here this was not the case, for the court asked questions which were not calculated merely to clarify what was otherwise unintelligible. Though the procedure adopted here was unlawful, I am satisfied that it did not cause a failure of justice and is a curable irregularity. ... F

Turning to the appeal before me, the position is very different from the cases I have discussed above. Both appellants gave unsworn statement but after that the learned trial magistrate not only did he put questions to the G appellants, but carried out extensive cross-examination and made them produce statement made at the police. To complete the picture I think it appropriate to quote extensively the relevant portions of the evidence from the proceedings. I start with P.C. Edwin who was the 1st accused at the trial. After this appellant had made his unsworn statement, the court cross-examined him as follows: H

XXD by the court: (Using statement of the accused on getting it at request from P.P.) If I am shown my statement I can identify it. The recording officer is Sgt. Louo. The statement was read over to me by the recording officer. I signed the statement to show that what was recorded was correct as I had said it. I did not know I that the statement would be used in evidence. (Shown statement and he admits to have made it). A

I tender my statement as exhibit X. I did not know the 3 others out of the 5 that I suspected. I identified the vehicle as that of SISI KWA SISI. I uttered the words JE, SISI KWA SISI VIPI? to PW5. The denial by PW5 that I ever talked to him is lies. It B is true that PW1 heard by discussion with PW5. I don't know the reason why PW5 had denied ever talking to me. I found the vehicle facing Tunduru direction but it was later found to be facing the town. I was telling lies when I said that after identifying PW1 and PW2 I left and then went to bed. It is true that the 2nd accused named me in connection with C theft. I was carrying out investigations about my co-accused so that he could be arrested. I had grudge with my co-accused and our bosses know about.

My witness will come to tell the court that when co-accused was being arrested I was not there. D

And similarly with P.C. General:

XXD by the Court: I remember to have made my statement at the police station. I can identify my statement. I request to E tender my statement Exh. Y. Before we made our statement we were threatened with being put in the lock up. This is a case resulting from being threatened and implication. I know that the police force is where so as to be protective and fair F to the people and properties (court reads from words "hapo nilimwacha ...(to)... ilikuwa mali gani". Those words are not mine. There are those of of the R/O Sgt. Anatoli. I did not mention the load tied in sacks due to duress and threat (court reads "Baada ya kukiteremsha... (to.... kumpelekea mjini"). Those are words which I made to the recording officer. G Exh. A might be government property. I will call 2 witnesses. The first one was together with me on the day of incident. He was together with me on that day. The second witness is Willy. He is just like the first one, Cpl. Banda who was H guard commander on that day. He is going to tell the court about how 1st accused threatened me such that I decided to go and sleep at the quarter guard.

In his judgment the learned trial magistrate made use of the evidence extracted by cross-examination and to I illustrate my statement, on page 3 of the judgment the learned trial magistrate wrote:

I had opportunity to cross-examine the first accused. His statement to the police has been produced by the first accused A and it is marked Exh. X. The first accused has admitted talking to PW5 the words "JE, SISI KWA SISI VIPI? and that the denial by PW5 that they never met and talked on the day of incident are lies. The first accused generally admits the B contents of Exh. X as those he made to the police.

Again at page 4 it is written:

In brief the totality of the defence is that each of the accused person has done his best, not only from his statement Exh. X C and Y but also in their defence, to shift blame from himself by implicating his co-accused.

And further down on the same page 4 the judgment stated: D

I have noticed that in the statements made to the police Exhs. X and Y that the accused persons have departed from them E in their defence. That is not without reasons except for the second accused because they were caught on the spot. There has not been advanced any reason by the 1st accused as to why he remained near the tea huts until he got arrested.

I have carefully considered the effect of questions put to the appellants and cross-examination thereto. I am of F the settled view that such conduct went far beyond the permitted limits; and having regard to the fact that the learned trial magistrate partly relied on the evidence extracted under the above circumstances in the assessment of the evidence and partly relied on it in arriving at the decision in this case, I am further satisfied that such G conduct prejudiced the appellant's trial and would have occasioned a failure of justice except for the fact that such evidence was not necessary for the determination of this case. There was sufficient other evidence on which conviction could have been based.

This court being the first appellate court, is duty bound to re-evaluate the evidence which was before the trial H court and draw its own inferences and conclusions, where the circumstances demand as in this case, as would have been done by the trial court had it properly directed its mind to the evidence. For this proposition of law I I am guided by the decision in Dinkerrai Ramksishan Pandya v R. [1957] E.A. 336. This was a decision of the former Court of appeal for East Africa which is still sound. The same principle has been restated recently by Tanzania Court J

MUSHI J
of Appeal in the case of Martha Michael Wejja v Hon. the Attorney General and Three Others, which is A Court of Appeal Civil Case No. 3 of 1982 (unreported) in which it quoted with approval the same principle in the case of Yuill v Yuill [1945] 1 ALL. E.R. 183. Clearly in this case the learned trial magistrate opted a wrong approach in evaluating the evidence. As abundantly demonstrated above, I have carefully carried out the duty of B this court and have scrutinised, analysed and evaluated the evidence before the trial court completely excluding and ignoring the evidence obtained by trial magistrate on cross-examination on the appellant and come to the conclusion that the rest of the evidence as there was in this case left no doubts whatsoever as to the guilt of the C appellants. The appeals against convictions are thus dismissed.
The appellants were sentenced to five years' imprisonment because the property stolen was said to be worth over Shs.5,000/=. Under the Minimum Sentences Act, the value of the property stolen affects the sentence. It is D therefore important for the court to judiciously determine the value of property in issue. Where exact value can be established this should be done. Where only approximate value is given the basis of such approximation must be given. In this case it is stated in the charge sheet that the windscreen was worth Shs.5,000/=. One witness E during the trial stated that the value was between Shs.5,000/= and 6,000/= but the record is silent as regards the basis of the witness's opinion of the value of the windscreen. The court accepted such assessment without analysis and scrutiny. A windscreen of an Isuzu, as was in this case, is an item whose exact price can be established without difficulty and the courts should not allow prosecution laxity to the detriment of an accused. F Even, then, in this case, the estimated value is on the border line and under such circumstances, the appellants should have been given the benefit of the doubt to the effect that the value could infact be less than Shs.5,000/=. G The sentence of five years is reduced to that of three years.
Order accordingly.

Family Law - Custody of children - Child born out of a void marriage - Whether the mother of the child has an absolute right to custody.
Family Law - Custody of children - Child expresses wishes with whom she wants to live - Whether such wishes to be given weight. C Family Law - Maintenance - Assessment of - Factors to be taken into consideration.
Family Law - Custody of children - Factors to be taken into account before giving custody of a child to a party.
-Headnote
Marriage between the appellant and the respondent was declared null and void because the respondent was D incompetent to marry under the provisions of section 38 (c) and (e) of the Law of Marriage Act, 1971. When the marriage was annulled the appellant was five months pregnant. She then gave birth to a baby girl. When the E child was two years old the respondent instituted proceedings for the custody of the child. The Primary Court awarded him custody of the child. On appeal by the appellant to the District Court the decision of the Primary Court was overruled. Custody was given to the appellant until the child reached the age of seven years. The F court ordered the respondent to pay Shs.50/= a month towards the maintenance of the child.
When the child reached the age of seven years the respondent sought to be given custody of the child. The case was before a Primary Court which heard both the parties and also heard the child who expressed that she wished G to live with the appellant. Custody of the child was given to the respondent. The appellant's appeal to the District Court was not entertained.
She appealed to the High Court challenging the award of custody of the child to the respondent. She also attacked the maintenance award as being too low. H
Held: (i) The mother's entitlement to custody of a child born out of a void marriage is not absolute; it is conditional upon the absence of agreement between the parties or court order vesting custody to another person;

(ii) the wishes of a child of tender age should not be permitted to subvert the whole law of the family or I to prevail against the desire and authority of a parent unless the welfare of the child cannot otherwise be secured; A

(iii) under the circumstances of this case it was not in the best interest of the child to have given custody to the respondent which would have adversely affected her educationally and psychologically; B

(iv) in deciding what amount of maintenance should be paid the court should hold an enquiry as to the means of both parents in order to arrive at a just decision; where applicable the court should take into account the customs of the parties and the conditions prevailing at any particular time. C

F. Mbuya, for the appellant

Komba, for the respondent E

Judgment

Kazimoto, J.: The appellant is appealing against the decision of the Courts below which granted custody of a child born out of the void marriage to the respondent. This appeal has a chequered history and I will explain. In 1974 the appellant and respondent were married and on 31st December, 1974 their F marriage was declared null and void. At that time the appellant was five months pregnant. She gave birth to a baby girl in 1975. These proceedings concern this child. In 1977 the respondent instituted proceedings for the custody of the child. This was in Kimamba Primary Court Civil Case No. 13 of 1977. The Primary Court G awarded custody of the child to the respondent. The appellant appealed to Kilosa District Court in Civil Appeal No. 9 of 1977. The appeal was allowed and the child was placed in her custody until she reaches the age of seven years and at the same time the District Court made an order that the respondent should pay Sh.50/= per month towards maintenance of the child. The judgment of the District Court was delivered on 20th October, H 1977. On the following day, that is on 21st October, 1977 the same magistrate made the following order which read as follows:

Order: In this case, upon considering the circumstances of the case and under the Law of Marriage Act 1971 I find that I the issues in this case are matrimonial matter in that to be decided under the Law of Marriage Act. If that is so the appeal to A this Court should not have been entertained as per Section 80 of the Marriage Act 1971, wherefore this appeal should have been lodged straight to the High Court. This appeal thus as I say was wrongly entertained and determined in this B Court and I hereby DECLARE THE APPEAL JUDGMENT TO THIS CASE AS TOTALLY A NULLITY. The records are to be prepared and forwarded to the High Court meanwhile the parties should be informed of this Musing. (sic). C

KAZIMOTO J

There is nothing on record to suggest that the file was forwarded to the High Court. Nor is there evidence to show that the parties were informed. Be that as it may no further steps were taken by either party until in 1984 D when the respondent decided to execute the decree in Civil Appeal No.9 of 1977 before Kimamba Primary Court. The Primary Court Magistrate heard both the appellant and the respondent. The Primary Court Magistrate also heard the child in question and enforced the decree by awarding custody to the Respondent. It ordered the respondent to pay arrears amounting to Shs.5,200/= to appellant as maintenance. The appellant was E dissatisfied and she appealed to the District Court at Kilosa in Civil Appeal No. 18 of 1984. The district Court struck off the appeal from the register. The appellant is appealing against that decision on six grounds as follows:

(1) The learned District Magistrate had no jurisdiction to strike out the appeal. F

(2) The learned Magistrate erred in law in holding that the respondent as father of a child born out of void marriage is entitled to the custody of a child born out of such void marriage. G

(3) The learned Magistrate erred in failing to consider the welfare of the child in awarding custody of the child to the respondent.

(4) The learned magistrate erred in failing to consider the rise in the cost of living in assessing the amount of maintenance to which the child was entitled. H

(5) The learned magistrate erred in failing to take into account the fact that the child had clearly stated she would like to live with the appellant and not with the respondent.

(6) The learned magistrate failed to take into consideration the fact that the child never knew her father and has never lived with her father since she was born in 1975. I

KAZIMOTO J

On the first ground of appeal Mr. F.S. Mbuya learned counsel for the appellant has argued that the District A Magistrate has no jurisdiction under the Magistrates' Courts Act 1963 Cap 637 and Magistrates' Courts Act. No. 9 of 1984 to strike out the appeal. He submits that the learned District Magistrate was wrong in striking out B the appeal. As regards the second ground of appeal, the learned counsel has submitted that the respondent is not entitled to custody of a child born out of void marriage and referred the court to the Local Customary Law Declaration Order GN. 279 and Section 128 of the Law of Marriage Act, 1971 where it is stated that a mother of child born out of a void marriage is entitled to the custody of the child born out of such void marriage. He C further argued that from the proceedings it is clear that the child has always been in the custody of the appellant who has provided for her maintenance, that the child has never lived with the respondent and she even does not know him. It is submitted by learned counsel that the magistrate, erred in not considering the welfare of the child D when it ordered that the respondent should have custody of the child. Mr. Mbuya further submits in support of ground four that the magistrate did not take into account, when he ordered maintenance of Shs.50/= per month, the rise in the standard of living and the rate of inflation. He submits that Shs.50/= per month was clearly E inadequate. He referred the court to the case of Abdallah Salum v Ramadhani Shemdoe [1968] HCD No.129 in support of his submission. In further support of his argument on the point he referred to the Affiliation Act which fixes the rate of maintenance at Shs.100/=. On the fifth ground Mr. Mbuya learned counsel argues that the child has expressed her wishes to live with the appellant. He submits that the court should not have F disregarded the views of the child. As regards the last ground Mr. Mbuya has submitted that it has been covered by the previous grounds and prays that the appeal be allowed, the judgment and decree of lower court be set aside and the appellant be awarded maintenance at the rate of Shs.600 per month for the last ten years including G educational costs and that the respondent be condemned to pay costs of this appeal. On the other hand Mr. Komba learned counsel for the respondent has strongly submitted that on record there was no judgment on 4th October, 1984 from which this appeal could arise. On ground one of appeal Mr. Komba has submitted that the H district magistrate was right in striking out the purported appeal as the appellant was also the appellant in Civil Appeal No. 9 of 1977 which was allowed in her favour. If she was dissatisfied, argues Mr. Komba, she should have appealed against the decision. She did not do so and Mr. Komba submits that the matter is res judicata I and she cannot appeal. Regarding ground two Mr. Komba has submitted that the appellant was married to the respondent and a certificate of marriage was issued. He further told the court that according to the certificate of divorce dated 31st A December, 1974 the appellant was five months pregnant and that the appellant does not dispute that the respondent is the father of the child. He submits that as the child is above seven years he is, in law, entitled to the B custody of the child. Regarding the welfare of the child Mr. Komba has submitted that the magistrate considered that fact that the respondent is better placed to take care of the child as he is a rich man and that at present the child is living with the respondent and that the appellant is married to an unemployed man with three C children. Mr. Komba further submitted in reply to ground four of appeal that the cost of living in 1977 was lower than in 1986 and that if appellant was not satisfied with the order of maintenance she should have appealed against it. As regards ground five and six of appeal Mr. Komba has submitted that the allegations are not true. He argues that the child knows the respondent, that she is living with him and he is paying for her education and D maintenance. He therefore prays that the appeal be dismissed with costs, that the decision of the lower court be upheld.

In a brief reply Mr. Mbuya has submitted that the problem in this appeal stems from Civil Appeal No. 9 of 1977 which was declared a nullity by the same magistrate and that therefore the Primary Court cannot implement a E judgment which is a nullity. As regards custody Mr. Mbuya has submitted that under Section 133 of the Law of Marriage Act 1971 the Court has power to vary or rescind any order of custody or maintenance of an infant on the application of any interested party. He submits that the appellant is requesting the court to invoke Section F 133 of the said Act. Regarding the welfare of the child Mr. Mbuya invites the court to consider the provisions of section 125(2) of the Law of Marriage Act, 1971. The appellant has sent the child to a boarding school. I am prepared to assume that this has been done with the blessing of the appellant's husband. The respondent is, G according to the record, married to two wives. There is further evidence that the respondent did not make the payment of Shs.50/= maintenance costs ordered by the court. The Court has been told that the respondent is a rich man. These are some of the factors which should be taken into consideration in this case.

As regards Mr. Mbuya's complaints that the court did not give effect to the wishes of the child I am of the H considered view that the court is entitled to disregard her wishes. She was about nine years old and I am not persuaded that a child of that age is capable of forming an independent opinion. Secondly, and as already noted above she has lived with the appellant ever since she was born and as further stated she did not know the I respondent. It was therefore expected of her and I think natural that she should have preferred to live with the appellant whom she knows rather than with respondent a stranger to her. Regarding wishes of children in custody A proceedings Fitzgibbon L.J. stated in Re O'Hara (1900) 2 IR 2323 at page 240 as follows:

... The wishes of a child of tender age must not be permitted .... to subvert the whole law of the family or to prevail against B the desire and authority of the parent, unless the welfare of the child cannot otherwise be secured.

The child being nine years old cannot form an independent opinion and the court was entitled to disregard her C wishes. But I think as I have tried to illustrate above the magistrate did no consider the welfare of the child when it awarded custody to the respondent. The child has been in a boarding school. The respondent did not maintain the child since she was born despite the court order to pay monthly maintenance since 1977. He paid the lump D sum when he was given custody of the child in June, 1984. Appellant's husband appears to have regarded the child as his and with his support has the child been educated in a boarding school. I think that under the circumstances it was not in the best interest to have given custody to the respondent which would have adversely E affected her educationally and psychologically. That ground succeeds. This also disposes of ground 2 of appeal.

I now come to ground four of appeal. It concerns the amount of maintenance. Mr. Mbuya has strongly attacked the award of Shs.50/= per month as maintenance as being inadequate. Mr. Komba has countered by submitting F that if she was dissatisfied she should have appealed. I agree with Mr. Komba that the appellant should have appealed if she were dissatisfied but in view of the manner the district magistrate handled the case I hesitate to attribute the blame to the appellant. I will deal with that aspect shortly in the following grounds of appeal. In deciding what amount of maintenance should be paid the court should hold an enquiry as to the means of both G parents in order to arrive at a just decision. The court should, where applicable, take into account the customs of the parties and the condition prevailing at any particular time. In Abdallah Salim v Ramadhani Shemdoe. [1967] HCD 55 where Georges C.J. (as he then was) was confronted with the issue of "Mtonga" i.e. one cow,(as he then was) was confronted with the issue of "Mtonga" i.e. one cow, as the traditional reward of H maintaining a child of another he had to overrule the decision on the ground that it was not enough at the present (that was in 1967) to bring up a child and educated him for the value of a cow (which was by then costing Shs.50/=). That decision was followed by Said J. (as he then was) in Juma Kisuda v Hema Mjie [1967] I HCD.188. In both cases the maintenance was increased. In increasing the amount of maintenance the court took into account the "village life" in both Lushoto and Singida Districts and assessed A maintenance at Shs.100/= per month. The proceedings in the present appeal were instituted in 1977. It can be said that village life in Kilosa District in 1967 is the same as in most Districts, in this country. If that is accepted B then Shs.50/= was clearly inadequate. But village life in 1977 could never be the same as in 1967. There have been great social and economic changes affecting the whole rural life which has been turned into semi urban life. People have moved into new village settlements. These moves have affected the standard of living. Certainly C Shs. 50/= was not enough to buy the essentials for a child. From what has transpired in this appeal the appellant is a wealthy man. Had the learned Magistrate considered these factors he would not have made the order of maintenance of Shs. 50/= per month.

On ground 2 of appeal the issue is whether the respondent as father of a child born out of void marriage is D entitled to the custody of such a child. It is not disputed that the respondent is the father of the child. It is admitted that the appellant was made pregnant by the respondent before they were divorced on the grounds that the marriage was null and void as the respondent was incompetent to marry under the provisions of Section 38(c) E and (e) of the Law of Marriage Act 1971. Mr. Mbuya submits that under Rules 178 and 181 (c) of the GN. 279 of 28th June, 1963 and under Section 128 of the Law of Marriage Act 1971 children born out of void marriage belong to the matrimonial side. Mr. Komba has submitted that as there was a valid marriage during which the child was conceived the respondent is entitled to the child. Section 128 provides: F

128. Where a marriage is a nullity or is annulled under Section 96 the mother shall, in the absence of any agreement or order of court to the contrary, be entitled to the custody of the infant child, if any, of the marriage. G

In my view the mother's entitlement to custody of such a child is conditional upon the absence of agreement between the parties or whether the court makes no order to vest custody to another person. Section 128 quoted above does not confer absolute entitlement to the appellant and the court has discretion to decide to whom the child should be placed. H

Ground number one of appeal deals with the jurisdiction of District court to strike out appeals. As stated by Mr. Mbuya and I think correctly so, powers of the District Court on appeal or revision are contained in section 16 I and 17 of Cap. 537 the law applicable when appeal was heard by District Court. These Sections did not vest on the District Court with powers to strike out an appeal. It was therefore clearly wrong for him to strike out the appeal. Mr. Komba then submitted that there was no judgment on 4th October, 1984 A from which an appeal can lie. The learned district magistrate had made an order and an order of a district court is appealable at the instance of an aggrieved party under Section 21 of Cap. 537 and now section 25 of the Magistrate's Courts Act. No. 2 of 1984. The Appeal against that order is clearly competent. B

For the reasons given above the appeal is allowed. The judgment and decree of the district court is set aside. It is ordered that the appellant should have custody of the child and respondent should pay Shs. 250/= per month as maintenance for 10 years from 1977 as her cost of maintaining the child. She is also granted costs of this C appeal and the court below.

Appeal allowed.

Judgment
Kazimoto, J: The plaintiff, Morogoro Stores (1976) Ltd. has been a client of the C defendant the National Bank of Commerce, City Drive Branch Dar es salaam since 1976. On 27th June, 1983 the plaintiff alleges, and the defendant denies, that he deposited the sum of Shs. 31,200/= in his account with the D defendant. As the defendant has denied having received the money the plaintiff now sues the defendant to recover the said sum of Shs.31,200/= plus interest and costs.
At the hearing five issues were agreed and framed and in my view the case depends on issue one which if established the rest will automatically follow. The issues are: E

(a) Did the plaintiff pay in his bank account Shs.31,200/= as shown in Exh. A to the Plaint?

(b) Did the defendant fail to credit the plaintiff's account with the said sum? F

(c) Has the defendant wrongfully converted the said money to his own use and wrongfully deprived the plaintiff the use thereof?

(e) What reliefs are the parties entitled to?

Zainabu Noordin (PW.1) testified for the plaintiff. He is the General Manager of the company. He told the court G that his company has been operating an account with the defendant since 1/7/1976 and that one Shaban Mohamed was depositing the money on behalf of the company. He stated that the said Shaban Mohamed had been working for the plaintiff for about five years and that he (PW.1) had always given Shaban Mohamed cash H to bank and that he would return with pay-in-slip to him. He told the court that on 27/6/83 he gave Shs.31,200/= to Shaban Mohamed to bank and he banked the money and then returned with pay-in-slip which I bore the defendant's bank rubber stamp. He told the court that when he checked his bank statement on 19/7/83 he found that the money was not credited in his account. He said later Shaban Mohamed was arrested, and charged with theft by servant but was acquitted. He stated that he trusted Shaban Mohamed, that he has never failed to deposit cash in his account A and that when he saw the pay-in-slip he understood that the money was banked. When cross-examined by Mr. Rutagatina learned defence counsel for the defendant PW.1 stated that he would not know if the bank stamp was B real or fake. He denied having known code number of the defendant's bank. He stated that the defendant bank has no code number and that all that he knows is that there is a teller's number. He further stated that he would not know if the money was deposited with the defendant or Shabani Mohamed had stolen it. When re-examined he denied that he was given specimen stamps and that there is no way of ascertaining the teller's C stamp.

Roman Peter Ndanzi (DW.1) an accountant with defendant informed the court that he has been working with defendant since 1979 and that he knows the plaintiff as one of their clients. He told the court when a customer banks money he fills a pay-in-slip and presents it to the teller. The slip bears the bank's stamp, the initials of the D teller, the teller's number and the code number of the bank. He denied that on 27th June, 1983 the plaintiff deposited cash with the defendant. He told the court that the defendant's Code number is no.2 and that annexure E A has only teller's numbers and it does not have the defendant's code. He has produced a copy of pay-in-slip Exh. D1 which he alleges to be authentic, and that annexure A to the plaint is a fake pay-in-slip. When cross-examined by Mr. Kesaria the learned counsel for the plaintiff DW.1 admitted that there is no warning to warn customers. He admitted that annexure A has initials of the teller. He denied that the money was deposited. F He further stated that he would not have credited the money without pay-in-slip. He admitted that if the money is deposited interest would have been paid.

As indicated earlier on the case hinges on issue number one. If the hinges don't withstand the weight they collapse. DW.1 denies that the money alleged to have been deposited vide Annexure A was infact deposited as G it lacked the features peculiar to the defendant's bank stamp. I have carefully examined annexure A and compared it with Exh. D1. Exh. D1 is in respect of a deposit which the plaintiff made. Whereas Exhibit D1 shows that the money was received by teller 2, annexure A to the plaint does not show clearly the teller's H number. Again in Exhibit D1 there are the following words "City Drive Br.2, D'Salaam (I have omitted the words National Bank of Commerce). In Annexure A to the plaint there appears the following words, as is relevant "City Drive Branch". It should be noted that in Exhibit D1 the word "Branch" is abbreviated followed I immediately with the Figure "2" and then followed by the word "D'Salaam". It should also be noted that in annexure A to the plaint the word "Branch" is written in full, figure "2" is missing and the word "D'Salaam" is written in full and appears below A the words "City Drive Branch". Exhibit D1 shows two deposits made by the plaintiff on 28/6/1983. Even to the unaccustomed but scrupulous observer he would not have failed to notice the naked difference between B annexure A to the plaint and Exhibit D1. Having pointed out these vital and basic differences between the two documents tendered in evidence I am left in no doubt in my mind that annexure A to the plaint is not an authentic document and the money allegedly deposited with the defendant was not in fact deposited. Mr. Kesaria learned C advocate referred me to two English cases Lewes Sanitary Steam Laundry Company (Ltd) v Barclay and Company (Ltd) [1906] TLR page 737 and The Kepitigalla Ruber Estates, Limited v The National Bank of India, Limited (1909) 2 KB 1010. Both these cases deal with the defence of estoppel by negligence. In the D Lewes Sanitary Steam case the directors of the company appointed the son of the Chairman as secretary of the company and allowed the secretary to have the custody of the company's cheque book and bank pass-book. In order to draw a cheque the signature of the secretary and a director were required. The secretary forged the E signature of a director to a number of cheques purporting to be drawn on behalf of the company, and obtained payment from the company's bankers. On an action brought against the defendant to recover the amount the defendants raised the defence of negligence by estoppel. Kennedy J., held, after quoting a number of authorities F that:

> But in order to relieve the banker from the consequence of paying money upon a forged cheque, it is not enough for the banker to show that the conduct of his customer, wilful, careless or wasteful or all, enabled the fraud to be committed. He G must show that the customer caused him to pay the money upon the forged cheque. It is not enough to show that the customer gave occasion for his so paying .... The carelessness of the customer or neglect of the customer to take precautions unconnected with the act itself, cannot be put forward by the banker as justifying his own default.

The facts in Kepitigalla's case above quoted are exactly the same as the Lewes Sanitary Steam case. But I H tend to think that the principles in these two cases cannot be applied to the facts in the present case. Whereas in these cases the servants of the plaintiff companies forged cheques which enable the defendant companies to pay I funds out of the plaintiffs accounts, in the present case it was established that the defendant never received and therefore never paid any money out of the plaintiff's account. I think the defendant would be liable if it were established that Annexure A to the plaint were authentic A and the defendants servants did not enter the amount in the plaintiff's account. I gather from cross-examination by Mr. Kesaria that as the pay-in-slip is prepared and issued by the defendant, that once a customer has filled in the pay-in-slip which is stamped by the defendant's stamp, that as there is no warning to warn customers of fake B stamps, then the defendant should be held liable. Yes the defendants will be held liable if the pay-in-slip contains the defendants bank rubber stamp. But in this case Annexure A does not have, as demonstrated above, the defendant's rubber stamp or even a semblance of such stamp. I am not persuaded to hold the mere fact that C there is no warning about fake stamps should render the defendant liable.

For these reasons, having found that plaintiff did not pay in his bank account the sum of Shs.31,200/= as shown in Exhibit A to the plaint, I am satisfied that the plaintiff's case fails as the defendant would not have done what is D alleged in issues (b) and (c) nor is the plaintiff entitled to any interest claimed in issue (d). Consequently I dismiss the plaintiff's claim with costs.

show up. However, a son of the deceased's brother applied in a Primary Court for and was granted letters of A administration of the estate of the deceased. He also claimed the right to inherit the house of the deceased. The Primary Court decided that he was entitled to inherit the estate of the deceased as heir under Islamic Law. The B Court, however, required him to cash down 23,330/= to the mosque in terms of the "Wakf", being 1/3 of the value of the house. The appellant appealed against the court's order that the appellant should pay Shs.23,330/= to the mosque before he could inherit the house.

Held: (i) The appellant has the right to inherit the house and the dedication of the house to the mosque in the C "Wakf" is rendered non-effective thenceforth by the reason of the act of the appellant inheriting the house;

(ii) the requirement to pay 1/3 of the value of the house to the mosque would arise only if the deceased D had set up an unconditional "Wakf" dedicating the house to the mosque permanently after his death without the clause that the house should pass to the heir when that heir was available.

Judgment

Ruhumbika, J.: This is a second appeal. The appeal involves the Islamic law of inheritance F for Moslems of Sunni Section.

The appellant, Hassan Matolla, applied to the Primary Court of Kinondoni in Mirathi Civil Case No. 5 of 1981 to be appointed the administrator of the estate of the late Selemani Matolla, who died intestate. The deceased G left behind a house on Plot No. 10, Mwanamsali, Kinondoni District. The appellant also claimed before the same court to be the rightful heir of the estate of the said deceased person.

The application was objected to by the Kadhi of Mwinyimkuu Mosque, in that the deceased had dedicted that house in a "Wakf" deed to the mosque. H

An appropriation by way of a "Wakf" may be either by act inter vivos, or by will. But if it is made by will or death-bed gift it is subject to the same restriction as bequest in favour of an individual, namely that it cannot I operate upon more than one-third of the next assets, unless the heirs consent. That is the general jurisprudential point of view regarding "Wakf" document which becomes effective at the death of the testator.

RUHUMBIKA J

In considering the application of the appellant, the Primary Court had to have a full hearing of the objection. The A objector called several witnesses to testify. The Khadhi himself (Jaffar Abubakari) testified before the Primary Court. He told the Court how the deceased established the "Wakf" dedicating his house to the mosque for religious reasons, as he had no child of his own living in this country. The deceased set up the "Wakf" before B some kind of a conciliation committee of the CCM Branch of Mzimuni, Kinondoni District. This was on 26th December, 1979. The execution of the "Wakf" was attested by three members of that committee, the chairman C of the committee, the secretary and a committee member. The document had to be executed in the presence of those witnesses as he could not write. In addition to that, three members from the mosque authority signed the "Wakf" to signify that they had agreed to the terms set out in that "Wakf". The deceased was illiterate and for that reason he could not sign the "Wakf". D

The evidence of all those who testified before the Primary Court for the objector proved that it was the intention of the deceased to dedicate the house in that "Wakf" to the mosque in question, as he had no child of his own living in Tanzania. However, it was a condition set out in that "Wakf" that should the deceased person's sole E child, a daughter, come from Zambia, then the house should devolve to her as the heir. This daughter, Mariam Matolla, born in 1928 at Dar es Salaam lived all the time in Limber Zambia. In order that this daughter could identify as such she had to produce a photograph taken together with a cow whose milk was used to feed her during her infancy as her mother died when she was an infant. F

The turn of events is that after the death of Selemani Matolla, the daughter did not turn up. This then gave the opportunity to the appellant to go to the Primary Court to seek an appointment as an administrator of the estate of the deceased and also to claim the right of inheritance as an heir, as he is the son of the brother of the G deceased. The appellant claimed to have nursed the deceased until his death on the 1st of January, 1981, and to have handled all the Islamic funeral rites. The Primary Court accepted the evidence adduced for the appellant as the son of the deceased's brother, and therefore entitled to inherit the estate of the deceased as heir under Islamic law. H

Under the law as stated in A Handbook of Mohamedan Law of Inheritance - by Sheik Ali Bin Hemedi El-Buhuri - a brother's son has a right to inheritance, and is included in the list of ten male heirs. The Primary I Court therefore found that the appellant had the right to inherit the deceased person's house, but that he will have to pay off the unpaid balance of the loan of that house to the National Housing Corporation.

RUHUMBIKA J

Further to that, the same court directed that the said house should be valued and that the appellant should in that A respect pay one-third of that value to the mosque in relation to the "Wakf" set up by the deceased. Eventually, the house was valued at Shs.70,000/= by a Court Broker, and one-third the value of that stands at about shs. 23,330/=. B

The appellant has been trying to have the said house registered in his name, but could not succeed in doing that as the Primary Court required him to cash down Shs.23,330/= to the mosque as per said "Wakf".

The appellant being dissatisfied with this finding of the Primary Court appealed to the District Court (of Ilala as C the record shows). He was unsuccessful, as the District Court upheld the decision of the Primary Court and dismissed the appeal. As a result of that, the appellant has appealed to the High Court. Although the appellant D tried to show in his memorandum of appeal (grounds nos. 2 and 4) that the objection was lodged after the expiration of the 90 days of the publication of the application so that any one with a claim of interest in the estate could lodge an objection with the courts this is not true. According to the record of the Primary Court which is very clear, the application proceedings were commenced on the 17th day of January, 1981, while the objection E was lodged on the 30th of January, 1981 by the Kadhi of the Mwinyimkuu Mosque one JAFFAR ABUBAKAR.

The crux of this appeal is: What was the intention of the deceased as reflected in the "Wakf"? The "Wakf" F established by the deceased was clearly a conditional "Wakf". One of the conditions was that the dedication (or endocument) of the house to the mosque should take effect after the death of the testator. Another condition was that the house should be inherited by the rightful heir. The house should only pass to the mosque permanently in the event of the heir failing to turn up. This means that the rights created by the "Wakf" as to the mosque could G not override or take precedence over those of the heir, when that heir turned up. It is then clear that the intention of the testator (deceased) was for the mosque to hold the house ad interim until the heir came forward.

It is obvious that the proposed heir was the daughter of the deceased (the term "heir" in legal literature is both H masculine and feminine, although the term "heiress" is used in general English usage). This heir, MARIAM MATOLLA, did not appear. No one knows whether she is still alive in Zambia or not. Nothing has been heard about her all this time. This has created an opportunity for the appellant to come forth as the righful heir to the I "estate of the deceased", and the Primary Court accepted him after due consideration of the application. The Primary Court decision in this respect was unanimous. Strictly speaking, the Primary Court could have easily rejected the appellant as the heir, insisting that the only heir expected was the daughter of the A deceased. But in general, the Primary Court was also right in accepting the appellant as the heir, because he is the son of the deceased person's brother for which fact there was conclusive evidence. It appears that the decision of the Primary Court to accept the appellant has turned into a blessing to the appellant. MARIAM B MATOLLA, the daughter of the deceased, has not turned up, and the appellant is the only person available to benefit from the deceased's estate. This court did not wish to fault the decision of the Primary Court in accepting the appellant as the rightful heir according to Islamic Law, and the authority for that has already been cited. C

Going back to the "Wakf" is that the heir should inherit the house from the mosque, when such an heir came forth, despite whatever rights have been created by the "Wakf" as to the mosque. The appellant has now taken the D place of MARIAM MATOLLA. He has therefore the right to inherit the house, and the dedication of the house to the mosque in the "Wakf" is rendered non-effective thenceforth by the reason of the act of the appellant inheriting the house.

It is true that under the Mohamedan Law of Inheritance (book cited earlier), a testator cannot make a bequest in E which he passes more than one-third of the assets of the estate. Likewise a "Wakf" like the one set up by the deceased in this appeal could not give more than one-third of the value of the deceased person's estate, i.e., the house which is the only asset in the estate. That is why this theory of one-third was in the minds of the lower courts, when those courts obliged the appellant to cash down Shs. 23,330/= to the mosque in order to inherit the F house. This kind of interpretation of the "Wakf" in this appeal is a fallacy. Such an interpretation could only apply if the deceased has set up an unconditional "Wakf", dedicating the house to the mosque permanently after his death, without the clause that the house should pass to the heir when that heir was available. In such a case, if G then there came forward someone claiming as an heir under the usual Islamic Law of intestacy, the jurisprudence of the Islamic Law of intestacy would require that the dedication in the "Wakf" gave to the mosque rights in that particular house to one-third the value. In such a case, that type of heir could inherit the estate but less one-third the value of that estate dedicated to the mosque in a "Wakf", which the mosque should have. H

But in a conditional "Wakf" like the one set up by the deceased here, we clearly find that the mosque could not be entitled to one-third the value of the house left by the deceased, after the heir had come forth. This is so I because the intention of the testator was to pass on the house to the heir free of any conditions.

RUHUMBIKA J

This court therefore finds that it would not be justifiable for the mosque to claim to be indemnified to the tune of A Shs.23,330/= by the appellant in order to inherit the house of the deceased. As long as the appellant was accepted by the Primary Court as the rightful heir, he should be able to inherit that house free of any encumbrances created by the conditional "Wakf". B

Having found that, what follows now is to consider when the appellant will be able to inherit the house. Obviously, the appellant was essentially appointed the administrator of the estate of the deceased. Therefore, he C has to discharge the liabilities against the estate first before considering the distribution of the estate to the heirs (incidentally, there is only one heir in this matter, and that is the appellant himself).

Therefore, this does not mean that the appellant has to inherit the house straight away. The appellant is the D rightful heir alright, and there are no more qualms about that now. But the court notes from the record of the Primary Court that the house of the deceased was still entangled in a loan element with the National Housing Corporation, and as remarked earlier the appellant has to pay off the unpaid balance against that house in order to redeem it from the mortgage with the Corporation. In this respect, the appellant cannot transfer the title to the E house in his own name as he thinks. He has to settle the account with the National Housing Corporation before anything could be done.

This court therefore directs the appellant in his capacity as the administrator of the deceased's estate to procure F an up-to-date statement of account from the National Housing Corporation in respect of the house, and file that statement in the Primary Court of Magomeni, which court should monitor and ensure to it that the appellant pays to the National Housing Corporation the required monthly loan repayments until the redemption amount is paid up. G

It is only after the redemption amount is paid fully that the house could be free from the mortgage regulations to enable the appellant to process and give effect to his inheritance rights, if there could be no other encumbrances in respect of that house. H
In the end result, this appeal succeeds only to the extent as indicated. The court makes no order as to costs.
Appeal allowed.

-Headnote
The plaintiff claimed general damages in the sum of Shs.1 million for defamatory information published of him by E the defendants. The assessors were of the unanimous opinion that general damages in the sum of Shs.470,400/= be awarded. The plaintiff did not show to what extent his business suffered after the publication of the offending article in the Daily News newspaper, nor did he produce his books of accounts to substantiate his claim. F
Held: Since the plaintiff has not told the court how much he has been earning in his various businesses before and after the publication of the offending article, assessment of damages cannot be based on his unsubstantiated figures which appear to be exaggerated. G defendant is a registered company incorporated under Cap.212 of the laws of Tanzania, and he is the proprietor A of "The Daily News" which is a National Newspapers. The third defendant is a Limited liability Company incorporated under Cap.212 of the Laws of Tanzania and is the Publisher of the second defendant's Newspaper - "The Daily News".

The libel complained of was contained in an issue of the "Daily News" owned by the second defendant of 13th B day of August, 1976 and it was written by one Charles Kizigha the first defendant who was an employee of the second defendant and it was printed and published by the third defendant and it reads as follows: C

....Bank rejects Charcoal Export application.

By Charles Kizigha.

The Bank of Tanzania has rejected applications of Officials of an unregistered firm - Tanzania Charcoal Dealers - D who wanted foreign exchange to go to Iraq to negotiate Charcoal trade, it was learnt yesterday.

The Officials were named as Ndugu Rugarabamu Archard Mwombeki and Ndugu Mohamed.

The documents at the Bank of Tanzania revealed that the two people have been corresponding through the Iraq E Embassy in Dar es Salaam with charcoal dealers in Iraq.

They are reported to have assured Bank official that they had a lot of charcoal to export to Iraq, Bank sources said.

An official from the office of the Registrar of Companies said that "We have just received an application for F registering the firm and we are still considering it". The forms were submitted on AUGUST,9, this year and a receipt number N. 916141 was issued after a payment of Shs.45/= as fees was made.

The partners of the Tanzania Charcoal Dealers were Ndugu Tonny Wilson Sindano who stays in Upanga Road G at Plot Number 71 and Ndugu Rugarabamu Archard Mwombeki residing in Kinondoni Block Number 31 house Number 15 D, the forms indicated.

It was further indicated that the company would deal with charcoal and other related products. The offices of the H company are at Mosque/Libya Streets on Plot Number 1809/88.

The Principal Secretary in the Ministry of Trade, Ndugu A.G. Cheyo, said, "I have heard of the Company but the I Ministry has not yet been informed officially about its existence nor its nature of business."

The innuendo averred by the plaintiff in paras 7 and 8 of the Plaint was: A

7. "(a) That the plaintiff was operating a firm that is not registered contrary to the laws of the country.

(b) That the plaintiff by operating a company that is not registered was committing an offence. B

(c) That the plaintiff by dealing with Iraq Embassy Officials showed that his dealings were suspicious and/or illegal.

(d) That the plaintiff managed to go through to the Bank of Tanzania without the knowledge of the Ministry of Trade C

(e) That the plaintiff was hoarding charcoal in the country.

8. or in the alternative, the said words meant and were understood to mean: D

(a) That the plaintiff was a Criminal.

(b) That the Plaintiff is a bogus unscrupulous and dishonest businessman.

(c) That the plaintiff was a saboteur of our economy by draining the country's foreign exchange for personal use or E advantage.

Furthermore, the plaintiff claims that in consequence thereof, he has been seriously injured in his character, credit and reputation in the way of his business, and he has been brought into public scandal, odium and contempt and F he has suffered damage.

On the other hand, the three defendants through the services of their advocate Mr. Bantulaki learned counsel from Tanzania Legal Corporation pleaded justification to the article quoted above. G

At the commencement of the trial, issues were agreed as follows:

1. Whether the defendants printed and published or caused to have printed and published the words complained of in para 5 of the plaint.

2. Whether the words complained of did bear or were capable of bearing any meaning defamatory of the plaintiff. H

3. Whether the words were true or false.

4. Whether the publication was priviledged or was a matter of fair comment.

5. Whether the publication referred to caused an injury or loss to his business or to his person. I

6. To what relief are the parties entitled.

Mr. Rugarabamu (PW.1) in his sworn statement told the court that he is a businessman dealing with various A businesses such as selling charcoal, selling timber, preparing uniforms; clearing and forwarding goods; and preparing chicken feed for sale.

In his business for selling charcoal, he has a firm known as "Tanzania charcoal Dealers" and his partner in this B charcoal business is called Tonny W. Sindano. The firm is a registered one under the Companies Ordinance bearing Registration No. 39434 dated the 11th day of August, 1976 -Exhibit p.1. Before he started this C charcoal business, he requested the Ministry of Trade to look for him outside market vide his letter Exhibit p.2 dated the 15th day of May, 1976. The letter Exhibit p.2 was responded by the Ministry of Trade through its letter Exhibit p.3

dated the 27th day of May, 1976 which was addressed to the Director General of the D Government Purchasing Board Republic of Iraq and copied to the plaintiff. Later the Government of Iraq by way of telex message Exhibit p.4 corresponded with the plaintiff. The plaintiff then went to the Ministry of Trade with a request to be give an Export Licence but the Ministry of Trade referred him to the Forest Department for this was the department in a position of giving him an Export Licence in goods obtained from the forest. Forest E department referred him to TWICO., for TWICO was the sole company allowed by the Government to export Charcoal abroad and if they failed to export Charcoal abroad they should have given him a letter authorizing him to do so. TWICO referred the plaintiff to Tanzania Timber Export Company. Tanzania Timber Export F Company admitted before the plaintiff that they have failed to export charcoal but they advised the plaintiff to joint them in this business venture or else they were not ready to give him an export licence. The terms of their agreement were that Tanzania Timber Export Company was going to charge the plaintiff 10% of the charcoal he was going to export and that the charcoal is going to be exported through the name of Tanzania Timber Export G Company. The plaintiff was required to write a letter to Iraq informing them about this agreement and the plaintiff complied with this advice and he wrote a letter a copy of which was tendered in Court as Exhibit p.5 to the H Government of Iraq and he too remitted a copy of this letter to the Ambassador of Iraq based in Dar es Salaam. He also sent to Iraq a sample of his Charcoal and to prove this he produced Exhibit p.6 which is Air Way Bill No. 094 - 7145 -9452 of East African Airways dated the 26th day of June, 1976. He did not get a reply from Government of Iraq thus he went again to the Office of Tanzania Timber Export Company to inquire about the I same where he was told that the Government of Iraq had already entered into a contract to buy charcoal with the Government of Kenya and he was so informed by the General Manager of Tanzania

Timber Export Company who was recently in Nairobi Kenya. He then decided to go and see the Officials of A Bank of Tanzania with the view of negotiating for foreign currency so that he goes to Iraq to negotiate about the sale of charcoal to Iraq with the officials concerned there. Bank of Tanzania officials advised him to obtain first a B letter from Tanzania Timber Export Company before his request was considered. As he was going to the office of Tanzania Timber Export to obtain the letter as advised by the officials of Bank of Tanzania, he passed through the post office to collect his mails. There he found a letter exhibit p.8 dated the 20th July, 1976 C addressed to the plaintiff by the counsellor of Iraq Embassy here in Dar es Salaam. In the said letter Exhibit p.8 the said Counsellor advised the plaintiff that he should expedite about the arrangements of sale of charcoal to his Government purchasing Board in Iraq. The plaintiff took the letter Exhibit p.8 up to Tanzania Timber Export Company and showed it to the General Manager of that Company whereby the General Manager gave him a D letter Exhibit p.9 which he took to the Bank of Tanzania as advised. The Bank of Tanzania again advised him to go to the Ministry of Trade to get a letter of support and he got it and the same was tendered in court as Exhibit p.11. Later the plaintiff got a copy of a letter Exhibit p.12 addressed to the Governor of the Bank of Tanzania by the Principal Secretary to the Ministry of Commerce and Industries and copied to the plaintiff advising the E Governor of the Bank of Tanzania not to give any clearance to the plaintiff to go to Iraq to negotiate about the deal of sale of charcoal with the Government purchasing Board of Iraq for the sole Company allowed to export charcoal from the country is Tanzania Timber Export Company. On receipt of the copy of the letter Exhibit F p.12, the plaintiff wrote a letter of protest to the Principal Secretary of the Ministry of Commerce and Industries but unfortunately he failed to produce a copy of that letter and copied that letter to the Governor of the Bank of Tanzania.

The General Manager of Tanzania Timber Export Company respondent to the letter of protest of the plaintiff by G writing a letter Exhibit p.13 to the Principal Secretary of the Ministry of Commerce and Industries and copied the same to the Governor of the Bank of Tanzania, the Principal Secretary to the Ministry of Natural Resources and the plaintiff. But before that the Bank of Tanzania refused to give clearance to the plaintiff to travel to Iraq to H negotiate about this deal resulting his letter of protest as stated above. Hereafter the Bank of Tanzania also responded to the plaintiff's letter of protest for on 27th August, 1976 the Director General of the Bank of Tanzania wrote a letter reference No. 1406 dated the 27th August, 1976 and tendered as Exhibit p. 14 to the I Principal Secretary, Ministry of Trade advising him to convene a meeting so that the business deal of selling charcoal to Iraq should take effect. As a result of this, a meeting on 13th August, A 1976 was held and the plaintiff was summoned to attend this meeting and indeed he at tended it. Other members who attended this meeting were:

1 Mr. J.N. Mushi - The General Manager of Tanzania Timber Export Company; B

2. Mr. A.I. Mongi - one of the Managers from Tanzania Timber Export Company;

3. Mr. E.M. Mzara from the Ministry of Forest and Natural Resources; C

4. Mr. B.D.S. Scoor - an expert at Tanzania Timber Export Company;

5. Mr. E.S. Mbaga who represented the Principal Secretary to the Ministry of Trade.

D

In the said meeting, it was resolved that one member from Tanzania Timber Export Company and a representative from the plaintiff's firm should go to Baghdad in Iraq to negotiate about this charcoal business E deal. It was also agreed in this meeting that the plaintiff's firm should hand over charcoal to Tanzania Timber Export Company to sell it to Iraq on the Plaintiff's behalf and in return, Tanzania Timber Export Company should charge 10% of the money accrued from the sale. The minutes of the said meeting were tendered in court as exhibit p.15. F

To his surprise, on the 13/8/76 when the plaintiff was going to attend the above stated meeting a friend of his one Mr. Joel Ndyamu (PW.2) gave him a copy of the offending Daily News which he tendered as exhibit p.16 which is owned by the second defendant and published by the first defendant an employee of the second defendant and printed by the third defendant. G

The plaintiff claims that the story appearing in the said newspaper article was not true for he never requested for a licence from the Bank of Tanzania to sell out charcoal; therefore the heading of the article was not true, and that H by the 13th day of August, 1976 when this offending article came out, his firm had already been registered and it was registered on the 11th day of August, 1976 as exhibited in his certificate of registration exhibit p.1. He asserted as a lie that by 13/8/76 his firm was not registered as put in the article exhibit p.16. The plaintiff further I claims that the defendants showed the plaintiffs' residential and business addresses in the article exhibit p.16 so that police officers should arrest them for they were considered by the defendants to be criminal offenders. J

MTENGA J

The plaintiff further asserted that it is not true that the Ministry of Trade did not know about their charcoal A business as put in the article exhibit p.16 by the defendants for from May, 1976 his firm had been corresponding with the Ministry of Trade and held meetings with the officials of that Ministry as stated above. The plaintiff therefore claims to have been defamed. B As a result of this article exhibit p.16, officials from Anti-Corruption Squad on the 23/8/76 went to the office of the plaintiff along Moscow/Libya Street as advertised in the article exhibit p.16 and arrested the plaintiff and his C partner in business. These anti-corruption officials identified themselves as being Corneus Kafipa and he took him up to his office near Army Headquarters. In his room, Kafipa took out a copy of the Daily News of the 13/8/76 and enquired from the plaintiff to account as to how his firm would get money to bank up its charcoal business and as to whether his firm has other dubious dealings with the money requested from the bank of D Tanzania. He then gave the plaintiff a sheet of paper to write down his statement. However, the plaintiff refused to write down any statement, whereby Mr. Kafipa threatened to torture him; thereupon, the plaintiff admitted to write down his statement. The plaintiff's partner was interrogated by another police officer in a separate room. E Both of them were released on that very day at 6.30 p.m. after being warned that they should not leave Dar es Salaam City for any time they could be called upon.

Later sometime in September 1976 the plaintiff received a letter ref. No. 47543 dated the 11th September, 1976 from the Government purchasing Board of Iraq exhibit p. 17 which states in part and I quote: F

> We would like to inform that we had to put your offer of 17th of August in abeyance due to high price.

The plaintiff claims that he suspected the Iraq Embassy in Dar es Salaam to have sent a copy of the Daily News G of 13/8/76 exhibit p.16 to its Government in Iraq resulting his Charcoal business deal with Iraq Government to be revoked as shown in the letter exhibit p.17. The Plaintiff never went to see Tanzania Timber Export Company again for he is already thought by the Company as a crook and Tanzania Timber Export Company never sold H charcoal to Iraq as agreed upon for the Company depended upon the plaintiff's firm to get the said Charcoal.

The plaintiff further claims that in the first order Iraq Government wanted to buy 3,000 tons of charcoal from his firm that's to say about 60,000 bags of charcoal each weighting 50kgs. at a price of Shs.55.02 per bag could I have been sold to Iraq Government had the agreement not been revoked by Iraq Government due to this article appearing in the Daily News exhibit p. 16 of 13/8/76. He claims A that he rang a person working with Iraq Embassy in Dar es Salaam and he got reminded by that person to read his home papers. The plaintiff further claims that if this business took of, his company could have earned a profit B of Shs.900,000/= net and this profit was lost due to the article which is defamatory written by the defendants.

Later the plaintiff approached the second defendant to correct his errors appearing in the article of 13/8/76 Daily News exhibit p.16 and to offer an apology and the second defendant promised to do so on 16/8/76 but he never C kept his promise. On 21st August, 1976 through the services of their advocate one Mr. Raithatha, the plaintiffs wrote the Daily News second defendant a letter exhibit p.18 asking him to offer an apology and to pay the plaintiff a reasonable sum by way of damages. On 23rd August, 1976 the second defendant wrote a letter D Ref. No. ED/CEN/55 to the plaintiffs through their advocate Exhibit p.19 and part of this letter reads and I quote:

...While we are making out own investigations on the matter we would like to have from you a sample letter which could be the basis for discussion on a possible apology. E

On receipt of this letter Exhibit p.19, the plaintiff through the services of his other advocate one Mr. Rahim on F 22nd December, 1977 wrote the second defendant another letter Exhibit p.20 demanding for an apology, while reminding him of his previous letter Exhibit p.18. On receipt of this letter Exhibit p.20 the second defendant wrote a letter Exhibit p.21 bearing Reference No. p BS/AM/119/12/77 dated the 27 the December, 1977 to the Chief Corporation Counsel seeking for legal advice on the matter. The plaintiff claims that up to the time he came G to court the defendants have never apologized nor have they given him any reasonable compensation for their defamatory article appearing in the article of the Daily News of 13th August, 1976 Exhibit p.16.

The plaintiff further contended that prior to that article Exhibit p.16 the second defendant also published some H other articles which were defamatory about Charcoal business and he tendered such articles as Exhibits p.22 p.24 respectively.

In conclusion, the plaintiff testified that he is a businessman dealing with other businesses apart from dealing with I the sale of charcoal he is dealing with the sale of wood; tailoring of uniforms; Clearing and forwarding goods; Manufacturing chicken feed and animals; and he used to get an annual net profit of::

MTENGA J

1. Tailoring Sh.200,000/= up to 300,000/=' A
2. Timber Shs.300,000/= to Shs.400,000/=
3. Clearing and Forwarding of goods Shs.600,000/=

He claims to have had a lot of customers prior to the publication of the offensive article Exhibit p.16 but B thereafter, he no longer gets such a great number of customers and when he appears in his favourite bar known as "White House Bar" to drink along Libya Street here in Dar es Salaam his friends and customers ridiculed and laughed at him calling him all sorts of names and he was stopped selling charcoal because some of his customers consider him to be a criminal offender. He asks now this court to award him Shs.1 million as damages for this C defamation plus costs of this suit.

Mr. Joel Ndyamkama (PW.2) testified that he is a friend of the plaintiff and that he is a sales Manager of Colt Motors. Sometime in August, 1976 he bought a copy of the Daily News and to his surprise he saw an offensive article defaming the plaintiff and he took that copy of the Daily News Exhibit p.16 to the plaintiff and from then D on he considered the plaintiff to be a crook who ran a business without registering it, and he looked down upon him. By then the plaintiff had already applied to the Colt Motors to buy two cars for the purpose of running his E Charcoal business but when the Managing Director of Colt Motors saw the article appearing on Exhibit p. 16, he cancelled the application because he considered the plaintiff to be a crook.

On the other hand, the defendants admitted to have published the article Exhibit p.16 but they pleaded justification and they called two witnesses in their support and these were Mr. Enest Ambali (DW.1) and Richard F Benjamini Mnguhai (DW.2).

During the hearing of this case the court sat with three assessors as provided under section 57(1) of the Newspaper Act, 1976 but during final submissions it was reported that one of the assessors was dead and this situation left the court with only two assessors. G

I directed the two gentlemen assessors that in a libel action, the plaintiff has to prove three things. Firstly he has to prove whether the defendants published those words complained of; secondly, did the words refer to the H plaintiff? and lastly, were the words complained of, defamatory. The test of what is defamatory is whether the words complained of would tend to lower the reputation of the plaintiff in the opinion of right-thinking persons.

On the first issue as to whether the defendant printed and published those words complained of in paragraph 5 of I the plaint? Well the defendants do not deny that and their defence counsel through his submissions readily admitted to have done so. Further still, the plaintiff managed to produce the article in issue Exhibit p.16. A

The second and third issues can be answered together. As rightly contended by Mr. Mbuya, learned counsel for the plaintiff, which contention I wholly agree with, defamation is a false and malicious statement about a man to B his discredit. Whether or not a statement is defamatory, the court has to look at the contents of the statement to see as to whether it is true or false and malicious or whether it discredits the one about whom it relates. Having this in mind, two facts are not true on the Daily News issue Ex.p.16 The heading of the article says: "... Bank C rejects Charcoal export application." This is not all that true for the evidence as stated above clearly shows that the plaintiff requested for travel clearance to go to Iraq where the prospective customer was and he never applied for an export Licence as the heading of that article Exhibit p.16 wants the public to understand. Surely D and right thinking person on reading the heading of that article on Exhibit p.16 would come to the conclusion that the business deal between the plaintiff and Iraq Government for selling the latter charcoal was finished for without having an export Licence, the plaintiff could not be in a position of selling charcoal to Iraq Embassy who are based here in Dar es Salaam and who took part in this deal by negotiating on behalf of their Government were E embarrassed.

The next item which I consider to be false is contained in paragraph one of the article in Exhibit p.16 and it read: "... The Bank of Tanzania has rejected applications of two officials of an unregistered firm....." This I think was as well bad news for Iraq Government together with the officials of Iraq Embassy in Dar es Salaam naturally F believed through this article Exhibit p.16 that they were negotiating with, an unregistered firm and it was as well bad news to right thinking people at large for the public thought that the plaintiff was a crook who wanted to have business with foreign Government without having a registered firm. The defendants agreed that they printed and G published the article but asserted that was true and pleaded justification to it. To support their assertion, they brought the Registrar of Companies Mr. Richard Benjamini Mnguhai DW.2) who told the Court that the plaintiff's company was registered on 16th August, 1976 three days after the article Exh.p.16 complained of was printed and published. This is not at all true for the plaintiff's certificate of registration Exhibit p.1 clearly shows H that the plaintiff's Company was registered on 11th August, 1976 before the publication of Exhibit p.16.

Another false statement in the article Exhibit p.16. is contained in the last paragraph of it and it reads:

...The Principal Secretary in the Ministry of Trade, Ndugu A.G. Cheyo, said, I have heard of the Company but the Ministry I has not yet been informed officially about its existence nor its nature of business. A

1985 TLR p69

I say that this statement is false because right from the start as I explained above in the evidence of the plaintiff (PW.1) that the plaintiff has approached the Ministry of Trade to enquire about the possibility of exporting B charcoal abroad for sale. As a result of the plaintiff's inquiries, the Ministry of Trade has written a letter Exhibit p.3 to Iraq Government reminding it about its trade delegation of 1973 looking for wood charcoal and the C Ministry of Trade had asked the Iraq Government to contact the plaintiff directly and copied that letter to the plaintiff and indeed, the Ministry of Trade had requested the plaintiffs firm to get into contract with TWICO and TAN TIMBER which the plaintiff's firm did. After long correspondence between the plaintiff and Iraq D Government the plaintiff sent a sample of his charcoal to Iraq Government as shown in the Air Way Bill Exhibit p.6 and as a result, of this, the Iraq Government purchasing Board wrote back to the plaintiff wishing to buy an initial of 3,000 tons of charcoal. It is therefore not true that the Ministry of Trade was not officially aware of the existence of the plaintiff's firm.

The next issue is whether the words used in the article Exhibit p.16 were defamatory of the plaintiff. To this Mr. E Mbuya learned counsel for the plaintiff referred me to the case of East African Standard v Gittan [1970] E.A. 678 where it was held by Spry Ag. J. as he then was that the test of what is defamatory is whether the words complained of would tend to lower the reputation of the plaintiff in the opinion of right-thinking persons; F and one could look at the general impression they are likely to create in the minds of reasonable persons. In the instant case of article Exhibit p.16 has carried, an innuendo that there was an illegal firm in the sense that it was not registered and that this unregistered firm was carrying on business without complying with the requirements of the law resulting the Bank of Tanzania to react by refusing to grant it export licence for exporting charcoal G abroad. There is evidence on recording by the plaintiff (PW.1) and his witness (PW.2) that after publication of this article exhibit p.16 which evidence was not disputed that the plaintiff (PW.1) and his partner were arrested and interrogated in connection with this charcoal business as exhibited in the article Exhibit p.16. Moreover the H plaintiff's application to buy two motor vehicles from Colt Motors for his charcoal business as stated by his friend (PW.2), was also revoked as a result of the publication of this article Exhibit p.16. Later PW.2 went to the plaintiff and enquired from him as to whether what he had read in the article Exhibit p.16 was true and when the I plaintiff went to drink in one of the bars he normally used to frequent the "White House Bar," he was looked down upon as a crook by his customers and friends. I agree with Mr. Mbuya's contention that by then A the Daily News was the only substantial media in the country with a wide circulation and among the people who read it were the people of Iraq Embassy in Dar es Salaam whom the plaintiff with the knowledge of the Ministry B of Trade was contacting with Iraq Government trying to sell charcoal in Iraq.

In conclusion therefore, I agree with the unanimous opinion of the two gentlemen assessors that the article exhibit p. 16 was recklessly prepared on incorrect information and the publication of this article appearing in exhibit p.16 C has injured the reputation of the plaintiff and it has exposed him to hatred, contempt and it has damaged him in his business profession. The defendants acted in this manner without lawful justification or excuse and the information was false.

I now come to consider the fifth and sixth issues and these two issues can be consolidated together for they are inter-related. With that I directed the two gentlemen assessors to consider the following: D

(a) Gravity of the defamation,

(b) Whether the libelous imputation was conveyed to the general mass of readers of the Daily News, E

(c) Regard should be taken on the defendants' refusal to publish an apology.

The two gentlemen assessors were of the unanimous opinion that the plaintiff should be awarded Shs.470,400/= as general damages. F

It is true that the innuendo appearing on Exhibit p.16 was disparaging to the plaintiff's character and the article imputed the commission of a crime by the plaintiff and that is why he was arrested, and detained for interrogation by the anti-corruption officials for a number of hours.

As a result of the libel plaintiff's business has dwindled as G the general public has shunned away from him. For they look down upon him as a crook after reading that article. Even though I look at this claim with a bit of scepticism for it is likely that the plaintiff might have exaggerated this claim out of feelings of indignation. Indeed the plaintiff's business contact with Iraq Government H had come to an abrupt end due to the publication of this libellous article Exhibit p.16 but also due to high price as complained by the Iraq Government in their letter Exhibit p.17. Also take into view that the Daily News had a wide circulation for it is read not only in the whole country but also in neighbouring countries. More and above, I the second defendant's conduct after publication of the libel aggravated the matter. The second defendant did not respond to letters sent to him by the plaintiff's advocates nor did he offer an apology. I agree that in these circumstances the plaintiff is entitled to substantial damages bearing in mind that the plaintiff's means of livelihood A has seriously been threatened.

I am not however, in agreement with the opinion of the gentlemen assessors that the amount of damages be in the region of Shs.470,400/=. The plaintiff tried to bring in some figures in order to convince the court as to how B much he used to earn before the publication of this offending article but he never told the court as to how much he is now earning in his various businesses after the publication of this article and nor did he produce his books of accounts to prove what actually he earned in his various businesses before the publication of this offensive article C Exhibit p.16 and this being the position, the plaintiff might have exaggerated out of feelings of indignation and the figures of profits of his businesses might not be all that accurate. It should also be borne in mind that the business contract with the Iraq Government was not at all concluded and the plaintiff had all the opportunity to mitigate the damage by selling his charcoal locally.

It is therefore my view that the interests of justice will be served if the plaintiff is awarded Shs.200,000/= as D general damages plus costs and interest. It is so ordered.

Plaintiff is awarded Shs.200,000/=

Judgment

Mtenga, J.: The appellant Salum s/o Shabani was convicted on his own unequivocal plea of C guilty to one count under the Traffic Act, 1973 that is to say, using a motor vehicle on the public road with the load greater than the load capacity declared by the manufacturers of its chassis contrary to sections 39(2) (3) and D (5) of the Road Traffic Act, No.30 of 1973. He was sentenced to three months jail. He is now appealing against such sentence.

In his memorandum of appeal the appellant complains that he was not given an option of a sentence of fine.

The facts of the case disclosed that the appellant was a bus conductor of "Super Star Bus Service" which E operates from Dar es Salaam to Morogoro and on the date in question, he was arrested carrying more passengers than the bus is licensed to carry in that he carried 35 passengers in excess. The relevant sub-section under which the appellant was charged reads: F

(2) No motor vehicle or trailer shall be used on a road with a load greater than the load capacity declared by the manufacturers of the chassis of the motor vehicle or trailer or greater than the load capacity determine under the provisions of this Act. G

At first glance, I had the opinion that "load" as provided in the above stated subsection of the Act does not include "a passenger" because a passenger as defined in "The Concise Oxford Dictionary" is a person travelling in public conveyance by land or water or air. However, this problem appears to be solved by subsection 4 of section 39 of the Traffic Act. This relevant sub-section provides: H

For the purposes of subsections (2) and (3) of this section, persons travelling on a motor vehicle or trailer shall be deemed to be part of the load. IA

Accordingly, the charge has properly been laid against the appellant.

1985 TLR p73
MTENGA J
As I stated above the appellant is complaining against the sentence in that he was not given an option of a A sentence of fine. The penalty subsection under which the appellant was charged provides:

(5) Any person who uses on a road a motor vehicle or trailer in contravention of the provisions of subsections (1) (2) B or (3) shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable, on first conviction to a fine not exceeding twenty thousand shillings and on a second conviction, to a fine not exceeding thirty thousand shillings and on a third or subsequent conviction, to a fine not exceeding fifty thousand shillings or, in each case, to a term of imprisonment not exceeding three years or to both such fine and such imprisonment. C

I understand that the task of sentencing is a very difficult one though admittedly, it is a discretionary task. A magistrate or judge who decides what sentence to impose against a convicted person has to exercise that D discretion judicially. There are a number of factors that the court has to consider before passing a sentence such as gravity of the offence, prevalence of the offence, the interest of society, the penalty section under which the accused is charged and last but not least, the record of the accused person. E

In the instant case, the relevant penalty subsection has provided for a fine or imprisonment as a penalty for carrying a load greater than the load capacity declared by the manufacturers of the chassis of the motor vehicle. This is an option given by the Legislature, which therefore means that in imposing a sentence, the court must F ascertain that a sentence of fine should first be imposed and in default of payment of such fine, then a sentence of imprisonment can be given. I hasten to add here that in imposing a sentence of fine the court must ascertain that the fine can be paid rather than impose a fine which cannot be paid and as a result the accused goes to jail. In Mohamed Juma v Rex. 1 T.L.R. 257, Wilson J. held: G

That though severe sentences may be justifiable for certain offences under liquor laws, the fines imposed in such cases should bear a reasonable relation to the accused's power to pay taking all his circumstances into account and should not be such as to render illusory the option of a fine specifically granted by the Legislature in the case of a first conviction H under the liquor laws.

In another case, Nyakulima d/o Chacha v R. 1 T.L.R. 341 Mohan, J. observed: I

The principle is that a fine should be one which an accused person can reasonably be expected to pay.

1985 TLR p74
MTENGA J
Mohan, J. also observed in R. v Bison s/o Mwanga 11 T.L.R. that before imposing a fine the court should A make some enquiries of the financial standing of the accused and the result of this should form part of the record.

In the case of Samwel Mwendamane v R. [1967] H.C.D. n. 457 Saidi, J. as he then was expressed the view B that an accused person should not be fined more than one third of his monthly income and I entirely agree with him.

In the instant case, as I stated above, the appellant was not given his right of option of a sentence of fine as C stipulated by legislature in the subsection of the Act quoted above. This in my view is wrong and I hold that the trial magistrate did not exercise his discretion judicially in sentencing the appellant. Even the learned State Attorney for the Republic one Mrs. Shiyo did not support the sentence imposed against the appellant and she D referred me to a case of R. v. Juma Mrisho [1969] H.C.D. no. 61. In that case Bramble J. as he then was held:

Where the legislature has given an alternative of a fine for certain minor offences it would seem more appropriate to inflict this type of punishment rather than peremptory imprisonment. Of course, where there is a continuous flagrant disregard for the law, imprisonment would be the only answer. E

In the instant case, the appellant is a first offender and in his mitigation, he told the lower court that the passengers F in excess were stranded and he helped them without charging them any fare. We all know that nowadays there is a shortage of transport facilities and I believe the appellant acted through sympathy by carrying more passengers than he was permitted to carry and under the circumstances a sentence of fine could be appropriate.

Accordingly this appeal against the sentence is allowed and I set aside the sentence imposed against the appellant G and since the appellant has been in jail from 10th May, 1982 up to date - a period of almost one month, I feel that this period of imprisonment he has already served is sufficient for the offence committed and no useful purpose will be served by substituting a sentence of fine. As a result, I order his immediate release from custody unless he is held there for any other lawful cause.

Appeal allowed.

C. Rutagatina, for the defence.

Judgment

Bahati, J.: Cheka Anthony the accused in this case is charged with the offence of murder F contrary to section 196 of the Penal Code in that on or about 14th August, 1979 at Kongowe village he murdered one Rashid Salum.

The case for the Prosecution is that Rashid Salum the deceased in this case was living at Kongowe with Maimuna G Salahe, PW.4 and Juma Rashidi, PW.5 The deceased was not married to Maimuna but he lived with her as man and wife. Then on the fateful day of 14th August, 1979 the accused who also lived in Kongowe village and who once had Maimuna as his woman friend came to the house of Maimuna while the deceased and Juma his H son had gone to the shops to buy a lamp. It was at night. When the deceased came back he found the accused talking to Maimuna. Then a fight ensued and the accused beat and kicked the deceased and eventually he beat the deceased on the head using a stick (gongo). Then the deceased was left lying in a ditch dead and the I accused went to his home which was just next to where the deceased lived with Maimuna and Juma.

BAHATI J

Juma Rashid ran to Albert Kivamba PW.2 who was known to Juma. Juma told Albert that his father was dead A and that he had been killed by Cheka. Albert went to his neighbour one Francis Magai with Juma to tell him what Juma had reported. Then the three of them went to Selemani Omari the cell leader, PW.1. Eventually they B all came to the house of the deceased. They knocked at the door of the house of the deceased to wake up Maimuna. When Maimuna opened the door, they asked her where her husband was. She replied that she had left him outside sleeping. Maimuna then came out with a lamp and she saw the deceased lying in a ditch. C Maimuna called out, "Rashid, get up, let us go to sleep inside." But Rashid the deceased was dead and did not wake up. From there the group went to the house of Cheka and woke him up. Cheka was very nervous and they arrested him. They took both Cheka and Maimuna to Chang'ombe Police Station. The Police at D Chang'ombe then visited the scene of crime. Police Superintendent Alfred Gewe, PW.3 went to the scene of crime with the people who had taken Cheka to the Police Station. At the scene of crime Maimuna told Superintendent Gewe that Cheka had killed the deceased. Superintendent Gewe found the body of the deceased lying in a ditch near the house of the deceased. Near the body was a piece of wood which was used E to kill the deceased (exhibit P.1). Also Superintendent Gewe drew a sketch plan of the area (exhibit P.2). Superintendent Gewe was told by Maimuna that the deceased used to be her husband. After she left him she got another man, the accused.

Maimuna's version of the case was that she lived with the deceased in Kongowe for 3 years and then the F deceased left her. By then Maimuna had built her own house in the plot of the deceased. The deceased rented a house when he left Maimuna and he was living there. On 14th August, 1979 the deceased came to Maimuna's house and said "hodi". Maimuna remained silent as she was with Cheka Anthony in the house. Cheka Antony G opened the door and came out and fought with the deceased. Then Maimuna ran out of the house and went to hide in the bush. Eventually Maimuna came back and slept in her house. Soon afterwards a cell leader and many people came there and asked her where her husband the deceased was. She told them that she did not know as he had his own home. Then she came out and they told her that her husband was dead. She was then H taken to the Police station.

The report of the doctor on the post mortem examination of the deceased was tendered as an exhibit in terms of section 275 of the Criminal Procedure Code because the doctor could not be found. The post mortem examination report (exhibit P.3) shows that cause of death was due to head injury - contusion. The summary of the report reads as follows: I cut wound on occipital region 3 x 5 x 7 cm. extending have big mydrocelc - Big subdural haematoma found - brain A laceration at base of skull.

In defence the accused gave a sworn statement. He said that he used to live at Kongowe before he was B arrested. On 14th August, 1979 he was at Kongowe. Maimuna was his girl friend for almost a year and then accused left her and she got the deceased as her man. On 14th August, 1979 Maimuna called the accused to her house. Accused went there and Maimuna told him that she wanted him again. Then the deceased came C there and there was a fight. The deceased strangled the accused and the accused struggled to set himself free and in the process he pushed the deceased who fell down. The accused left for his home running. People came to arrest him at night.

In cross-examination the accused said that the deceased could not have fallen in the ditch when he pushed him as D the ditch was at the back of the house. He also said that the deceased died due to a beating and that he beat him. But the accused went on to claim again that he simply pushed him. At another stage in cross-examination the accused seemed to admit that he did the killing jointly with Maimuna. He then changed his story to say that he E simply pushed the deceased.

After summing up to the assessors, both assessors found the accused guilty of murder. The assessors found PW.5 to be possessed of sufficient intelligence and to be a witness of truth despite his tender years. The F assessors found that the deceased must have been beaten by the accused and possibly by Maimuna also jointly with the accused.

This is a tragic death no doubt. The evidence clearly shows that the accused beat the deceased till he died. The post mortem examination report findings are more consistent with the deceased being beaten than just being G pushed. There is clear evidence from PW.5 Juma Rashid who witnessed the fight. Juma narrated how he saw his father being beaten and kicked by the accused and eventually the accused hit him with a piece of wood. Juma does not mention

Maimuna to have been involved in the fight. I, like the gentleman assessors, do find Juma H to be a witness of truth. Although Juma was unable to understand the meaning of an oath he certainly knew the duty to tell the truth. I am satisfied that he is possessed of sufficient intelligence to know the duty to tell the truth and that what he said was the truth. The claim by the accused that Juma was asleep cannot be true because it is Juma who reported the death of his father to the cell leader and other people. If Juma had been asleep I during the fight he could not have reported anything. As I have said above, the post mortem examination report A corroborates to a great extent what Juma said in court. The accused himself has admitted having a scuffle with deceased. He however puts it that he simply pushed the deceased away. But there is the evidence of Juma that B the accused actually assaulted the deceased till he died and there is the post mortem examination report showing that there was heavy beating of the deceased rather than a mere simple fall. In view of this I find that the accused fought with the deceased and beat the deceased till he died.

We cannot vouch for the identity of the stick or piece of wood which was used to beat the deceased. There is C no way in which it can be shown that exhibit P.1 was the stick or piece of wood which was used to kill the deceased. But this is not a necessary factor here, for what is important here is that the deceased was severely D assaulted on his head leading to head injury and contusion, brain laceration at the base of the skull and a big subdural haematoma. These injuries could not have been self inflicted nor could they be inflicted by mere hands. The accused must have used some blunt weapon like a stick to cause these injuries and I so find. Whether exhibit p.1 was used or not is therefore not important. E

Having found that the accused assaulted the deceased causing his death, what are the possible defences for the accused in this case? The only defence which accused has suggested in this case against his act is that of self F defence. I will therefore examine whether self defence is available here. It will be recalled that the accused himself admitted that the woman Maimuna was living with the deceased to the accused's knowledge, after leaving the accused. The evidence of Juma also shows that Maimuna was living with the deceased when this incident happened. Although Maimuna has claimed otherwise, I am satisfied that the position is as presented by the G accused and Juma. Now the accused went to talk to a woman of another person at night in the absence of the person who was living with the woman, namely, the deceased. When he was surprised he fought the deceased until he killed him. The accused did not attempt even to run away until he had finished off the deceased. The H accused certainly had an opportunity to run away and in any case he was at fault to come to the home of the deceased to talk with deceased's woman at night. The fight took place outside the house and the accused had every opportunity to run away to avoid further confrontation with the deceased. I am satisfied that the defence of I self defence in terms of section 18 to 18 C of Penal Code is not available to the accused here. What other possible defence is there for the accused? Here was a fight. Everything done was done in the course of a struggle where there was hardly any time for the accused to form the intent to kill. I would agree with the defence counsel that the case of R. v John Wimaana A [1968] H.C.D. 49 is applicable here. In Wimaana's case there was a fight and in the course of the fight the deceased was killed. Mustafa, J, as he then was said thus: "when death occurs as a result of a fight as in this B case, unless there are very exceptional circumstances, persons who cause death are guilty of manslaughter and not murder. In this case the offence disclosed is on the borderline... and I will give the benefit of the doubt to the accused persons and find them guilty of Manslaughter."

To summarize the position here, I have found the accused as the person who fought and killed the deceased C possibly with a stick. I have also considered the danger of acting on the evidence of a child of tender years and I have warned myself of the danger of doing so but I am satisfied the child is telling the truth. Moreover the evidence of the child (PW.5) had been corroborated to an extent by that of PW.4, the post mortem examination D report and even the sworn statement of the accused himself. The death occurred in the course of a fight and as such it is not easy to find malice aforethought as was held in Wimaana's case cited above. I therefore differ from the views of assessors who find accused guilty of murder. Consequently I find accused guilty of manslaughter contrary to section 195 of the Penal Code and I convict him accordingly. E

1. Kigorogolo v Rueshereka [1969] E.A. 426

Judgment

Mapigano J.: In this case the appellant Ally Kauzeni was charged with criminal trespass contrary to section 299 (a) of the Penal Code. He was convicted and sentenced to a fine of Shs. 500/= and to D be jailed if he would not pay. He was aggrieved by the conviction and he lodged an appeal against it. The appeal was heard on the 7th inst. and the court then quashed the conviction and stated that the reasons for the decision will be rendered in writing later.

In my assessment I was of the view that the trial court did not go to the heart of the matter and that its judgment E was flawed by a number of non-directions that were grave in nature. And it did not surprise me that Mr. Uronu for the Republic felt a civil trespass had been committed and not a criminal trespass and that redress if any lay in a civil action rather than criminal charge. F

The appellant was accused of unlawfully entering upon the property of Omari Mbega at Msamvu area in the Morogoro township with intent to intimidate, insult or annoy, the incident taking place on the 29th September, 1979. As indicated at the outset, the charge was laid under paragraph (a) of section 299 of the Penal Code. For ease of reference that paragraph is set out in full hereunder, viz: G

Any person who unlawfully enters into or upon property in the possession of another with intent to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy any person in possession of such property is guilty of the misdemeanour termed "Criminal H trespass" and is liable to imprisonment for three months: if the property upon which the offence is committed is any building, tent or vessel used as a human dwelling or any building used as a place of worship or as a place for the custody of property the offender is liable to imprisonment for one year. I

MAPIGANO J

In the instant case the property upon which the alleged criminal trespass was perpetrated by the appellant was a A piece of undeveloped land and the mens rea which the charge sought to attribute to the appellant was to intimated or insult or annoy the said Omari Mbega.

The background and facts of this case, largely undisputed, are these. Up to 1979 Omari Mbega, the appellant B and other people used to live at a place called Mwigole in the township of Morogoro. It happened that the Town Council resolved to build a road through the area which would have necessitated the pulling down of several houses in that area. Pursuantly, the Town Council served notices to Omari Mbega, the appellant and C others, requiring them to move from the place to create room for the construction of the projected road. At the same time the Town Council offered each one of them an alternative plot at Msamvu. Omari Mbega was duly offered a plot in that area identifiable as No.36 B, and the appellant was also offered one. However, not the whole Msamvu area was suitably habitable. The plot offered to the appellant turned out to be situated at a D marsh. Finding himself in such quandary, the appellant approached the Town Director through the local Party leaders. A few days later the appellant was seen entering upon plot No. 36 B, which had been allocated to Omari Mbega, and starting to building a dwelling - house on it. That was before Omari Mbega had done E anything to the plot. All the same, Omari Mbega protested and lodged a complaint to the authorities, resulting into the appellant being brought to the lower court on the charge.

The appellant made an explanation as to why he entered upon the plot. He said that when it was put in the mind F of the Town Director that the plot granted to the appellant was on a bog, the said Director instructed one Nyoni, a surveyor, to offer the appellant another one. Nyoni, the appellant told the court, proceeded to re-allocate him plot No. 36 B. Neither the Town Director nor the surveyor was called to give evidence, but the G story of the appellant found some support in the testimony of two Party functionaries, namely Daudi Mganga (DW 2) and Malungo Choka (DW 3), and no reasonable man could say for sure that they were lying.

In his judgment the learned magistrate found, reasonably, that the plot was the holding of Omari Mbega. He also H found, reasonably, that the appellant's entry upon it was wrongful, adding that it was or would have been grossly irregular for the Town Director or any body under him to allocate the plot to the appellant. The substantive part of the appeal is the criticism that the learned magistrate paid no or little attention to the fact that the entry upon the property was the result of a genuine mistake.

As I have remarked above, the judgment of the lower court was flawed by a number of serious non-directions. I In the first place, the learned magistrate never paused to consider the issue of possession. As pointed out already, the holder of the plot in A question had not started developing it at the time the appellant entered upon it and it seems that he was then still residing at Mwagole area. The question, therefore, is whether criminal trespass could be committed against a B person who was not in actual physical possession of the property. In my view, an intention to intimidate, insult or annoy any person in possession of property does not, in the context of the penal provision whereunder the appellant was charged, mean to intimidate, insult or annoy any person in constructive or in juridical possession C but in actual physical possession. Where, therefore, the complainant was, as in the present case, not in actual physical possession of the property no offence of criminal trespass under section 299(a) could be committed against him. In holding so I find countenance and comfort in India. In that country, where the law is exactly the D same, the weight of authority is in favour of the view that no criminal trespass can be committed upon a person who is not actually possessed of the property. And nearer home, there is a persuasive decision in Kigorogolo v Rueshereka,[1969] E.A 426, by the High Court of Uganda construing an identical penal provision. If that opinion holds, then that should per se have been sufficient ground for dismissing the charge. E

But there was another ground aside from that, equally strong, and this brings me to the second non-direction which is in relation with the issue of mens rea. The question that arose in this case is what was the appellant's frame of mind at the material time. Now it is self-evident that the section whereunder the appellant was charged and convicted has two essentials: F

(1) Unlawful entry into or upon property in the possession of an other (actus reus),

(2) Such entry must be with intent G

(i) to commit an offence (which was not the allegation), or

(ii) to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession of the property (this was the mens rea alleged in the charge in this case). H

Of course the words intimidate, insult and annoy must be understood in their ordinary senses. To intimidate means to overawe, to put in fear, by show of force or threats or violence; to insult is to assail with scornful abuse or to treat with offensive disrespect; and to annoy is to irritate, to molest, to harass or to disturb the reasonable peace of mind. I

It was necessary here for the learned magistrate to address his mind on this question of intent. He was obliged to consider whether the unlawful entry was calculated on the appellant's mind to intimidate, insult or annoy. Unfortunately this point did A not engage his attention at all. Ratanal and Thakore on The Law of Crimes 14th edition go into this matter of intention at quite great length. At pages 1083 - 1084 they have this to say: B

"The word" "intent" is not to be taken as identical with "wish" or "desire". The intention constitutes the entry criminal. Merely to trespass is not ordinarily such an offence; but when the trespass is in order to the commission of an offence, or when it is to intimidate, to insult, or to annoy, it is punished. Thus, the essence of the offence is the intent in committing C the trespass. It is essential for the prosecution to prove the intention laid down in the section. The intention must always be gathered from the circumstances of the case, and one matter which has to be considered is the consequences which naturally flow from the act, because a man is usually presumed to intend the consequences of his D own act. That, however, is only one element from which the court has to discover the intention of the party who trespasses. Was the real intention to annoy, or was the real intention something else and the annoyance a mere consequence, possibly foreseen, but not intended or desired? If it is the latter, there is no offence under the section... A E conviction could not follow merely because one could pronounce with certainty that the accused must have known that his act would, as one of the inevitable incidents, cause annoyance. Criminal trespass depends on the intention of the F offender and not upon the nature of the act. It is one thing to entertain a certain intention and another to have the knowledge that one's act may possibly lead to a certain result. The section is so worded as to show that the act must be done with intent and does not, as other sections do, embrace the case of an act done with knowledge of the likelihood of G a given consequence.

Although a trespasser knows that his act, if discovered, will be likely to cause annoyance, it does not always follow that he does the act with that intent....
The corroborated evidence of the appellant stood unrebutted. There was nothing to refute his story that he had H been re-allocated the plot by Nyoni. The learned magistrate remarked that it was wrong for Nyoni to do so. I am disposed to agree with him and I would be charitably inclined to the view that Nyoni did so inadvertently or under a misapprehension. But there was no positive evidence to establish that the appellant's entry upon the land I was accompanied by an intention to intimidate, insult or annoy. The facts, in my opinion, operated to take the case out of the scope of section 299 (a) of the Penal A Code. There was hardly any vestige of doubt that the appellant had been given to believe, and he honestly and reasonable believed, albeit mistakenly, that he had been granted the title to the land. And it appears that his entry B upon it was solely in the exercise of the bonafide claim of that supposed right. The law visits not the honest error, but the malice of mankind. I am sure that if the learned magistrate had applied his mind to the ingredients of the offence he would have come to a different conclusion. He would have held that there was no mens rea necessary to bring home the offence of criminal trespass. He would, therefore, have acquitted the appellant. C
The aforegoing were my reasons for quashing the conviction. I would like to make it quite clear, though, that nothing herein should be construed as finally deciding the right to the plot in question.

The respondents in this application were to answer charges of offence under the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act, 1984. They applied to the High Court for bail and their applications were granted. At least 30 I days after the date of the ruling of the High Court, the Republic filed notices of appeal and then filed affidavits in support of "Applications

Held: (i) Notices of appeal ought to be filed within 14 days of the High Court ruling: Rule 61 of the Tanzania Court of Appeal Rules, 1979; as the notices here were brought out of time, they ought to have been preceded by B appropriate applications to appeal out of time, supported by affidavits setting out good reasons for the delays; an affidavit which contains no reasons, as the affidavits in this application, is improper;

(ii) in deciding whether or not to allow an application to appeal out of time, the court has to consider C whether or not there is "sufficient reasons" not only for the delay, but also "sufficient reasons" for extending the time during which to entertain the appeal.
Judgment
Makame, J.A.: In this Ruling I shall deal with two applications together. They are Misc. D Economic Criminal Application No.1/85 involving the respondent Ally Haji Ahamed, and Application No.2/85, with Yona Kaponda and nine other persons as the respondents. In both applications the Republic is the applicant and the background facts are essentially the same. In both applications Mr. Saffari, Senior State Attorney, appeared for the Applicant Republic, while Mr. Bateyunga, learned advocate, represented the E respondents.
The eleven respondents in these two applications were alleged to have committed offence against the Economic and Organized Crime Control Act, 1984. F
Mtenga, J., granted them bail when they applied to him and, except in the case of Ally Haji Ahamed, the Republic did not object to the applications.
The Ruling in Ahamed's case was made on 19th December, 1984, and on 26th January, 1985 Mr. Teemba, Senior State Attorney, purported to file a Notice of Appeal. On the same day, he swore an affidavit in support G of and "Application for Leave to Appeal Out of Time".
There were eight rulings involving the other ten applicants and these were delivered on various dates, between 19th and 31st December, 1984. On 30th January, 1985 Mr. Teemba purported to file a Notice of Appeal and on the following day he swore an affidavit in support of an 'Application for Leave to Appeal out of Time". H
In terms of Rule 61 of the Tanzania Court of Appeal Rules, 1979, the Republic ought to have filed a Notice of Appeal within fourteen days of each ruling by Mtenga, J., granting bail. The Republic did not do so, and before I they can be allowed to file the Notices out of time they ought to make appropriate application setting out good reasons for the delays.

With respect, such an empty application is not only not serious, it sounds discourteous to the court. F

Mr. Saffari conceded that Mr. Teemba assigned no reasons for the delay, and he himself was not able to advance any. He merely said that the delay was only a short one and not unreasonable. Quite obviously, G whether or not a delay is unreasonable is only one of the factors to be taken into account; but the delay has to be explained first. Mr. Bateyunga has objected to the applications and he pointed out the omission I have referred to.

In deciding whether or not to extend time I have to consider whether or not there is 'sufficient reasons'. As I H understand it, 'Sufficient reasons' here does not refer only, and is not confined, to the delay. Rather, it is 'sufficient reason' for extending time, and for this I have to take into account also the decision intended to be appealed against, the surrounding circumstances, and the weight and implications of the issue or issues involved. I The respondents here were released on bail, after applying for the same, presumably after being given the mandatory advice in accordance with Section 29 (4) of Act 13 of 1984. They were advised to petition the High Court, which is probably not the same as an Economic Crimes Court. The particular 'High A Court' referred to under Sections 3 and 4 is meant to hear and determine cases, and Mtenga, J. felt that that did not include questions of bail. An application for bail after a person is charged is to the Court, which I suppose refers to the Economic Crimes Court, in which a High Court judge must sit with two lay members. B Under section 16, decisions are by majority, which implies the presence of the lay members, but arguably that does not dispose of Mtenga, J.'s problem: According to Mtenga, J.'s argument, bail would be excluded because "All questions" under section it refers only to all those questions to be decided by the Court, and bail is not one of them. C

There are thus obviously conflicting views. The reality however, is that there are these eleven people, and probably a lot more, who are out on bail and who the Republic contends ought not to have been released on bail. D These people ought to know whether or not they are legally out. Those in remand custody, and these would, I think, be several, ought to know for sure where they should go to seek bail, if they want to. If it is correct that lay members must be involved, and if Mr. Bateyunga is right that to-date no lay members have been appointed, it must mean that the system is impotent - no bail can be granted at the moment; so the authorities under Section 5 E of the Act should be moved into action. All this would depend on resolving the issue to be raised in the intended appeal.

In view of all the foregoing, what is involved here is certainly a matter of great public importance, and it is proper that the Court of Appeal should decide this grave matter. The situation is a novel one and the novelty might have F contributed to Mr. Teemba's delay. Notwithstanding the Republic's failure to advance reasons, I find sufficient reason for extending time within which the Republic may file Notices in these two applications. Appropriate Notices to appeal must be filed by Friday 10th May, 1985 and then the matter should be followed up accordingly. The application is accordingly allowed. G

CIVIL APPEAL 3 OF 1985 B

Flynote

Land Law - Customary title - Right over land under native law and custom - Person claiming such right must prove he is a native.

Land Law - Village Councils - Whether land possessed by villages automatically vested in village councils after their establishment. C Land Law - Licensees - Trespass over licensees' rights - Damages awardable.

-Headnote

The respondents filed a suit in the High Court against the appellant claiming general and special damages for D trespass by the appellant over the respondent's lands and destruction of their crops and huts. The High Court gave judgment in favour of the respondents.

On appeal the appellants argued that the respondents had not established that they occupied the lands either E under customary or by grant under the Villages and Ujamaa Villages Act, 1975. The respondent Village Council though duly registered and incorporated could not show that the land was allocated to it by the District Development Council as required by direction 5 of the Directions under the Villages and Ujamaa Villages Act, F 1975. As for the individual villagers, these failed to prove that they were natives within the meaning of the law. Moreover most of the claimant villagers did not testify in court believing a few selected villagers could represent them. It was argued that the claims of each villager was distinct and had to be testified by the villager concerned.

In favour of the villagers it was argued that, if they had no right to possess the land, they, at least, were licensees G of the appellants and that the appellant's action of destroying the respondents' property amounted to trespass.

Held: (i) None of the villagers who had testified could be said to have held land on customary tenure, as none H had established, or even averred that he was a native;

(ii) the Mulbadaw Village Council did not own any land because there was no evidence of any allocation of land to it by the District Development Council; I

(iii) the fact that the village council succeeded the previous unincorporated village in its administrative function over a specified area

confers no title of any type over such land on the village council; A

(iv) since the villagers were cultivating and planting with permission of the appellant's land they were in possession lawfully, as licensees, they can claim damages in trespass for the destruction of their property by the appellant.

Judgment

Mustafa, J.A.: The respondents were plaintiffs in a High Court action. The first plaintiff, C Mulbadaw Village Council and another 66 villagers all of the same area, in the Basotu Ward, Hanang District, had filed a case in the High Court against the National Agricultural and Food Corporation (hereafter called Nafco) claiming general and special damages for trespass by Nafco over the plaintiffs' lands and destruction of D plaintiffs' crops and huts. The High Court (D'Souza, Ag. J.) awarded the 1st plaintiff Shs.250,000 as general damages and all the other plaintiffs a global sum of Shs.1,300,000 as general damages and a sum of Shs.545,600 as special damages to all the villagers. The Judge also made a declaration that the area of 8125 acres in dispute E belongs to the plaintiffs as claimed and ordered Nafco to cease its trespass forthwith. From that judgment Nafco has appealed to this court.

The Village Council claimed to be the "lawful owner" of 200 acres of arable land under cultivation and 6095 acres of pasture land. The village council in the plaint alleged that it was allocated the land by the "local F authorities' in 1976 and had since then been in possession.

The other villagers alleged in the plaint that they individually had separate farms allocated to them by "local authorities" in 1964 and that all the separate farms together measured 1830 acres of arable land.

Nafco in its defence claimed that it was in lawful occupation of the disputed land and denied the claim of the G village council and the other villagers and denied committing any trespass or acts of damage.

Since the litigants on both sides have claimed lawful possession or ownership over the same land, we will have to examine the evidence adduced in court to discover whose claim has more priority or is more superior. We will H say at once that the evidence adduced was somewhat confused and vague.

The village council was registered under the Villages and Ujamaa Villages (Registration, Designation and I Administration) Act 1975 on 24.3.1977 and incorporated on 30/12/1977. So the council existed as a legal entity as from 1977. There was evidence that before the village council was registered there was a Mulbadaw village, administering and with jurisdiction over an area of land A which the village council claimed. On this point the judge stated inter alia:

> The defendant has argued that as the village was not registered until 1976 it could not hold land in 1975. I accept the B evidence of P.W.1 Frederick Tluway. The effect of this evidence is that before the village was incorporated Mulbadaw village was an administrative unit. When it was incorporated it was in possession and control of all land within the former C administrative unit. It is inconceivable that a village was registered and incorporated without any land in its possession and control .... I am satisfied that the village council were in lawful possession and control of the land in question.

The Judge had in effect held that the fact of registration and incorporation automatically vests the village council D with land. We do not think such a quantum leap is justified. The previous village as a community might or might not have had ownership or possession of the land within its administrative unit. The land in the village might have E belonged individually to the villagers living in the village or the village might have had some land in its own capacity as a community. We have no evidence. But an administrative unit does not necessarily imply that the land within its administrative jurisdiction is land belonging to it. At least no such evidence had been adduced, nor F indeed was such a claim made. The fact that the village council succeeded the previous unincorporated village in its administrative function over a specified area confers no title of any type over such land on the village council. The village council could acquire land only by allocation to it by the District Development Council. We refer to direction 5 of the Directions under the Villages and Ujamaa Villages (Registration, Designation and G Administration) Act, 1975 as published in Government Notice No. 168 on 22.8.75. It reads:

> 5(1) Land for the use of a village shall comprise such areas of land as may be reserved for the purpose and allocated to the village by the District Development Council. H

There was no evidence of any allocation of land to this village council by the District Development Council at any stage. On the evidence adduced in court we can find nothing which can sustain the claim by the village council I that it was the owner or was in possession of 200 acres of arable land and 6095 acres of pasture land from 1977 onwards. Prior to that of course the village council was not in existence and could not have owned or possessed land. A

We now deal with the other 66 villagers. Only 5 villagers testified as to their own claims, i.e. P.W.2, P.W. 3, P.W.5, P.W.6 and P.W.7. Two witnesses P.W.1 and P.W.4 also testified, but the evidence of these two B witnesses was irrelevant to the individual villagers' claim. The other claimants did not give evidence in court at all. They had, in writing, authorised those villagers who had testified to represent them and act in their behalf. That was in order. P.W.3 in the course of giving his evidence, produced a document Exh. p6, being minutes of a C public meeting held by Mulbadaw village on 6.1.81 with a list containing the name of villagers with their acreage of land and crops grown thereon which Nafco had allegedly destroyed and for which Nafco was sued in trespass.
It was alleged by P.W.3 that a committee had gone round and interviewed the villagers and recorded the damage D done. Primarily on the basis of this Exhibit p6, because no cross-examination was directed to it in the course of P.W.3's testimony, the trial judge held that the:

> 2nd to 67th plaintiff were in occupation of 1830 acres of arable land in Mulbadaw village before Nafco started operations E in the area under the administrative jurisdiction of Mulbadaw village council. The village council recognised that their occupation was lawful and they had been in occupation for a considerable time before Nafco decided to expand. They had customary tenancies or what are called deemed right of occupancy ... This court finds that the rights of the peasants F and this village council could not be extinguished except by operation of law....

The Judge had obviously held that all the 66 villagers held customary tenancies over their plots. We fail to see how the contents of Ex.p6 (which incidentally listed only 64 names) could be evidence of the respective rights of G those who had not testified. There is no evidence as to when each villager had occupied or was in possession of the land, and this list was compiled in the absence of Nafco. In any event each villager had to prove his own case. Each claim is different from the other, in terms of date of possession, of acreage, of the method of H acquisition, and so on. They were individual claims. A person may act and represent another person, but we know of no law or legal enactment which can permit a person to testify in place of another. All that P.W.3 could say was that he was told by certain claimants as to the facts of their claims, and what was said was listed I accordingly. That is pure hearsay, and direct or incontestable documentary evidence is required to sustain a land claim. The content of the minutes of that meeting does not prove itself, and is outside the scope of Part V of A the Evidence Act.

Here each villager had a separate and distinct claim, though the claims were based on similar acts of trespass. This is not one of those representative suits by or for a club, where different conditions apply. It is indeed B surprising that a number of plaintiffs failed to testify in court.

Their cases never got off the ground. We are satisfied that the claims of those villagers who had not testified must fail.

We will now deal with those villagers who had testified. The Judge found that they had customary tenancies or what are called deemed rights of occupancy. C

In this connection we refer to the Land Ordinance, Cap. 113 of the Laws. An occupier is defined;

Occupier means the holder of a right of occupancy and includes a native or a native authority using or occupying land in D accordance with native law and custom.

The trial Judge obviously was of the view that the villagers were claiming as natives, and therefore as holders of rights of occupancy. "Native" is defined in the same Ordinance as: E

Native means any native of Africa not being of European or Asiatic origin or descent and includes a Swahili but not a Somali. F

P.W.2, P.W.5, P.W.6 and P.W.7 did not aver or testify that they were natives. It is for a plaintiff to establish that he was a native before a court can hold that he was holding land on a customary tenancy. These 4 villagers had not established that they were in occupation on the basis of customary tenancies. G

P.W.3 testified that he was of Somali descent, and was therefore in law not a native before 1970, and could not hold a customary tenancy.

By an amending Act to the Land Ordinance, Act No. 28 of 1970, native was amended as follows: H

A native means any person who is a citizen of the United Republic and who is not of European or Asiatic Origin or descent.

It will be seen that none of the villagers who had testified could be said to have held land on customary tenure, as I none had established, or even averred, that he was a native. They were thus not "occupiers" in terms of the Land Ordinance.

NYALALI CJ, MUSTAFA JJA, MAKAME JJA

According to the evidence of D.W.2, a Land Officer, about 26,000 acres of land in the Basotu Ward, which A land included the area in dispute between the litigants, was occupied by the Kilimo Dept. from 1968-1969. He testified that Nafco succeeded to the land occupied by Kilimo and entered into occupation of it in 1969, the area B being reduced to 22790 acres. In fact Nafco was offered a Right of Occupancy over the said 22790 acres in January, 1973 for 99 years. Nafco wanted 2 separate grants, in two different names, and the issue of the Right of Occupancy was thereby delayed until l981. But Nafco had occupied the land in dispute from 1969 onwards, although no wheat was planted until 1979. C

From the evidence of D.W. 2, the clear inference is that the land, inclusive of the disputed area, was in 1968 provisionally allocated to Kilimo and then to its successor Nafco pending the finalisation of the formalities of the issue of a Right of Occupancy. The offer of a Right of Occupancy in 1973 to Nafco bears this out. The Judge ignored the evidence of D.W.2 completely. D

According to D.W.3, a witness who did not impress the Judge, the area, including the land in dispute, was in 1968 fenced in by Kilimo, and villagers had entered the land by breaking the fence, necessitating the need to call in the Field Force to quell such riotous behaviour. The Judge did not refer to this part of D.W.3's evidence. E

In our view, the evidence of D.W.2 and D.W.3 would tend to show that Nafco had been in occupation of the disputed land since 1969. We also think that prior to 1969, none of the villagers who had testified had established that they had customary tenancies over their land, even if we accept that they were in physical F possession of or were using the land. The villagers who had testified could perhaps have been licensees, but they were not occupiers in terms of the Land Ordinance. We will now deal with each villager who had testified.

P.W.2 stated that he had lived at Mulbadaw for many years and was given a shamba after 1961. He did not say G when he was given the shamba, but it must have been around 1961. His house was destroyed by a Nafco tractor as well as his 4 acres of growing maize and beans. His hut cost Shs. 500 and he expected 15 bags of maize and 21/2 bags of beans per acre. Each bag of maize was valued at Shs.100, and each bag of beans at 275/=. His claim would be Shs.9,250/=. H

P.W.3 stated that he was a Somali, and that his father had the land since 1964 and he himself farmed the land from 1972. He had planted 50 acres of hybrid maize which was destroyed by Nafco. An acre of maize could yield on an average 5 bags of maize, each bag valued at shs.100/=. His claim would be 25,000/=. I

P.W.5 alleged that he had been on the land a long time ago when it was virgin land. He had 30 acres of hybrid maize intercropped with beans. He did not A give any figures. Presumably the figure would be 5 bags per acre of maize and each bag worth shs.100/=. His hut was also burnt. His loss would be 15,500/=.

P.W.6 stated that his father obtained the land in 1964 and he himself took over in 1975. B He had planted 5 acres of maize. He had 3 houses, which he estimated at Shs.26,000/=. He gave no figures for bags per acre or cost of a bag of maize. Presumably the figure would be 5 bags per acre and shs.100/= per bag of maize. His claim would be shs.28,500/

P.W.7 alleged that he had lived in the area for 25 years. Ten bags of stored maize and 7 C bags of stored beans were burnt. 51/2 acres of growing maize and 4 acres of beans were destroyed. He estimated 15 bags of maize and 4 bags of beans per acre. His hut was burnt. He estimated the cost of 1 bag of maize at 100/= and one of beans at at 275/=. His claim would be shs.15,575/=.

Both P.W.1 and P.W.4 did not claim any loss in their own right. D

As we have pointed out the evidence adduced was rather vague and imprecise. We will assume that the destruction and damage was done in or about 1979.

We will now refer to the evidence of D.W.9. This witness was the Katibu Kata of E Basotu Ward since 1977, which included the area in dispute. He testified that the villagers used to apply through him to Nafco to cultivate and plant on land in the disputed area every year. He had been granting permission on behalf of Nafco to such villagers. However he stated that for the 1980/81 season Nafco had refused permission to the villagers to cultivate and plant on Nafco land. Although the Judge found that D.W.9 was F unreliable, he was referring to the evidence of D.W.9 concerning the exercise in removing and evicting the villagers from the area in dispute. The Judge did not refer to or consider the evidence of D.W.9 about the granting of the yearly permission to cultivate and plant. G

We think that D.W. 9's evidence on this point is credible. If that were so, it is clear that the villagers were cultivating and planting with permission on Nafco land, until 1980. As such they were in possession lawfully, as licensees, and they can claim damages in trespass for their crops and huts destroyed in 1979. H

In our view of the evidence the Judge rightly found, despite Nafco's denial, that Nafco was responsible for the destruction and burning of huts and crops as alleged by the villagers who had testified.

In brief in our view the village council had failed to establish that it was in occupation of I or owned land since its registration and incorporation in 1977. The villagers who had not testified had failed to establish their claims as there was no evidence adduced in court in support. Those who did testify, i.e. A P.W.2, P.W.3 P.W.5, P.W.6 and P.W.7 had failed to establish that they originally had customary tenancies in that they had failed to prove that they were natives within the meaning of the word in the Land Ordinance. Nafco had been in occupation of the land in question, since 1969, as successors to Kilimo. After 1969, the villagers only B cultivated and planted with the leave and permission of Nafco, until Nafco refused permission in 1980.

If the villagers who had testified could have established that as natives they had rights of occupancy by virtue of customary tenancies then the view of the Judge that such villagers in this case could only be evicted or dispossessed under the provisions of the Land C Acquisition Act, No.47 of 1967 is sound.

In view of the conclusions we have reached, we have to decide if the villagers who had testified are entitled to any damages. We are of opinion that P.W.2, P.W.3, P.W.5, P.W.6, and P.W.7 would be entitled to claim for the loss they had suffered, as a result D of Nafco's action. They had cultivated and planted under licence from Nafco and were in physical possession at the material time and an action in trespass would lie. Since there was no challenge to their evidence in respect of the damage alleged, we are prepared to accept the figures and estimates they have submitted: E

P.W.2 would be entitled to a sum of shs. 9,250/=
P.W.3 would be entitled to a sum of shs.25,000/=
P.W.4 would be entitled to a sum of shs.15,500/=
P.W.6 would be entitled to a sum of shs.28,500/= F
P.W.7 would be entitled to a sum of shs.15,575/=

Their claims for general damages have not been made out. Their licences expired when their applications to cultivate and plant was refused by Nafco in 1980, and they had no G right or interest of any kind in the disputed land after their 1979 planting.

The claims of all the other plaintiffs fail.

We allow the appeal, set aside the judgment and order of the High Court, and substitute H therefore an order dismissing the claims of the plaintiffs except those plaintiffs listed below. The appellant will pay the successful plaintiff/respondents below named the sums set against their respective names:

P.W.2 Welwel Amsi the sum of Shs. 9,250/= I

1985 TLR p96

P.W.3 Mohamed Abdi Guledi the sum of Shs.25,000/= A

P.W.5 Ami Habiye the sum of Shs.15,500/=

P.W.6 Uysufu F.G. Ally the sum of Shs.28,500/=

P.W.7 Bangi Laida the sum of Shs.15,575/=

These sums bear interest at 9% p.a from the date of the filing of the suit to date of B payment.

In the circumstances we make no order for costs, both here and below.

The appellant will be at liberty to apply for the refund of the money it had deposited in C court, subject to the deduction of the sums payable to the respondents as above stated.

Appeal allowed.

Criminal Practice and Procedure - Charges - Withdrawal of - Duty of prosecutors to give reasons for seeking to withdraw charges - Criminal Procedure Decree, Cap 14, s.81.

-Headnote

The accused appeared before a magistrate's court charged with receiving by false G pretences c/s 275 of the Penal Decree, Cap.13. The prosecution, having called four witnesses, closed its case. Subsequently, the accused gave evidence, on oath, in his defence and then the court adjourned to allow for his witnesses to come and give further H evidence. Despite several more adjournments the said witnesses never appeared and the court never came to hear them. Then suddenly, the prosecutor applied for withdrawal of the charge under s.81(a) of the Criminal Procedure Decree, Cap. 14, and I the magistrate readily granted the application. The High Court considered this on revision.

RAMADHANI CJ

Held: (i) Withdrawal of charges may be made under paragraph (a) of s.81 of the A Criminal Procedure Decree, Cap 14, only if the accused person has not been called upon to make his defence; if the accused has already been called upon to make his defence, the withdrawal is done under paragraph (b) of the section, and the consequence of the withdrawal is acquittal; as the accused in this case had already made his defence, the appropriate provision for withdrawing the charge was s.81(b) and not B s.81(a) of the Decree;

(ii) withdrawal of charges unders .81 of the Criminal Procedure Decree, Cap.14, can be done in two ways. One is by the Attorney - General withdrawing a charge or instructing that it be withdrawn, and the other is by the prosecutor applying to C court for consent to withdraw the case; those two ways are not one and the same;

(iii) the Attorney-General is the only public prosecutor with the privileged position whereby he can withdraw charges without assigning any reasons and the courts D must readily comply with his move; no other prosecutor enjoys that privilege;

(iv) any public prosecutor, other than the Attorney-General wishing to withdraw a case must give reasons for his intention, to do so and must seek the consent of the court and, accordingly, the court must record those reasons and make a decision, with its reasons, to accord or to withhold consent; E

(v) the practice of public prosecutors withdrawing charges without assigning reasons and courts according consent as a mere formality, as happened in this case, is improper and should cease. F

Judgment

Ramadhani, C.J.: The accused, Suleiman Saleh Ali, was charged with one count of receiving by false pretences contrary to section 275 of the Penal Decree, Cap 13. It was alleged that he had received an electric iron worth Shs.200/=. The I accused denied this charge. The prosecution adduced four witnesses and closed its case. The accused A defended himself on oath. He said that he had witnesses but on the day that was fixed for hearing them, they never turned up. So the accused requested the court to summon them for him. The next time the case was to continue the accused himself was absent. The public prosecutor applied for an arrest warrant. The case was adjourned again B three more times but the accused was still at large. On the fourth time the accused had been found. The prosecutor then requested the court to remand the accused. That was 15th April, 1985. Then on the 27th April, when the case was to proceed the Prosecutor C withdrew the charge under section 81(a) of the Criminal Procedure Decree, Cap 14. The Magistrate granted the request.

Section 81 permits a prosecutor with the consent of the court or on the instructions of the Attorney-General, at any time before judgment is pronounced [to] withdraw from the prosecution of any person; D

If the prosecutor does so before the accused person is called upon to make his defence, the withdrawal is under paragraph (a) where upon the accused is discharged but can be re-charged. But if the accused has already been called upon to make his defence the withdrawal is under paragraph (b) and the accused is acquitted: R. v Jiwan Nathu & Another (1944) 11 E.A.C.A. A62 I will deal with this case later on. E

In the present case the accused had already made his defence on oath. The court was awaiting his witnesses only. Therefore the appropriate paragraph was (b) and not (a) as was requested for and granted by the magistrate. F

Apart from the foregoing discrepancy I feel there is a need to talk on this section 81. There are two ways by which a prosecutor may withdraw a case. The prosecutor may have instructions from the Attorney-General to withdraw a case. In such a situation the court has no discretion but to discharge the case: The Queen v The G Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs and Trade Marks [1899] 1 Q.B. 909, at 194. Alternatively the prosecutor might have the consent of the court to withdraw a case. In this case before me, the second method has been used.

My observation is that the courts have been treating these two alternatives as one and H the same. Without any instructions from the Attorney-General, a prosecutor will be allowed to withdraw a case. But as in the second alternative where the consent of the court is required then the court has to satisfy itself of the appropriateness of the application before granting it. Even in the case of The Queen v The I Comptroller-General, the learned judge has said at page 914:

RAMADHANI CJ

I do not say that when a case is before a judge a prosecutor may not ask the judge to allow the A case to be withdrawn, and the judge may do so if he is satisfied that there is no case... (emphasis is mine.)

It is obvious from the above quoted passage that the court is duty bound to hear the B reasons of the prosecutor for the application to withdraw. When the court is satisfied as to the reasons, only then would it grant its consent. It is essential that there be a record of the reasons and the decision of the court instead of merely recording the application and without any reasons at all recording the consent. C

I have not been able to find out any cases of Zanzibar on this point. Likewise my efforts to obtain East African cases bore no fruits. I have seen only two East African cases which have been reported. The first one was that of R. v Jiwan Nathu & Another already cited. But that case dealt with the issue of which paragraph of section 87 of the D Criminal Procedure Code of Kenya, which is in pari materia with our section 81, was used and so whether the accused could be charged again or not. The second one is of Mwangi Macharia v R. (1959) E.A. 955 which again is not on the issue before me. Therefore I have to resort to Indian cases. E

There are two conflicting decisions that have been made by the Indian courts. First In re Sadayan 5 Mad. L.T. 216 it was decided that it is not necessary that a magistrate gives his reasons for granting his consent. Unfortunately these reports are not in the Library therefore I have not been able to read the proceedings for myself. But in another case of F Umesh Chunder Roy v Satish Chundra Roy & Others 22 C.W.N. 69 the High Court of India differed from that decision and the learned judges said at page 71:

> The only prosecutor who may under the provision of the Code of Criminal Procedure withdraw G from a prosecution without giving reasons is the Advocate-General. No other Public Prosecutor is placed in that privileged position; and if the consent of the Court is to be regarded as a ministerial act or merely an executive act we do not understand why it should have been necessary for the legislature to insert such a provision in the section of the Code H with which we are now dealing. It is clear to our clear minds that in either withholding consent or in according consent the Court is acting in a judicial capacity, and for its order as for every order judicially made it ought to give and record its reasons. I

This decision was followed in the case of Rajani Kanta Sheha v Idris Thakur 48 C. A 1105.

I am in agreement with their lordships. It is absolutely necessary that a Public Prosecutor gives reasons for his application to withdraw and it is the duty of the Court to record the same and to give its decision with its reasons. B

There was a need to follow the above prescribed procedure in the present case. The accused was remanded for twelve days and then the Prosecutor applied for the withdrawal of the case. Admittedly the accused person himself was at fault for not making an appearance. But there was no new discovery made and the Public C Prosecutor could have made the application immediately after the accused person had made his defence on the 8th September, 1984 or even on the 12th September when the witnesses of the accused did not turn up and when the case was adjourned to the 20th September when accused person himself became absent.

It is my hope that the present habit of the Public Prosecutor standing up and making an D application for withdrawing a case under section 81 without giving any reasons at all and for the Court according consent without discussing and being satisfied with the reasons but making the whole thing a mere formality will cease. The Public Prosecutor must give reasons and the Court must make a decision to accord or to withhold its E consent giving its reasons.

Order Accordingly

of fines of Shs.500/= against each of them. Unlawful wounding is not an offence A scheduled under the Minimum Sentences Act 1972. Therefore, the maximum sentence which the primary court could impose in this case was a term of imprisonment for twelve months. On revision by the District Court, the sentences were enhanced to imprisonment terms of two years. They appealed against the sentences. B
Held: (i) A proper sentence to impose is always at the discretion of the convicting court and a reviewing tribunal should not interfere with a sentence unless the convicting court misdirected itself in principle or the sentence is manifestly unsuitable; C

(ii) the sentences imposed by the Primary Court in this case were not improper and in sentencing the court did not misdirect itself in principle therefore the sentences as enhanced by the District Court cannot be sustained because they are in excess of what the Primary Court could lawfully impose and the original sentences are sufficient to serve D the ends of justice.

Senguji, for the Republic
Judgment
Ruhumbika, J.: This is an appeal from the decision of the F District Court of Dodoma which court enhanced the sentences of the two appellants before this court to imprisonment for a period of two years each from the sentences of fines of Shs.500/= imposed against each of the two appellants for the offence of unlawful wounding c/s.288 (1) of the Penal Code. The appellants were convicted by the Mvumi G Primary Court and sentenced as stated. The trial court also ordered the two appellants to pay Shs.2,000/= each as compensation to the complainant.

The main ground of complaint in this appeal is that the District Magistrate who enhanced the sentences of the appellants erred in enhancing these sentences to two years because H that was in excess of the powers of the Primary Court as provided for in the Third Schedule to the Magistrates' Court Act, 1984 (Act no. 2 of 1984).

Under the Primary Courts Criminal Procedure Code, paragraph 2 (1) (a) as contained in Act No.2 of 1984, the maximum term of imprisonment that a Primary Court can impose I for an offence which is not scheduled under the Minimum Sentences Act, 1972, is twelve months. The offence A of unlawful wounding is not scheduled under the Minimum Sentences Act, 1972. Therefore, under the provisions of s.21 (1) (a) of the Magistrates' Court Act, 1984 the District Court cannot enhance a sentence in excess of what the Primary Court could B have imposed for that offence. This clearly shows that the District Court erred in enhancing the sentences to two years, which sentences are in excess of the powers of the Primary Court that convicted the appellants.

In addition to that obvious misdirection by the District Court, it was strongly argued for the appellants, and was conceded to by the Republic, that it was ab initio not justifiable C for the District Court to call the record and enhance the sentences imposed by the Primary Court. This is because the thinking of the District Magistrate in enhancing the sentences was induced by the fact that the injuries sustained by the complainant were classified by the medical personnel who treated the complainant as "dangerous". D However, notwithstanding the obvious fact that the medical report classified the injuries as "harm" and not "dangerous", the order of District Court in enhancing the sentences talks of "dangerous" injuries.

As was held by the late (Sir) Biron J., in the case of R. v Juma Iddi [1971] H.C.D. E n.373 "the proper sentence to impose in any particular case is at the discretion of the convicting court. A reviewing tribunal will not lightly interfere with the sentence imposed by such a court, unless the court misdirected itself in principle or the sentence itself is so manifestly inadequate to be unsuitable."

In this case, the trial Primary Court had the opportunity of assessing the whole evidence F brought before it and also to see the complainant's alleged injuries as shown on the medical report. After that the trial court decided on the suitable sentences to be imposed against the appellants. The Court sentenced each appellant to a fine of Shs.500/= and ordered each appellant to pay Shs.2,000/= as compensation to the complainant. G

This court does not find that the original sentences imposed by the trial Primary Court are so manifestly improper that they cannot be sustained nor does this court find that the Primary Court misdirected itself in principle on the sentences passed.

Therefore, apart from the fact that the enhanced sentences of two years by the District H Court cannot be sustained as they are in excess of what the Primary Court could impose under the law, this court does not see why the original sentences imposed by the Primary Court could not serve the ends of justice in this case. The Primary Court, as already observed, had the discretion to consider the sentences and unless those sentences were I manifestly improper that they could not be sustained the District Court was not justified in interfering with them. A

Accordingly, this appeal is allowed. The sentences of imprisonment of two years imposed by the District Court against the appellants are set aside and the original sentences of fines of Shs.500/= against each appellant are restored. The Primary Court orders of compensation against each appellant remain unaltered. B

The two appellants have to be released from prison forthwith if not held on otherwise lawful grounds.

C Appeal allowed.

-Headnote

The appellant had purchased an unsurveyed piece of land held under customary law. A The sale was approved by the CCM chairman and ward secretary. The peace included the land under dispute. Subsequently the respondent obtained a right of occupancy over the disputed land. Before the respondent could build thereon the appellant started to build on it claiming that he was the rightful owner of the land. The respondent B successfully sued him in the High Court. In deciding in his favour the High Court held that the right of occupancy issued to the respondent was obtained legally and without fraud, that the appellant had trespassed on the respondent's plot and that the right of occupancy issued to the respondent extinguished all prior rights and interests of the C appellant in the said plot. The Court awarded the respondent damages in the sum of Shs.287,200/= because he was prevented to build during the material period.

On appeal the appellant challenged the decision of the High Court mainly on the ground D that a granted right of occupancy does not supersede nor extinguish title over land held under customary law. He also challenged the amount of damages awarded to the respondent on the ground that there was no evidence that the respondent was willing, ready and able to build on the plot during the material period.

On the other hand it was argued in favour of the respondent that the appellant had no E title over the land because the sale of the land by one Patrick to the appellant did not have the approval of the village council as required under the Villages and Ujamaa Villages Act, 1975, and therefore, the sale of the said land was void and ineffectual.

Held: (i) A holder of a right of occupancy under native law and custom does not F automatically become a squatter when an area is declared a planning area;

(ii) the interest of the appellant over the land was not compulsorily registrable G and by virtue of section 33(1)(b) of Cap. 334 the right of the respondent vis-a-vis the appellant is not indefeasible and unimpeachable in the circumstances;

(iii) (Makame, J.A. dissenting) the sale of the land by Patrick to the appellant was void and ineffectual as it took place without the approval of the Village Council; H

(iv) no sufficient foundation had been laid for the amount of damages claimed because there was no evidence that the respondent was ready, willing and able to build but was prevented by the appellant during the material period. I

G.M. Fimbo, for the appellant C
H. Mkatte, for the respondent
Judgment
Mustafa, J.A.: This appeal involves the ownership of a plot of land in Mbezi Beach, Dar es Salaam. Nyirabu the respondent herein had sued Nyagwaswa D the appellant herein in the High Court (Bahati, J.) for trespass for damages. The respondent claimed that he was the registered owner of a right of occupancy over Plot 130, Mbezi Beach in the City of Dar es Salaam comprised in Title No. 22549, and that the appellant had trespassed on his plot and had commenced building thereon. He E prayed for an injunction to restrain the appellant from entering or remaining on the said plot and for damages.
The High Court gave judgment in favour of the respondent with costs. It found that the respondent was the legal owner of Plot 130, that the right of occupancy issued to the respondent was obtained legally and without fraud, that the appellant had trespassed on F the respondent's plot and that the right of occupancy issued to the respondent extinguished all prior rights and interests of the appellant in the said plot. It awarded damages to the respondent in the sum of Shs.287,200/=. From that judgment the appellant is appealing to this Court. G
The appellant had filed additional grounds of appeal with leave. Similarly the respondent had filed a notice containing other grounds for affirming the decision of the High Court. There was also a successful application by the respondent for an order for additional evidence to be taken. This Court took such additional evidence from Fidelis Kilulumo, a H Senior Co-operative Officer in the City Co-operative Office of the City Council of Dar es Salaam.
The following facts are not in dispute. The respondent applied for a plot of land to the City Council of Dar es Salaam in early 1978 and he got an offer dated 18.7.78. He followed up the offer and was duly issued with a certificate of Occupancy No. 22549 I over Plot 130, Mbezi Beach, for a term of 99 years commencing from 1.7.1978. This was duly registered on 2nd A December, 1978. The Certificate of Title contained in its schedule a registered survey plan showing the boundaries of Plot 130. The respondent obtained a building permit from the City Council of Dar es Salaam. However before the respondent could build the appellant entered the said plot claiming ownership and commenced to build thereon B despite objections from the respondent. The respondent obtained a temporary court injunction and eventually the appellant ceased erection. A part of the appellant's building stands on about 79 sq. metres of Plot 130.

The appellant had purchased a piece of land for Shs.11,000/= from one Vincent Patrick C on or about 1.4.78 in Mbezi Beach. That piece of land was unsurveyed and allegedly included the land forming Plot 130. The appellant's title to the land consisted only of the informal agreement to purchase from Patrick and nothing else. The said sale was witnessed by the C.C.M. Branch Chairman at Kawe. The appellant was building the D foundation of his house when the suit against him was filed in the High Court, but now the house is semi-finished. He disputed that the land he had purchased was within the boundaries or jurisdiction of the City Council of Dar es Salaam.

The additional witness Kilulumo has stated that Mbezi Village was in the Green belt E area, and although within the jurisdiction of the City Council of Dar es Salaam, was a rural as opposed to an urban area, and that the Village and Ujamaa Village Act of 1975, No. 21 of 1975, was designed to register such rural villages. He was of the decided view that Mbezi Beach was within the jurisdiction of the City Council of Dar es Salaam F and formed part of Mbezi Village which was registered as a village under 1975 Villages and Ujamaa Villages Act on 25.2.1976 and was incorporated on 1.12.76.

The trial judge found that the Mbezi Beach area on which the disputed Plot No. 130 is situated was declared to be planning area by the Ministry of Lands under the provisions G of section 13 of the Town and Country Planning Ordinance Cap. 378. He referred to G.N. 171 of 1966 which declared Mbezi, among other areas, to be a planning area, and he held that a survey plan of the said area was made by the Ministry of Lands. I think Prof. Fimbo who appeared for the appellant before us was attempting to question the H location of Plot 130. On a review of the evidence I am satisfied that Mbezi Beach is within the jurisdiction of the City Council of Dar es Salaam and is a planning area. I am also satisfied that Plot 130 is situated at Mbezi Beach, which forms part of Mbezi village and that this was the land in dispute between the parties.

The trial judge appeared to have held that once an area has been declared to be a I planning area, customary law concerning land holding ceases to apply and a person who has a right of occupancy over a piece of land by A virtue of native law and custom loses that right to a party who obtains a right of occupancy under section 6 of the Land Ordinance Cap. 113 over the same piece of land. The judge was of the view that such a grant of a right of occupancy in a planning area would extinguish a previous holder's right based on native law and custom. The B trial judge based his conclusion on a proposition put forward by one Professor James in his book "Land Tenure and Policy in Tanzania". Following Professor James' view the trial judge held that land in urban areas cannot be acquired other than by direct grant under section 6 of Cap. 113. He held that once an area is given urban status by being C declared a planning area customary law ceases to apply to land in such an area and the right of a holder of a right of occupancy by virtue of native law and custom is extinguished and the holder becomes a mere squatter.

Prof. Fimbo submitted that the trial judge had erred in adopting the opinion of Professor James. He stated that the proposition put forward by Professor James was merely an D expression of opinion and has no legal basis. Prof. Fimbo pointed out that in the Land Ordinance Cap. 113, there are two types of rights of occupancy. In section 2 of Cap. 113:

> right of occupancy means a title to the use and occupation of land and includes the title of E native or of a native community lawfully using or occupying land in accordance with native law and custom.

One right of occupancy is created by a direct grant of public land by the President in terms of section 6 of Cap. 113, the other one is that of a person holding land in F accordance with native law and custom. Prof. Fimbo submitted that since the right of occupancy by virtue of native law and custom over the disputed land subsisted prior to the grant of a right of occupancy to the respondent and as there was no evidence adduced that such prior right had been revoked or acquired under the Land Acquisition G Act. No. 47 of 1967, the grant of a right of occupancy of the plot to the respondent in terms of section 6 of the Land Ordinance Cap. 113 was ineffectual since the President had no capacity or right to contract or grant such land to another person. Prof. Fimbo referred to Mohamed Nyakioza v Sofia Mussa C.A. 89/71 [1971] H.C.D. n.413 & Nafco v Mulbadaw C.A. 3/85 in support. H

Mr. Mkatte who appeared for the respondent would seem to contend that the trial judge did not hold that the right of a holder of a right of occupancy by virtue of native law and custom is extinguished solely because an area has been declared a planning area. He I preferred to support the trial judge's decision on another ground. He however seemed to state that a right of occupancy granted in terms of section 6 of the Land Ordinance A Cap. 113 confers a superior and overriding title.

In my view the law in Tanzania on Land and Tenure is still developing and certain areas are unclear and would have to await the necessary legislation. At any rate I am not prepared, on the rather inconclusive and tenuous arguments advanced in this appeal, to B hold that the right of a holder of a right of occupancy by virtue of native law and custom is extinguished and he thereby becomes a "squatter" on an area being declared a planning area.

Prof. Fimbo submitted that in the High Court, the suit had proceeded on the basis that C Plot 130 was in an urban area, Mr. Kilulumo has testified that Plot 130 was situated in the Green belt, that is, a rural area. Prof. Fimbo contended that this piece of evidence by Kilulumo has brought in a new element in the case, and cannot be accepted or entertained. If I understood Prof. Fimbo correctly he was submitting that if plot 130 was D in an urban area then the provisions of the Town and Country Planning Ordinance Cap. 378 would apply and that in the circumstances, Act 21 of 1975, the Villages and Ujamaa Villages Act 21 of 1975 would not be applicable. Prof. Fimbo contended that there was an inconsistency and indeed a conflict between the provisions of section 35 of E Cap. 378 and Direction 5 of G.N. 168/75 (Directions made under the provisions of section 23 (4) of Act 21 of 1975). Prof. Fimbo was of the view that no reference should be made to the provisions of Act 21 of 1975 or to the directions made thereunder in deciding this appeal as Act 21 of 1975 was not at all applicable to the matter in dispute.

In reply Mr. Mkatte has submitted that the suit was filed in respect of a registered piece F of land in Dar es Salaam and the suit had to be tried in the High Court. That had nothing to do with whether the plot was in an urban or rural area, as rural plots are also registerable.

I am not impressed by Prof. Fimbo's submission on this point. I see no conflict between G Section 35 of Cap. 378 and Direction of G.N. 168 of 1975. Section 35 of Cap. 378 deals with the need of obtaining consent before developing any land within a planning area, whereas Direction 5 of G.N. 168 of 1975 contains provisions for the obtaining of approval for the disposal of land etc. from the Village Council in respect of land of a H registered village. As I see it, if a registered village is within a planning area, then consent of the City Council to develop land has to be obtained. That in no way interferes with the need to obtain the other necessary approvals from the Village Council. I do not see why the provisions of Act 21 of 1975, or the directions made thereunder, if relevant, should not be looked at. I

Reference was made by both Prof. Fimbo and Mr. Mkatte to section

1095 TLR p109

MUSTAFA JJA, MAKAME JJA, OMAR JJA

33 of the Land Registration Ordinance Cap. 334. Section 33 reads in part: A 33 (1) The owner of any estate shall, except in the case of fraud, hold the same free from all estates and interests whatsoever, other than -

(b) (not applicable) B

(c) The interest of any body in possession of the land whose interest is not registerable under the provision of this Ordinance C

It is common ground that the respondent's certificate of occupancy was registered. Mr. Mkatte also contended that this was a first registration, without fraud. Mr. Mkatte submitted that section 33 (1) (b) does not help the appellant. He alleged that there was evidence from which it could be inferred that the appellant's estate in the disputed land D was registerable in terms of Cap. 334. The evidence, according to Mr. Mkatte, consisted in the value of the building, over Shs.500,000/=, being put up by the appellant, and in the view expressed by the appellant that he "wanted to own the place for as long as I wanted...." Mr. Mkatte submitted that it would follow that the appellant was putting E up a permanent and substantial building and was contemplating occupation for a term in excess of 5 years and the land was thus registerable. On the other hand Prof. Fimbo submitted that section 33 (1) (b) refers to "interest" in the land being registerable. He contended that the appellant's interest in the land which derived from native law and custom, was nowhere stated to be registerable under the provisions of Cap. 334. In any F event Prof. Fimbo denied that this was a first registration.

I am of opinion that this was not a first registration. I am also of the view that the interest of the appellant was not compulsorily registerable, and by virtue of section 33 (1) (b) of G Cap. 334 the right of the respondent vis-a-vis the appellant is not indefeasible and unimpeachable in the circumstances.

Mr. Mkatte referred to the additional evidence adduced and to his further grounds for affirming the Court's decision. He submitted that the sale or purported sale of the land by Patrick to the appellant was void and ineffective and the appellant had not acquired H any interest in or title to the land. The land is in Mbezi Beach and Mbezi Beach formed part of Mbezi village which was a registered village under the Village and Ujamaa Villages Act No. 21 of 1975. By G.N. No. 168 of 1975 Directions were made under Act 21 of 1975. Direction 5 (6) reads: I

Except with the approval of the village council no person shall A

(a) transfer to any other person his right to the use of land in a village; or

(b) dispose of his house, whether by sale of otherwise.

Mr. Mkatte submitted that there was no approval obtained from the Village Council for B the sale or transfer of the land to the appellant. The transfer was therefore void and no interest could have passed from Patrick to the appellant.

It is not disputed that the land was held under a right of occupancy, assuming that C Patrick was the rightful person in possession, under native law and custom. Although Patrick had not indicated the extent of the land he had purported to sell to the appellant, I will assume for the purpose of this appeal, that the land included the area of Plot 130, or at any rate the portion of 79 sq. metres on Plot 130 on which a part of the appellant's unfinished building stands. D

It is common ground that the President can issue a right of occupancy in terms of section 6 of Cap. 113 to a person. However the disposition of a right of occupancy is subject to the Land Regulations made under Cap. 113. Regulation 3 of the Land Regulations 1948 (in Cap. 113 Supplement 64) reads: E a disposition of a right of occupancy shall not be operative unless it is in writing and unless and until it is approved by the President.

There is a long line of judicial decisions which established that a disposition of a right of F occupancy without the necessary approval or consent was inoperative, unenforceable and void, see for instance Patel v Lawrenson & another [1957] E.A. 249, Alexander Paterson & another v Kanji [1956] 23 E.A.C.A.106 and Fazal Kassam v A.N. G Kassam [1960] E.A. 1042. Regulation 3 of 1948 would apply to rights of occupancy issued and granted under the provisions of Cap. 113.

It appears that following the same principle rights to land held in a registered village can only be transferred with the approval of the Village Council. And Mr. Mkatte submitted H that the sale by Patrick to the appellant, for lack of approval, was void and of no effect. The appellant had not acquired any right or title to any land. There was thus no right to be extinguished.

Prof. Fimbo submitted that the Directions issued under G.N. 168 of 1975 should be read in their context. He stated that the sub-directions of Direction 5 should be read I together. I will, for convenience, set out Direction 5 in full:

5 (1) Land for the use of a village shall comprise such areas of land as may be A reserved for the purpose and allocated to the village by the District Development Council.

(2) Subject to availability of arable land, the village council shall allot a piece of farmland to every kaya in a the village according to need and ability to develop it. The village council shall have power to determine the structural B pattern of farms in the village and the use thereof.

(3) Subject to an availability of land every kaya shall be entitled to an allotment at least one acre of land for the purpose of building thereon dwelling houses and for other domestic purposes. C

(4) Every piece of land allotted to a kaya for its use shall be subject to the overall control of the village council.

(5) The village council shall make provision for reserve land for future expansion of the village.

(6) Except with the approval of the village council no person shall - D

(a) transfer to any other person his right to the use of land in a village;

(b) dispose of his house, whether by sale or otherwise.

(7) In the exercise of its powers relating to planning and co-ordination of the activities of residents of the village engaged in agricultural activities the Village E Council shall ensure that every piece of land allotted to a kaya for its use shall at all times be maintained as an economic unit and no fragmentation or other use of similar kind shall be permitted. F

Prof. Fimbo contended that there was no evidence to indicate that Patrick had obtained his piece of land from the Village Council. Prof. Fimbo asserted that Direction 5, read as whole, would give the Village Council control only over land it had allocated to the kaya or villagers. He called attention especially to 5(1) and 5 (4) in support of this G contention. He submitted that if a villager held land in a registered village which was not allocated to him by the Village Council, then such villager or his land is not subject to the control of the Village Council. Indeed such land would not be subject to any control whatever. The provisions of Direction 5 (6) therefore would not apply in this case to the sale by Patrick to the appellant. H

In dealing with this point I have to consider the basic and root source from which all title to land in Tanzania is derived. I refer to sections 3 and 4 of the Land Ordinance Cap. 113. Section 3 (1) reads: I

MUSTAFA JJA, MAKAME JJA, OMAR JJA

The whole of the lands of Tanganyika, whether occupied or unoccupied on the date of the A commencement of this Ordinance are hereby declared to be public lands.

Section 4 of Cap. 113 declared all public lands to be under the control and subject to B the disposition of the President and that no title to the occupation and use of such lands shall be valid without the consent of the President.

I have already dealt with the control of disposition of land held under a certificate of title granted by the President. In my view, in a registered village, all the land within it would C be similarly under the control of the Village Council and I do not read Direction 5 as only dealing with land actually allocated to villagers by the Village Council. I think Direction 5 (6) means exactly what it says, that without the approval of the Village Council, no person shall transfer his land. I cannot envisage that certain lands and D certain villagers living in a registered village would be exempt from its jurisdiction and control. That would create an absurd situation. If there were exemptions, it was easy to have said so in the directions.

Prof. Fimbo also submitted that no approval of the Village Council was obtained for the grant of the land in dispute to the respondent. True, but I think the directions in G.N. E 168/75 are only concerned with the relationship between the Village Council and its kaya and villagers, and do not concern the superior landlord, an outside authority in the person of the President. However, should the respondent wish to transfer or dispose of his land, I would think he has to obtain two sets of approval, approval from the Village F Council and approval in terms of Land Regulation 3.

I am of the view that the sale by Patrick to the appellant of the land in Mbezi was void and ineffectual as it took place without the approval of the Village Council. The appellant had not acquired any right or title in the land which could defeat the title in the G land acquired by the respondent by virtue of the certificate of occupancy issued to him. There was no extinguishing of the appellant's anterior title to the land; he never had acquired a title to or interest in the land in dispute. Indeed the appellant may well think it advisable to take steps to regularise his occupation of the land he had allegedly H purchased from Patrick.

I will now deal with the damages awarded to the respondent. The trial judge had referred to the difference in the estimated costs of the construction of the proposed building by the respondent for the periods 1978/79 and 1983. The difference amounted to Shs.287,200/=. The delay in building was due to the act of the appellant. The trial I judge accepted the figure as reasonable.

MUSTAFA JJA, MAKAME JJA, OMAR JJA

Prof. Fimbo submitted that there was no evidence that the respondent had taken A possession of the plot and had purchased or was prepared to place building materials thereon for erection purposes. There was only evidence adduced concerning the cost of construction in the two periods; there was no evidence that the respondent was actually ready willing and able to build in 1978/79. An approved building plan by itself does not B necessarily mean that the respondent was ready to proceed.

I think that there is merit in Prof. Fimbo's submission. There should have been evidence that the respondent was ready willing and able to proceed to build, but was prevented from doing so in 1978/79 by the appellant's action. I think a nominal sum should have C been given for damages in the circumstances, as I am not satisfied that a sufficient foundation had been laid for the amount claimed. I would reduce the damages awarded to a nominal sum of Shs.5,000/=.

The trial judge had ordered the demolition of that portion of the building which was built on a part of plot 130. He ordered the appellant to demolish the said portion and remove D the materials from plot 130 at his own expense by a certain date after which such material, if not removed, would become the respondent's property.

I am satisfied that this is a reasonable order as the appellant had proceeded with the erection even when he knew that the respondent had applied for an injunction. It E appeared to me that the appellant had wanted to confront the respondent with a fait accompli. It was at rather a late stage that the appellant desisted from erection. The structure is completely useless to the respondent. The appellant has mostly himself to blame for the loss to him due to this order for demolition. F

In the result the appeal is dismissed, except that the award of damages in the sum of Shs.287,200/= in favour of the respondent is set aside and a sum of Shs.5,000/= is substituted therefor. The order for costs in the High Court remains undisturbed. G

As for the costs of the appeal, since the appellant has succeeded on the item of damages awarded, I would order each party to bear his own costs.

As Omar, J.A. agrees, there shall be an order on the terms above stated.

H Appeal dismissed

Makame, J.A. (dissenting): I had the advantage of reading in draft the elaborate judgment of my learned brother, Mustafa, J.A. I must confess that this appeal has caused me considerable anxiety. I

I have no doubt about the identity and location of the plot in dispute.

1985 TLR p114

MAKAME JA

It is Plot No. 130 and forms part of the parcel of land which the appellant got from A D.W.2 Vincent Patrick Mmole on 1st April, 1978. It is the plot in Mbezi Village to which Fidelis Paulo Kilulumo, who gave additional evidence before this Court, was taken by the respondent.

When the respondent was made an offer of the parcel of land in dispute on 18th July, B 1978 the area had already been designated and registered as Mbezi Village, under the Villages and Ujamaa Villages Act, 1975. The spirit and effect of the Act, and the various regulations made under it, is among other things, to place the land within the jurisdiction of the Village at the disposal of the village and its kayas, under the C administration of the village, for the economic and social transformation and development of the village and its inhabitants. The State decided that it should be so, and it would defeat the objective of the law if grants over the same land were made, even by superior authorities without consultation, or at the very least knowledge, of the village authorities. D This, I am satisfied, is what happened in the instant case, as is clearly brought out by the testimony of D.W.3 Ally Kibwana, the C.C.M. Branch Chairman of the area and one of the persons who witnessed the transactions between the appellant and Mmole. There is no evidence that at the time of the said transaction the area had already been E surveyed, infact the Defence evidence is that it had not been. Once the appellant got the plot, in April, 1978, he contacted the Kinondoni District Land Office for a survey and title, and the same District Land Office turned round and made an offer to the respondent in July, 1978, behind the appellant's back as it were, when it knew that the F appellant was in possession and wanted a title. According to Kilulumo "The Land Office would not survey a piece of land and allocate it to somebody without involving the Village Council".

According to the evidence, Mole got the piece of land from the local authorities, way G back in 1963. Mbezi Village found him already there therefore. His transfer of his customary right over the land was witnessed and sanctioned by the village authorities including the Ward Secretary who affixed his official stamp on the document. There is also an endorsement to the effect that the Party Office had no objection. One of the witnesses to the transaction was D.W.3 the C.C.M. Chairman of the Branch in the H Village. I am unable to agree with Prof. Fimbo that the Village Council was not necessary in the case of the transaction involving his client. In my view all land transactions in the village need village council approval. If I understood Mr. Mkatte for the respondent, and I think I did, he submitted that such approval was necessary and was not obtained. As already indicated I go along with him on the first part - that I approval was necessary, but I do not share the view that the transaction was void for lack of such approval. I look at the realities of the situation. The Chairman agrees, A the Ward Secretary says there is no objection, and the official stamps are affixed in the presence of witnesses. Those authorities were acting on behalf of the village and I am satisfied that the sale by Mmole, and the purchase by the appellant, were effective and good in the circumstances. The transaction was regulated by the authorities and B there is no evidence that the portion of land had at the material time already been alienated from the village.

MAKAME JA
I am of the view that the respondent's Right of Occupancy was issued in improper circumstances and did nothing to disturb or extinguish the appellant's right. C
I would allow the appeal with costs.
Omar, J.A.: I have read both the judgment of Mustafa, J.A. and Makame J.A. on this case and I am convinced that the legal arguments in favour of the ownership of the disputed piece of land by the respondent are more cogent than those advanced by the D appellant. It is not disputed that appellant bought this piece of disputed land (in which plot 130 is also included) from Patrick but did these village functionaries who witnessed the transaction act as Members of Village Council? There is evidence that they did not therefore, there was no consent given. Consent is legal requirement whether it be given E by the President of the United Republic or by the Village Council. We cannot say it was necessary but not fatal to the transaction when it was not obtained. And when the letter of the law is clear and unambiguous on any matter we do not look for its spirit. Appellant may have wanted to get a normal right of occupancy over the plot he "bought" F from Patrick and he sent his application to the land office much ahead of the respondent but his application was ignored or turned down and the respondent's application was granted. A number of applications are sent to the Land Office, those which are approved are of the successful applicants and can claim ownership over G surveyed areas; those applications which are not acted upon its owners cannot be heard to say that they were first in applying and, therefore, would go ahead with the development of the land, that would really be naive on their part.
All in all I would uphold the Judgment of Mustafa, J.A. because the law on this subject has been exhaustively discussed by him and he has left no stone unturned in arriving at H the just decision affecting both parties.
I Appeal dismissed

-Headnote
The respondent, a landlady had filed a suit in the Mwanza Resident Magistrate's Court E claiming arrears of rent from the applicant, and vacant possession of the premises. The suit was filed after the applicant had left, with the respondent's knowledge, on a trip to Kenya. The court ordered substituted service by affixing summons on the door of the last known premises of the applicant and subsequently, ex-parte judgment was entered F in favour of the landlady without calling upon her to prove her case. The tenant then applied to the High Court for revision under s.44(1)(b) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1984.
Held: (i) The revisionary powers of the High Court may be invoked by any party to civil G case or on the motion of the High Court to correct an error resulting in injustice committed by a district court or court of a resident magistrate;

(ii) the ex-parte judgment in this case offended against the law because it was entered into without calling upon the plaintiff to prove her case as provided for under H Order 14 Rule 2(b) of the Civil Procedure Code;

(iii) Considering that the plaintiff knew from the beginning that the defendant was away only temporarily, the trial court exercised its discretion wrongly by ordering substituted service in the absence of any reason to believe that the defendant was trying I to avoid service;

(iv) before making an order for ejectment or recovery of possession, the trial A court ought to have made a specific finding and to have satisfied itself that, having regard to all circumstances, it was reasonable to make such an order.

Judgment

Mwalusanya, J.: This is an application filed by one Kulwa d/o Daudi C for an order to set aside the decision of the Mwanza Resident Magistrate's Court of 22/9/1984 which was passed ex-parte against this applicant. The respondent in this application is Rebecca d/o Stephen who was the plaintiff in the lower court.

The brief history of the case is as follows. On 2/8/1984 the respondent who is a D landlady filed a suit at Mwanza RM's Court praying for vacant possession of her premises and she claimed arrears of rent against her tenant, the present applicant. When the suit was filed, the tenant was away on safari to Kenya, and that fact was to the landlady's knowledge.

Substituted service was ordered on 25/8/1984 by affixing summons on the door of the E last known premises of the tenant; and after due service ex-parte judgment was on 22/9/1984 entered in favour of the landlady. Later execution of the decree was duly made. It was not long when the tenant filed this application.

At first blush I was of the view that this application was misconceived as the proper F procedure was for judgment-debtor to apply to the trial court to set aside its ex-parte judgment. However on close examination of section 44 (1) (b) of the Magistrates' Courts Act No. 2 of 1984 under which this application is made, I find that the application is in order. The section which is referred to above states: G

The High Court may, in any proceeding of a civil nature determined in a district court or a court of a resident magistrate, on application being made in that behalf by any party or of its own motion, if it appears that there has been an error material to the merits of the case involving H injustice, revise the proceedings and make such decision or order therein as it sees fit.

So the question in this application is whether it has been sufficiently shown that there has I been an error at the trial resulting in an injustice to the applicant.

MWALUSANYA J

The first complaint raised by the applicant is that the ex-parte judgment was wrongly A entered as there was no order on 8/9/1984 directing substituted service as assumed by the trial magistrate. The short answer to that complaint is that that was a mere slip of the pen. The trial magistrate had meant 25/8/84 and not 8/9/84 when the order for B substituted service was given. So in that respect there was no impropriety as contended by the applicant.

The second complaint raised is that judgment was entered ex-parte without calling upon the plaintiff to prove her case by oral evidence or affidavit. On perusal of the record I find that this remonstrance has merit. This was a case which fell squarely under Order C 14 rule 2 (b) of the Civil Procedure Code Act No. 49 of 1966 and so judgment could only be entered ex-parte after plaintiff has proved its case by oral evidence or by affidavit. Failure to comply with that procedure, must be offending the law. So the judgment passed was against the law. If plaintiff had testified perhaps the court could D have found that she was entitled to less rent than she had applied for. That matter about the amount of rent in arrears has been the subject matter of dispute canvassed during the hearing of this application. I was not in the position to resolve it in the absence of any evidence adduced at the trial. E

And there is great force in the submission by applicant that it was a mockery of the legal process when the trial court exercised its discretion by ordering substituted service, where it was apparent on the plaint that applicant was on safari. The tenant had left with a message to the landlady that she was going to Kenya and would be back in due course. The tenant had locked all her belongings in the room. The trial magistrate F should note that as given in Order 5 rule 20 (i) of the Civil Procedure Code, substituted service can only be ordered if the court is satisfied that there is reason to believe that the defendant is keeping out of the way for the purpose of avoiding service or that for any G other reason the summons cannot be served in the ordinary way. In this case it was not investigated at all that the tenant was avoiding service. In fact the tenant was not aware of the suit, and she had left the country with the blessings of the landlady. I agree that the trial court exercised its discretion wrongly in ordering substituted service and that resulted in an injustice. The trial magistrate should always remember that judicial H discretion is not the indulgence of a judicial whim, but the exercise of judicial judgment, based on facts and guided by law. Lord Camden had always considered discretionary powers to be dangerous and so he lamented in Hindson v Kersey (1765) 8 How. St. Tr.57 thus: I it is different in different men; it is casual and depends upon constitution, temper and A passion. In the best it is often times caprice, in the worst, it is every vice, folly and passion to which human nature can be liable.

That ends up the discussion on why I think substituted service should not have been B ordered in the circumstances of this case.
